Since taking power May 20, al-Maliki has yet to confront violent militias or persuade rival Sunnis to support his government. The government's security forces are accused of taking sides in growing sectarian fighting.

Al-Maliki "probably has neither the will nor the ability to address certain core issues, such as widespread abuses on the part of (Shiite) militias and the police," said Wayne White, head of the State Department's Iraq intelligence desk during the U.S. invasion in 2003. "He is beholden to the forces behind the militias for his political survival."

Bush said he will ask al-Maliki "what is required and what is your strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself?"

"My question to him will be, what do you need to do to succeed?" Bush said Tuesday in Estonia.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said Bush will not push al-Maliki to achieve quick results in trying to stabilize Iraq. "I think there's a lot of discussion about pushing Maliki. Maliki is doing a lot of pushing himself," Hadley said.

White and other analysts said that although the administration casts the Bush-al-Maliki meetings as a listening session on the part of the United States, Bush will probably underline the need for fast progress on a host of fronts. Hadley acknowledged that al-Maliki has taken steps forward, but "obviously, they have a long way to go."

Some key issues:

•Militias. U.S. and Iraqi military leaders have pressed al-Maliki for months to outlaw militias, some of which have close links to Shiite parties in Iraq's ruling coalition.

Al-Maliki told USA TODAY in October that his government will not force militias to disarm until possibly early next year. He has rejected U.S. timelines for curbing militias by year's end and has pulled U.S. and Iraqi troops back from raids and checkpoints in Sadr City, the teeming Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad where anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr draws support.

Military historian Andrew Bacevich said al-Maliki is beholden to al-Sadr for helping maintain his Shiite political power base. Al-Sadr's militia has clashed with U.S. forces on at least two occasions. His organization is represented in parliament and in the Cabinet.

Asked what al-Maliki has done to rein in militias, Bacevich said, "I know of nothing. The prime minister is dependent upon (Shiite) groups that are at a minimum in league with the militias, if not controlling the militias."

•Political reconciliation. Al-Maliki, 56, spoke of creating a "pluralist Iraq" when he assumed the job of prime minister in May. Sunni legislators complain that no olive branches have been offered and that Iraq's Sunni minority lives in fear of Shiite-inspired violence.

"We are in an unannounced civil war," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, who heads the main Sunni parliamentary bloc. "The violence will continue tomorrow and the day after tomorrow unless there is a real balance" in the government and Iraqi forces.

•Infiltration of Iraqi forces by death squads and Shiite militias. Al-Dulaimi said Sunnis do not trust Iraqi security forces "because these forces are participating with the militias in attacks against Sunnis."

Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie said such allegations "are baseless." He said Iraqi forces "are getting better trained, equipped and armed. They are getting stronger and more experienced, slowly but surely, week by week."

Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert and an adviser to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that is due to report its findings soon, said al-Maliki appears ill-suited to try to bridge Iraq's sectarian divides, but Washington has no alternative.

The Sunni leadership is "equally fractured," Marr said and "there is no strong man there" who could replace al-Maliki.

Jeffrey White, a former Defense Intelligence Agency Middle East analyst, said al-Maliki was chosen as prime minister by Shiite leaders "because he was weak and pliable."

White also argued that criticism of Iraqi leaders by the White House and Congress comes from unrealistic expectations for al-Maliki or any other Iraqi leader. Leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress have called for al-Maliki's government to take more security responsibility so some of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq can come home.

"There is no way they can do what we want them to do," White said. "If these benchmarks could have been met, they would have been met. They are prisoners of their own history, system and personalities."

Deeper Crisis, Less U.S. Sway In Iraq (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 — When President Bush meets in Jordan on Wednesday with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, it will be a moment of bitter paradox: at a time of heightened urgency in the Bush administration's quest for solutions, American military and political leverage in Iraq has fallen sharply.

Dismal trends in the war — measured in a rising number of civilian deaths, insurgent attacks, sectarian onslaughts and American troop casualties — have merged with growing American opposition at home to lend a sense of crisis to the talks in Amman. But American fortunes here are ever more dependent on feuding Iraqis who seem, at times, almost heedless to American appeals, American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad say.

They say they see few policy options that can turn the situation around, other than for Iraqi leaders to come to a realization that time is running out. It is not clear that the United States can gain new traction in Iraq with some of the proposals outlined in a classified White House memorandum, which was compiled after the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, visited Baghdad last month.

Many of the proposals appear to be based on an assumption that the White House memo itself calls into question: that Prime Minister Maliki can be persuaded to break with 30 years of commitment to Shiite religious identity and set a new course, or abandon the ruling Shiite religious alliance to lead a radically different kind of government, a moderate coalition of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians.

The memo's assessment of Mr. Maliki tracks closely with what his American and Iraqi critics in Baghdad say: that six months after taking office, he has still not shown that he is willing or capable of rising above Shiite sectarianism.

These critics say, in effect, that the 56-year-old Iraqi leader has failed, so far, to meet the test set by Mr. Bush when the two men met for the first time in Baghdad in June. At that meeting, the American leader told Mr. Maliki he had come to "look you in the eye" and determine if America had a reliable partner here.

Against these judgments, some key passages in the Hadley memo seem at odds with the reality on the ground, as if the steady worsening of America's prospects here has driven the White House to reach for solutions that defy the gloomy conclusions of America's diplomats and field commanders, not to mention some of Mr. Maliki's closest political associates.

Even some powerful figures in the Shiite alliance have spoken recently of Mr. Maliki less as a possible leader of a parliamentary coup against the political movement that nurtured him than as an ineffective and ultimately dispensable figure, much like the man he succeeded in the prime minister's office, Ibrahim al-Jaafari.

Shiites in Iraq are riven by factional rivalries, and there may be opportunities for the Americans to exploit those divisions to create parliamentary realignments. Indeed, some Iraqi leaders have started exploring new alliances to break the political logjam, possibly involving a parliamentary coup against Mr. Maliki. But if Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, has been clear about anything, it has been that the Shiites must subordinate their differences to the cause of consolidating Shiite power.

So it is hard to imagine Mr. Maliki approaching Ayatollah Sistani to win approval "for actions that could split the Shia politically," as the Hadley memo suggests. Shiite leaders, who are tiring of Mr. Maliki, appear to be thinking of replacing him with another Shiite religious leader, and not of sundering the alliance and surrendering the power the Shiites have awaited for centuries.

But if recent interviews in Baghdad with senior American and Iraqi officials are a guide, a bigger problem for the Bush administration in effecting change here may be that the United States, in toppling Saddam Hussein and sponsoring elections that brought the Shiites to power, began a process that left Washington with ever-diminishing influence.

One reason for the declining American influence lies in policies that, for various reasons, alienated the political class, most of them former exiles like Mr. Maliki who rode back to Baghdad on the strength of American military power.

Many Shiite leaders resent the Americans for compelling them to share power in the new government with the minority Sunni Arabs — a policy, the Shiites say, that guaranteed paralysis for the government.

Sunni leaders still resent the American invasion, and the imposition of an electoral process that ended centuries of Sunni dominance. Just as much, they fume over the pervasive influence of neighboring Iran, which backs the Shiite parties.

And secular politicians, marginalized by the Shiite and Sunni Islamist politicians who dominate the government, say they, too, have lost faith in the Americans, for failing to protect Iraq's secular traditions.

"Politically, their position is weaker in all aspects," Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish leader, said of the Americans. "They just got weaker and weaker, and many more people who were supporting them are supporting them less."

Meanwhile, the faltering of the latest effort to secure Baghdad has exposed the limitations of American ability to change the military equation. The White House memo raises the possibility of using additional American troops to fill what it calls "the four brigade gap" in troops committed to the Baghdad operation in August — a gap caused by Iraq's new army committing only two of the six brigades it promised.

That shortfall left Americans providing about two-thirds of the 25,000 troops, halting by mid-October the sweeps to clear districts of insurgents and death squads.

But American commanders interviewed said that committing additional American troops could send a signal to Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds that they could continue to quarrel over their share of political and economic power behind an American military shield.

In recent days, Mr. Maliki has seemed to heed these American warnings, telling fellow Iraqi leaders on Sunday, three days after bombings that killed more than 200 Shiites in Sadr City, that they have to accept the blame for the surging violence.

"The crisis is political," Mr. Maliki said, "and the ones who can stop the cycle of aggravation and bloodletting of innocent people are the politicians."

Meanwhile, the political process has almost completely ground to a halt. Mr. Maliki's "national reconciliation plan," intended to reduce violence through dialogue and an amnesty program for militia fighters and insurgents, has stalled.

Political leaders have also made little progress on promises to review the new Constitution, a document resented by Sunnis, and a plan to draft a new law that will set terms for the future divisions of oil revenues that account for 90 percent of Iraq's economy.

Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni legislator, was blunt in his assessment of the government: "Do you not recognize that it's going backwards?"

Sectarian rifts between the nation's political leaders have deepened. During a session of Parliament last week, prominent Sunni and Shiite legislators bitterly accused each other of sectarianism and promoting violence. President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has warned fellow leaders about the possible collapse of the state. And even the Shiite leaders who control the government have taken to conspiring among themselves, with open jockeying for the succession if Mr. Maliki should fall.

At the crux of the most difficult decisions facing Mr. Maliki stands the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose control of one of the largest blocs in Parliament, several ministries and a large and restless militia, makes him arguably the most powerful politician in Iraq. Mr. Maliki is indebted to Mr. Sadr for providing the votes within the ruling Shiite alliance that made him prime minister.

But Mr. Sadr's volatile militia, the Mahdi Army, is blamed for many of the Shiite revenge attacks against Sunnis. The White House memo suggests that Shiites might be willing to drop their support of the militia if the Americans continue their military pressure against Sunni insurgents. But Shiites see the militia as their last defense against decimation by Sunni insurgents.

For the Iraqi leader, the challenge presented by Mr. Sadr and the Mahdi Army amounts to a zero-sum game. If Mr. Maliki moves too fast against the militia, he risks losing Mr. Sadr's support and splintering the Shiite bloc. If he moves too slowly, he will alienate the Sunni Arabs whose cooperation is crucial to any hope of reining in the insurgency.

Meanwhile, Mr. Maliki is in a vexed relationship with the United States. The Iraqi government needs the United States for the protection its 150,000 troops afford. At the same time, he has felt compelled to push back publicly against American pressures, partly to gain credibility among those in his power base who oppose the American presence, particularly the staunchly anti-American Mr. Sadr. Among other things, he has demanded effective control of Iraq's new 140,000-man army, which remains under overall American command.

According to several Iraqi politicians, Mr. Bush may consent in Jordan to arrangements that give Mr. Maliki at least greater nominal authority over the Iraqi forces, something American commanders — and the White House memo — agree would be important to Mr. Maliki's credibility.

But the Americans will be careful about the practical implications, because of concerns that the Iraqi police and army, overwhelmingly Shiite, could be used as a sectarian militia.

Iraqis are growing impatient. "The government should say they are going to take things into their own hands," said Adel Abdul Mahdi, the Shiite vice president and one of Mr. Maliki's rivals for prime minister.

"We don't have enough time," he continued. "Iraqis have to deliver. We have to show the world that there is a state."

Why Iraq's Discord Stalls Political Solution (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- President Bush is expected to press Iraq's leader when they meet this week to act decisively against the violence coursing through Iraqi neighborhoods. That may prove extremely difficult, because the sectarian discord has paralyzed the country's fragile political structure -- and with it much of the leverage at Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's disposal.

Nowhere is this paralysis more evident than in Iraq's national assembly. The Parliament was cast by Washington as a solution to the nation's problems when it was elected a year ago. Instead, it embodies Mr. Maliki's biggest challenge because it mirrors the sectarian battles raging on the Iraqi streets.

Lawmakers routinely demonstrate their fury with one another by boycotting sessions to stymie the legislative process, using speeches in parliament to accuse fellow lawmakers of complicity in violence, and exchanging personal insults using epithets that ensure lingering mistrust and ill will.

In a typically charged exchange last week, a senior Shiite Muslim politician railed against attacks on his co-religionists in one Baghdad neighborhood and called for Iraqi security forces to move in to restore order. A leading Sunni Muslim lawmaker who lives in that neighborhood took the comment as a personal insult and accused Shiites of treating Sunnis like Jews -- fighting words in this mostly Arab land. This kind of acrimony has left Mr. Maliki unable to quell sectarian violence and to reconcile the warring Shiite and Sunni factions through an inclusive political process.

When Mr. Maliki's administration took office in May, it was billed as a government of national unity that could pacify the insurgency by bringing its Sunni leaders back into politics and then disarming Shiite militias by exerting pressure on the political parties that control them. After that, officials in Baghdad and Washington argued, American troops could start leaving the country.

After six months in office, Mr. Maliki is facing pressure from across Iraq's political spectrum. Sunnis are furious that the Shiite militias that target Sunnis for assassination and torture have grown even more active on his watch. While the government has pledged to tackle the militia problem, Mahmoud Mashadani, the outspoken Sunni speaker of parliament answers, "Show me, don't tell me."

Legislators loyal to combative Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr are furious over Thursday's car bombs that killed more than 200 Shiite civilians in Baghdad's Sadr City district. Mr. Sadr blames the Americans for failing to prevent the violence, but anger at Mr. Maliki is running high. "He's like a bird trying to fly without wings," says Nasar al-Rubaie, a parliament member affiliated with the Sadr movement.

Mr. Maliki is blaming the political discord for the deteriorating situation in Iraq. "The crisis is political," he said after last week's bombings. "And it is the politicians who must try to prevent more violence."

His defenders say Mr. Maliki has a lot of responsibility but little authority because the Shiite political parties to whom he owes his post are also the ones controlling the militias. Several Iraqi politicians say the prime minister has repeatedly expressed frustration that he doesn't have enough operational control over Iraq's fledgling security forces.

In protest over last week's carnage in Baghdad, Mr. Sadr's political movement is threatening to suspend its participation in parliament and the cabinet if Mr. Maliki goes through with his plans to meet Mr. Bush in Amman, Jordan, this week. The boycott could touch off yet another political crisis here. But it would hardly be unusual for a parliament accustomed to arguments, walkouts, accusations and counter-accusations hurled across the floor.

"These are the things that need to be transcended, these are the things that happen on a daily basis," Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations representative in Baghdad, says of Iraq's parliamentary quarrels. "There's mistrust, there's division, there's misunderstanding."

The 275-member Council of Representatives is dominated by Shiite political parties. Still, the Sunnis, who had boycotted an earlier round of elections, also have sizable representation. Kurdish factions are well represented, too, but their primary concern has been to ensure smooth sailing for their own autonomous region in northern Iraq.

Heated sectarian rhetoric has become such a common feature in the parliament hall that the assembly decided to push back member statements to the end of the session, knowing that once someone makes an accusation, the parliament quickly descends into chaos. Some lawmakers also want to post a roll call from every session on the parliament's Web site, hoping to name and shame those who don't attend. In fact, boycotts and absenteeism in protest of an attack or a policy have become so common that the parliament now wants to impose fines against those who skip sessions and thus endanger the quorum.

Once, when Mr. Maliki was planning to address the parliament on security matters, an anxious Mr. Mashadani waited two hours for enough members to gather in the parliament hall, and finally canceled the session after citing the lawmakers' "deplorable behavior" -- and then called one member "a dog" for good measure.

Lawmaking has taken a back seat to recriminations. A parliament official recently read aloud a list of 40 bills submitted by the cabinet to the assembly; most of them never left the committees. A key measure aimed at bringing some Sunni extremists into the political process fell apart when politicians couldn't agree which groups qualified for inclusion.

One bill that galvanized the parliament's attention was also the most divisive and sectarian issue ever to reach the floor. In October, several Shiite political parties took up a bill that would allow the formation of autonomous regions, a proposal vehemently rejected by Sunnis. The Sunnis, who make up about 20% of Iraq's population and live in landlocked and oil-poor central Iraq, are afraid the majority Shiites would carve out their own semi-independent enclave in the South where most of Iraq's oil is concentrated. Combined with the existing Kurdish region in the north, it would leave Sunnis with no natural resources.

Sunni parties lobbied frantically to derail the bill, striking a tactical alliance with Mr. Sadr's movement. Although a Shiite, Mr. Sadr is an Iraqi nationalist opposed to any federal division of the country. Observers were surprised to see hardline Sunni lawmakers and Mr. Sadr's deputies -- who usually don't agree on anything -- huddle in the hallways. In the end, though, the federalism bill passed by a narrow margin, widening the gulf between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The law is a recipe for dividing Iraq," says Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leading Sunni legislator who last week was involved in a televised argument in parliament that led to the Jew comment. In fact, he adds now, the Shiites are treating Sunnis even worse than they would treat Jews -- and claims the Shiites inflated the death toll of last week's massive bombings in Sadr city to demonize the Sunnis.

Jalaladdin al-Sagheer, a prominent Shiite deputy in parliament, says Mr. Dulaimi personifies everything that is wrong with the Sunni political leadership. "I don't want to say that he's sectarian, but he always talks only about his own sect," he says.

Iraq And The Facts Of Life (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

At this point it is hard to tell who is more out of touch: President Bush, who continues to insist that Iraq has not descended into civil war, or Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who appears to believe that Americans will prop him up indefinitely.

When the two sit down in Jordan, we hope they will use the time — finally — to impress on each other the brutal facts of life in their respective capitals.

Mr. Bush needs to make clear that Americans' patience has all but run out and that he will start bringing the troops home unless Mr. Maliki moves to rein in sectarian bloodletting and Iraqi troops start shouldering more of the burden. Mr. Maliki needs to make Mr. Bush understand Iraq's full desperation — and his own desperate political weakness. So long as Baghdad remains in chaos — and militias are better armed and more motivated than the Iraqi Army — he has no chance of ending the blood feuds or breaking the cycle of retribution.

This sort of truth-telling does not come easily to either man, and at this point there may not be anything that can salvage Iraq. But more denial and drift will only lead to more chaos. The very fact that the meeting is being held in Jordan — explanations range from concerns about safety in Iraq to the White House's desire to pry Mr. Maliki away from his more unsavory backers — should leave no doubt about the urgent need for a change in strategy.

Mr. Bush needs to start by giving the Iraqi leader a clear deadline for beginning national reconciliation talks, preferably as soon as Mr. Maliki returns to Baghdad. And he should insist that the talks continue until some agreement is reached on protecting minority rights, equitably dividing the country's oil wealth, and demobilizing sectarian militias. Mr. Bush does not need to insult Mr. Maliki by barking out orders. But he does need to make clear that he can hold off demands for an American withdrawal for only so long.

Mr. Bush should not be the only demander. Reconciliation talks will go nowhere until Iraqis see evidence that there is at least some hope for a better life. Mr. Maliki needs to give his own deadline to the Americans for launching a truly make-or-break campaign to retake the streets of Baghdad.

Mr. Maliki also needs to tell Mr. Bush that the American training of the Iraqi Army is failing, and without a more aggressive program, the army will collapse at the first sign the Americans are leaving. And he must warn that Mr. Bush's insistence on talking only to friends won't halt meddling by Iran and Syria.

King Abdullah II of Jordan, who will play host to the meetings, is warning that unless something drastic happens soon, the Middle East will face three full-blown civil wars: in the Palestinian territories, Lebanon and Iraq. If Iraq's desperate reality is not enough to inspire Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki to tell each other the truth, perhaps a look into that wider abyss will.

Bush Declines To Call Situation In Iraq Civil War (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 28 — On the eve of a high-profile trip to Jordan to meet Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, President Bush on Tuesday dismissed suggestions that Iraq had descended into civil war, blamed Al Qaeda for the latest wave of sectarian violence and vowed not to withdraw troops "until the mission is complete."

The president's remarks, during a swing through the Baltics that took him from Tallinn, Estonia, on Tuesday morning to Riga for a NATO summit meeting, were his first on Iraq since a series of bombs killed more than 200 people in a Shiite district of Baghdad on Thursday. It was the deadliest attack since the American invasion in 2003, and it was followed by bloody Shiite reprisals.

At a morning news conference with President Toomas Hendrik Ilves of Estonia, Mr. Bush, making the first visit to Estonia by a sitting United States president, characterized talk of civil war in Iraq as "all kinds of speculation." Foreshadowing his message to Mr. Maliki, he said he would press the Iraqi prime minister to lay out a strategy for stopping the killings.

"My questions to him will be: 'What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?' " Mr. Bush said. "I will assure him that we will continue to pursue Al Qaeda to make sure that they do not establish a safe haven in Iraq."

Mr. Bush is in Riga to talk about the other war — Afghanistan — which tops the NATO agenda. The alliance, which was formed to protect Europe, now has 32,000 troops in Afghanistan. But Mr. Bush wants NATO to commit more troops to the southern region of that country, to fend off a resurgence by the Taliban. In a speech at Latvia University, the president warned that terrorists, drug traffickers and warlords "remain active and committed to destroying democracy in Afghanistan."

Yet Iraq, not Afghanistan, is dominating the president's time, casting as heavy a shadow here as it does at home. Democrats, who are about to take control of Congress after midterm elections that were widely viewed as a referendum on the war, are pressing for a phased withdrawal of troops, but Mr. Bush held firm against that.

"We'll continue to be flexible, and we will make the changes necessary to succeed," he said in Riga. "But there's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

In part, Mr. Bush is laying the foundation to push back against a high-level bipartisan commission, which has been meeting in Washington behind closed doors to review Iraq strategy. Though the panel is reportedly divided on the issue of withdrawal, it is widely expected to recommend greater United States engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, two nations the White House has shunned.

Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he intended to leave such talks to Iraq, "a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy."

On Wednesday, after lunch with his fellow NATO heads of state, Mr. Bush is scheduled to leave for Amman, Jordan, for two days of meetings with Mr. Maliki. Experts say that the president must walk a fine line, reassuring Mr. Maliki while making clear that American patience may wear thin if the prime minister does not tamp down the violence so Iraqis can assume greater responsibility for securing their country.

"They're probably a little worried right now that if Maliki and others think maybe it's only a matter of time before the administration gets out, the last thing they are going to do is go after militias, because the militias are what they need for protection," said Dennis Ross, a former Middle East envoy for the Clinton and first Bush administrations.

But while Mr. Bush suggested he would lean on Mr. Maliki, White House officials were careful to say the president would not deliver any ultimatums.

"I think Maliki would be the first person to say he has not produced the kind of results he would like to have produced," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, told reporters, adding: "There is a lot of discussion about pushing Maliki. Maliki is doing a lot of pushing himself."

The president and Mr. Maliki appear to be at odds on the cause of the recent bombings. Mr. Maliki has called them "the reflection of political backgrounds" and has said that "the crisis is political." But instead of citing Shiite and Sunni militias on Tuesday, Mr. Bush placed blame on Al Qaeda.

"There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place," Mr. Bush said, "fomented in my opinion because of the attacks by Al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal."

As the cycle of violence continues, officials outside the United States are warning that Iraq is verging on civil war. King Abdullah II of Jordan told ABC News on Tuesday that "something dramatic" must be done, and Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, told reporters on Monday that the region would face civil war "unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation."

But Mr. Bush, well aware that a label of civil war would make the Iraq mission even more difficult to justify, brushed aside that question on Tuesday.

"There's all kinds of speculation about what may or may not be happening," he said in Estonia, adding, "No question, it's tough."

White House Wages War Of Words Over 'Civil' Term (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The carnage in Iraq is "sectarian violence," President Bush says. It's a "struggle for freedom," the "central front in the war on terror." It is not, no matter how much it may look like it, a civil war.

Forget the debate over what to do about the war in Iraq. The White House is still debating what to call the war in Iraq. With retired generals, analysts, politicians and pundits increasingly using the term "civil war," the Bush administration insists that the definition does not fit as part of its latest effort to control the words of war.

To people dying in the streets of Sadr City, it may be just semantics. But the White House fiercely resists the phrase out of fear of its impact in both Iraq and the United States. Defining it as civil war, some strategists worry, could accelerate the conflict and encourage Iraqi factions that remain on the sidelines to join the struggle. And acknowledging that it has become a civil war, they fear, could collapse the already weak support for the mission among Americans.

But the risk for the White House, analysts said, is that once again it will appear out of touch with reality over there and with public perception here at home. For months after the invasion of Iraq, the administration denied there was an insurgency. Then it resisted the notion that there was sectarian violence. Now polls show that about two-thirds of the American public think that Iraq is mired in civil war.

"If they can't characterize what's going on in Iraq in an honest fashion, we can't begin to address the problem," retired Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, who led troops in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, said in an interview.

Asked about the matter at a news conference in Estonia yesterday, Bush skirted the issue and focused attention on al-Qaeda's role. "No question, it's tough," he said. "No question about it. There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of these attacks by al-Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal."

White House press secretary Tony Snow rejected the term "civil war" on Monday because "you have not yet had a situation . . . where you have two clearly defined and opposing groups vying not only for power but for territory."

The issue of terminology has arisen periodically for months, especially since the February bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra touched off round after round of attacks between the once-dominant minority Sunnis and the majority Shiites who now control the government. The debate has flared more intensely in recent days amid the bloodiest assaults of the war in the Shiite slum of Baghdad known as Sadr City. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan warned Monday that when it comes to civil war, "we are almost there."

The decision by NBC News on Monday to use the term despite White House objections prompted a fresh examination by many in Washington about the nature of the conflict. As MSNBC began flashing the logo "Iraq: The Civil War," other news organizations staked out positions. The Los Angeles Times noted that it has been calling the violence a civil war since October. The New York Times said it will use the term, though sparingly. The Associated Press said it is still debating the issue, while The Washington Post has made no policy.

The Random House unabridged dictionary defines a civil war as "a war between political factions or regions within the same country." Scholars often further refine that to those conflicts that take at least 1,000 lives. Those who argue that Iraq does not qualify say that a true civil war involves organized military units contesting for territory on behalf of competing governments or quasi-governments.

"In American history, in the Civil War, you had borders and you had two sides," said Michael Ledeen, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "I don't see anything like that. There's lots of people killing lots of other people, yes. Why not call it a terror war? That seems to cover it."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said Bush would rather frame it in the terrorism context to preserve public support. "If it's a civil war and only a small portion of it involves al-Qaeda operatives, then it's suddenly not the central front in the war on terror, it's a struggle by Iraqis for political power," he said. "That means the rationales for this are severely undercut."

Polls suggest that most Americans have already settled this debate in their minds -- 61 percent of those surveyed in September by NBC News and the Wall Street Journal described the situation in Iraq as a civil war, while 65 percent agreed in a CNN poll and 72 percent in a Gallup poll. Of those who described the conflict as "out of control" and a "civil war" in a later Gallup-USA Today poll, 84 percent called U.S. involvement a mistake, compared with 25 percent of those who did not view the situation that way.

"There's a good deal of research to suggest that the American public is less willing to use troops to intervene in other countries' civil wars than in humanitarian-type missions," said Christopher F. Gelpi, a Duke University scholar who has studied public opinion in wartime. "So even if the facts on the ground are the same . . . the label used has a substantial effect on public opinion. That's why they're fighting over it."

Language also has the power to influence events in Iraq, where leaders engage in a similar debate. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," former prime minister Ayad Allawi said as far back as eight months ago. But the current prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, adamantly rejects the term, and analysts said his fragile government risks collapsing if it accepts the premise.

"There is a very tenuous and very weak hold on legitimacy," said Peter Khalil, a Eurasia Group consultant who served as a U.S. security adviser in Iraq. "If they were to admit that, then that last strand gets unraveled. You're not far off from falling off the ledge."

Kurt M. Campbell, a Pentagon official in the Clinton administration, said many key players in Iraq have not engaged in violence but could decide to weigh in if they think the conflict has evolved into an all-out struggle for power -- which means the Iraqis and Americans have a legitimate reason to fear the disputed phrase.

"It may trigger the thing you're trying to forestall," he said. "It's not simply a matter of political correctness and trying to avoid harsh reaction." But Campbell, who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said it may soon be too late. "Where we're at right now is so close to all-out civil unrest that in the next few weeks if it continues the way it's going, it'll be all but unavoidable."

Bush Says U.S. Won't Withdraw From Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 29, 2006

Under intense pressure to change course, President Bush on Tuesday rejected suggestions Iraq has fallen into civil war and vowed not to pull U.S. troops out "until the mission is complete."

At the opening of a NATO summit, Bush also urged allies to increase their forces in Afghanistan to confront a strengthening Taliban insurgency.

On the eve of his visit to Jordan for meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush portrayed the battles in both Afghanistan and Iraq as central fronts in a war "against the extremists who desire safe havens and are willing to kill innocents anywhere to achieve their objectives."

The stakes in Iraq are huge for Bush. His war policies were repudiated in U.S. midterm elections that handed control of Congress to Democrats. A bipartisan blue-ribbon panel is about to issue a report proposing changes in the administration's approach in Iraq. And al-Maliki's government itself sometimes seems to be at cross purposes with Washington.

Bush set the stage for the Jordan talks with a speech at the NATO summit here and at an earlier news conference in neighboring Estonia. The president said he was flexible and eager to hear al-Maliki's ideas on how to ease the violence.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do, I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," Bush declared in his speech. There are about 140,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

Earlier, speaking with reporters in Tallinn during a joint news conference with Estonia's president, Bush would not debate whether Iraq had fallen into civil war and blamed the increasing bloodshed on a pattern of sectarian violence that he said was set in motion last winter by al-Qaida followers.

"I'm going to bring this subject up, of course, with Prime Minister Maliki," Bush said. "My questions to him will be: What do you need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?"

Bush said he realized that "no question it's dangerous there, and violent. And the Maliki government is going to have to deal with that violence, and we want to help them do so."

Bush has been coming under increasing pressure, both overseas and at home, to reach out more to other countries, particularly to Syria and Iran to help with a solution in Iraq.

Such a recommendation may be among those issued by the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton. The group is expected to finish its work next month.

Bush has resisted such talks, and he renewed a warning on Tuesday to both Iran and Syria not to meddle in Iraq. Still, al-Maliki's government itself has made overtures to both countries.

"As far as Iraq goes, the Iraqi government is a sovereign government capable of handling its own foreign policies and is in the process of doing so," Bush said in Tallinn.

Later, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said that Bush and al-Maliki have "a relationship of candor."

"A lot of discussion has been about (Bush) pushing Maliki. Maliki has done a lot of pushing himself," Hadley said. "There has been a coordinated effort between the Iraqi government and allied forces to get greater control. ... It has not produced satisfactory progress in a satisfactory timeframe."

Meanwhile, in Washington, House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Bush must work with Democrats on stopping the violence in Iraq.

"We want to work in a bipartisan way to settle this," Pelosi said. "If the president persists on the course that he is on, that will be more difficult."

In Riga, Bush pressed many of the 26 NATO allies to do more to marshal resources and troops in Afghanistan, particularly in the volatile south.

Bush said the Afghanistan mission — which has mobilized over 32,000 troops_ is NATO's top operation and defeating Taliban forces "will require the full commitment of our alliance."

"The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," he said.

Bush met individually with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and joined other leaders in attending a working dinner.

Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, said that Bush brought up a need for "additional defense capabilities and additional defense spending" in the meeting with the secretary-general and also intended to discuss it at the dinner.

In both Baltic countries, Bush on Tuesday saluted their persistence in eventually prevailing over Soviet occupiers, and he said it was a good example for both Afghanistan and Iraq.

Bush: No Troop Pullouts Until Mission 'complete' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia — President Bush begins two days of meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki today aimed at easing sectarian violence in Iraq. He remains insistent that U.S. troops will not leave the war-torn country "before the mission is complete."

Speaking here before a NATO summit on Afghanistan, Bush said Tuesday that his goals for the meetings in Jordan with al-Maliki and local host King Abdullah II are to learn more about the situation on the ground in Iraq and the efforts to transfer more responsibility to Iraqi security forces.

"We'll continue to be flexible, and we'll make the changes necessary to succeed," he said. "But there is one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

The president urged NATO allies to support anti-terrorism efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, where the security alliance has 32,000 troops. Bush also urged allies to contribute resources to the NATO forces fighting the resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan.

Earlier at a news conference in Estonia, Bush blamed al-Qaeda for the strife in Iraq. He traced it back to the February bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, which sparked attacks and reprisals between the Shiite majority and Sunni minority.

Bush said he plans to ask al-Maliki how his country can seize control of its own future.

"I will assure him that we will continue to pursue al-Qaeda to make sure that they (al-Maliki's government) establish a safe haven in Iraq," Bush said during a news conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves.

The president also declined to call the rising violence in Iraq a civil war. United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Abdullah have suggested Iraq is headed in that direction.

Bush also suggested the United States will not negotiate with Iran and Syria to support Iraq, in part because Iraqi officials are already doing so. The administration has said it wants other nearby nations, such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt, to work with all the factions in Iraq to end the violence.

"We want Iraq's neighbors to help the Maliki government in its efforts to promote reconciliation and stabilize the country, and this includes encouraging Iraqis, Sunnis and others, to participate in their political process and support the new government," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, billed the Jordan meetings as listening sessions. Among those with the president's ear: a panel, headed by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, that will make its Iraq recommendations next month.

"Everybody knows where we want to get," Hadley said. "The question is, can you get there in a way that will ensure that Iraqis really are able to control and provide for their own security."

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi told the Associated Press that Democrats are willing to work with Bush on Iraq, but "if the president persists on the course that he is on, that will be more difficult."

Bush Deflects Questions About Civil War In Iraq (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia - President Bush said Tuesday that he intended to press Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki this week for a plan to stem growing sectarian violence and a strategy for how the country will sustain and govern itself.

On the eve of his initial meeting with al-Maliki in Jordan, the president blamed the escalating violence on an al-Qaida plot aimed at fueling sectarian fighting, and he placed responsibility for ending it largely on al-Maliki's shoulders.

"No question it's dangerous there, and violent," Bush said at a news conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik during a stop in Tallinn, Estonia. "And the Maliki government is going to have to deal with that violence, and we want to help them to do so."

Although Washington is boiling with expectations that the new Democratic Congress and a blue-ribbon bipartisan commission soon will push Bush toward a plan for phased withdrawal from Iraq, the president gave no sign of that Tuesday. He vowed again that U.S. troops will stay until the mission is complete, and shrugged off talk of negotiating with Syria and Iran for help in calming Iraq.

His remarks about al-Maliki came before his arrival at Riga, Latvia, where he's attending a two-day North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit. The NATO agenda centers on improving the organization's ability to battle 21st-century security threats, but most of the talk in Riga has been about deteriorating security in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraq lately has experienced the worst bloodshed since U.S.-led forces invaded in March 2003. Last week's bombings killed at least 160 people and wounded more than 200. More than 3,700 Iraqis were killed in October, the highest monthly death toll since the war began. The spike in violence prompted United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan to say Monday that Iraq is close to civil war - and many independent authorities say it's already civil war.

Bush rejected that conclusion. Tuesday he blamed Iraq's worsening violence on al-Qaida.

"You know, the plans of Mr. Zarqawi was to foment sectarian violence," he said, referring to the late Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who led the group al-Qaida in Iraq until a U.S. airstrike killed him last June. "The Samarra bombing that took place last winter was intended to create sectarian violence, and it has. The recent bombings were to perpetuate the sectarian violence. In other words, we've been in this phase for a while."

The bombing of the al-Askari mosque in Samarra last February did spark a surge in sectarian violence, but it's not known whether al-Zarqawi was responsible for it. In addition, sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has been a condition of life in Iraq for centuries. It exploded out of control again after the removal of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship left a vacuum of power, and U.S.-led occupation forces failed to fill it with enough troops to restrain the violence.

Bush promised to be flexible with his Iraq strategy, changing it as conditions there change - but he vowed that U.S. troops would stay as long as necessary.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said during a speech at Latvia University's Grand Hall. "We can accept nothing less than victory for our children and our grandchildren."

He framed the stakes as a struggle throughout the Middle East between forces of terrorism and freedom, and warned that if the terrorists win, they could pose "a mortal threat to Europe, America and the entire civilized world."

Earlier, in Estonia, Bush had shrugged off talk of negotiating with Syria and Iran toward a solution for Iraq. He said Iran would have to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment program before the United States sat at a negotiating table with it.

"But as far as Iraq goes, the Iraqi government is a sovereign government that is capable of handling its own foreign policies, and is in the process of doing so," he said. "And they have made it abundantly clear - and I agree with them - that the Iranians and Syrians should help, not destabilize this young democracy."

At the NATO summit, Bush turned his attention to Afghanistan, where the 26-nation alliance is struggling to provide security against resurgent Taliban forces. Despite having 40,000 U.S. and NATO-led troops on the ground, Afghanistan this year has experienced the most bloodshed since the 2001 military intervention that toppled the Taliban and drove al-Qaida out of the country.

Bush implored NATO members to provide commanders in Afghanistan with "the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," a veiled reference to the restrictions some countries have placed on how their troops are used in Afghanistan. The restrictions keep some units in the safer northern portion of the country while troops from Canada, the Netherlands and Great Britain endure most of the combat in the south.

Bush claimed that NATO's mission has helped to sustain Afghanistan's fledgling democracy but he warned that "defeating (the enemy) will require the full commitment of our alliance."

In Amman Enemies, And Allies, Await Bush (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 28 — The ink on banners condemning American hegemony was still wet Tuesday as the details of a possible march were being worked out. DVDs of a British movie depicting the assassination of President Bush sold briskly in downtown Amman, while police cordoned off streets in preparation for a security nightmare.

When President Bush arrives here Wednesday to meet with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, there will be no shortage of people seeking to make him feel unwelcome with a decidedly blunt message.

“We want to stress that America’s battle for the hearts and minds of Arabs has failed,” said Zaki Bani Rsheid, director general of the Islamic Action Front, the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood here. “We are raising banners all over Jordan condemning Bush’s visit. It should be self-explanatory why.”

But as many here and throughout the Arab world prepared for Mr. Bush in the halls of power and on the streets of Amman, Iran was foremost on a lot of minds.

“I am here to make sure the mistakes of the past are not repeated,” said Sheik Dhari al-Jirba, of the Iraqi Shummar tribe, who sat in his hotel suite Tuesday pondering what strategy Mr. Bush would present to Mr. Maliki to pursue stability in Iraq.

“We keep hearing they want to bring Iran in, but Iran will come with conditions,” he said. “We don’t want Iran’s conditions to be met at the cost of Iraq and its Sunni neighbors. That is our great fear.”

Mr. Jirba said he planned to meet with Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, and hoped he would have an audience with the president himself. His first demand, he said, would be to say “no” to Iran.

A draft report by an American bipartisan commission studying new strategies for Iraq has urged that the United States open direct talks with Iran and Syria, according to American officials who have seen all or part of the document.

On Monday, the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani, said at a meeting in Iran that his country needed Iran’s help to bring about peace.

Mr. Bush, who will be accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice, is expected to try to enlist Arab leaders to help rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents.

The United States wants moderate Arab governments like those of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan to help drive a wedge between Mr. Maliki and Moktada al Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric whose Mahdi Army has been behind many of the Shiite reprisal attacks in Iraq, senior administration official have said.

But that would require getting those governments to coax moderate Sunni Iraqis to support Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, boosting his ability to take on Mr. Sadr’s Shiite militias. The bipartisan commission would also open a line with Iran and Syria to help secure stability in Iraq.

Yet for many, a resurgent Iran, with or without a nuclear bomb, is a central concern. An opening with Iran, many analysts said, would amount to a loss of face for the Arabs and a striking boost for Iran.

"The one thing scarier to these guys than a powerful Iran is an American deal with Iran," said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director at the International Crisis Group. "That would ratify Iran's dominant position in the Persian Gulf. Iran wants to underscore it is the pre-eminent power in the region, and the U.S. would hand them that."

Despite growing anti-Americanism, Arab governments have been eager to maintain an American presence in the region, fearing Iran would step in where the United States retreated. But a shift on Iran and Syria has caught many by surprise, as the Bush administration goes from "calling them the axis of evil, to considering them as an important element," Emad Gad, a researcher at Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo, said last week.

"The security and stability of the Persian Gulf cannot endure a shaken U.S. image," Mr. Gad said. "When the big bodyguard leaves, they will have to succumb to the little bodyguard, and Iran has military power and has Shiites who could cause problems."

In the Amman suburb of Ruseifa, Abu Mutasim, who described himself as a jihadi and would give only his nickname for fear of arrest, greeted a possible American opening with Iran with optimism. "Iran is the source of all the problems in the Middle East, and now they want to create problems here," he said. "But including them would only be in the interest of the jihadis, because Iraq's Sunnis would quickly shift to Al Qaeda. This would ultimately be in our interests, not against it."

Bush Firm On Iran, Syria Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — As pressure mounts for the United States to seek direct talks on Iraq with Iran and Syria, President Bush appeared Tuesday to rule out any change in his administration's policy toward those Iraqi neighbors.

By reaffirming a long-standing administration policy setting strict conditions on talks with either country, Bush indicated that he may be unwilling to accept an expected recommendation by a bipartisan commission assessing policy options on Iraq.

The commission members have said they want the administration to negotiate with Iraq's neighbors. But Bush said Iran must first agree to international demands that it halt development of its nuclear program.

"Iran knows how to get to the table with us, and that is to do that which they said they would do, which is verifiably suspend their enrichment programs," Bush said Tuesday in Estonia during a trip that will take him to Jordan later this week to meet with Iraq's U.S.-backed leader. "And then we'll be happy to have a dialogue with them."

Bush was less specific about Syria, but gave no hint that he had grown more willing to hold talks with leaders in Damascus.

The Iraq Study Group is meeting this week in Washington to try to reach a bipartisan consensus for a final report expected by the end of the year. Although members agree on the need to negotiate with countries like Iran and Syria, they have been divided on other key issues, including U.S. troop levels.

The 10-member panel, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), was scheduled to meet through Tuesday, but will reconvene today in an effort to reach agreement on a final report.

Although Bush has insisted he will receive the panel's recommendations with an open mind, his views on the possible recommendations have remained unyielding. Other administration officials have joined him in emphasizing the disadvantages of trying to negotiating with Iran or Syria.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley, asked by reporters whether Bush was closing the door on new openings to Damascus or Tehran, reiterated the administration's long-held stance.

"What the president was reaffirming today is we made it very clear we are prepared to talk with Iran, and those conversations clearly begin with the nuclear issue," Hadley said.

Vice President Dick Cheney has repeatedly emphasized the disadvantage of direct engagement with the two governments. And other government officials have in recent days sought to bolster the administration's case by pointing to what they say are efforts by Tehran and Damascus to disrupt the region.

One U.S. official said there was growing apprehension within the government that the Iraq Study Group's recommendations for talks would become "a club that's going to be used to bash the administration."

Although many experts have been advising the study group to prescribe talks, there is wide agreement among hard-liners and pragmatists within the government that the idea "has serious downsides," said the official, discussing internal views on condition of anonymity.

Officials are especially reluctant to make an opening to Damascus at a time when Syria is seen as undermining U.S. goals in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, as well as Iraq, the official said.

Although there may be less opposition to trying to engage Iran, the official noted that the administration had made repeated efforts to engage Tehran, but found them unproductive.

Mitchell B. Reiss, who was the State Department's director of policy planning during Bush's first term, said that the administration was "far from enthusiastic about engaging the Iranians in serious negotiations, and it's completely unclear that the Iranians are serious about engaging the United States, either."

Reiss, who is now vice provost at the College of William and Mary, said he believed it unlikely that such talks would take place in the short term.

"Or if they do, they'll be along the lines of the six-party talks with North Korea — a lot of pomp and circumstance and not much substance to them," he said.

Meanwhile, U.S. intelligence officials have expressed new concern over Iran's role in the spreading violence in Iraq and have leveled new charges against the country's leaders.

Officials on Tuesday cited indications that the Iranian-backed terrorist network, Hezbollah, had sent operatives to Iraq to help train members of Shiite militias. The officials also said that Shiite fighters from Iraq had traveled to Lebanon for training with Hezbollah.

A U.S. military official said that Defense intelligence estimates suggested that as many as 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Al Mahdi army in Iraq had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. But officials at other U.S. intelligence agencies cautioned that the actual numbers were probably significantly lower. U.S. intelligence concern about Hezbollah's role was first reported by the New York Times on Tuesday.

NBC Assailed For Declaration Of 'Civil War' (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

"Civil war" has joined "terrorist" and "undocumented immigrant" in the growing lexicon of terms that prompt press organizations to get touchy about their coverage.

In the name of neutrality, print and broadcast journalists alike have declared moratoriums on words deemed inflammatory or judgmental in the years since the September 11 attacks.

Neutrality might not be the motivation behind NBC's decision to announce that Iraq is now engaged in a civil war, despite statements from the White House to the contrary.

"NBC has decided the change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized a civil war," "Today" show host Matt Lauer said Monday.

"News organizations claim they don't want to be political in their coverage. But this declaration strikes me as very political. This is NBC saying, 'Hey, George Bush is delusional, and we're not going to play along.' That's the tenor of it," Tim Graham of the Media Research Center said yesterday.

"The pomposity of the judgment is also troubling. The network is clearly seeking a tipping point to declare that the U.S. is losing Iraq," Mr. Graham added. "But the phenomenon of selective description is not new. How many papers and networks refused to call Hamas a 'terrorist' group in the past?"

Whether NBC's position resonates with the public remains to be seen.

"Frankly, I don't think that a judgment NBC has made is as remotely important as the actual events on the ground in Iraq," said Alex Jones of Harvard University's Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy.

The network is exercising typical editorial decision-making, Mr. Jones said, "but I don't think it's going to change any minds out there."

Some cast NBC's public declaration as a benchmark that could potentially sway public opinion -- and press outlets themselves.

"Let's cut right to what this 'civil war' fanfare in the media is really all about: It has nothing to do with ongoing violence in Iraq, and everything to do with the fact that these media organizations, struggling to maintain their relevance in a rapidly changing industry feel the need to assert themselves and remind the public of their importance," Stephen Spruiell of National Review Online said yesterday.

An Editor & Publisher survey revealed that reporters and editors at the Los Angeles Times, New York Times, Christian Science Monitor and McClatchy Newspapers are allowed to use the term "civil war," while The Washington Post still opts for "sectarian strife." CNN leaves the hair-splitting decisions to individual editors and reporters. The Associated Press, CBS and ABC are undecided; Fox News has not made its policies public.

It can be a work in progress: Earlier this year, three minority journalism groups asked the American press to avoid terms such as "illegal alien" because it was "dehumanizing," recommending "undocumented worker" or "economic refugee" as less-offensive alternatives.

Bush And Maliki (WSJ)

President Bush is in Jordan today for meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and the most important message the two leaders could send would be to reaffirm their common commitment to their antiterror fight.

That task has clearly been complicated by recent events -- including more blood in Baghdad and the Republican wipeout in Congress caused in part by frustration with the Iraq war. There's also this week's spectacle of the wannabe Walter Cronkites at outlets like NBC News and the Los Angeles Times patting themselves on the back for declaring that the Iraq conflict is a "civil war." Mr. Cronkite is often credited with helping turn public opinion against the war in Vietnam, and today's media point seems to be to declare the war unwinnable, as if this were actually desirable.

To his credit, Mr. Bush refused to give ground to such defeatist rhetoric during meetings with NATO leaders yesterday. No doubt many critics will continue to snicker at his alleged lack of realism, but public confidence is crucial to avoiding disaster in Iraq. We're clearly at a hinge point in Iraq, with Mr. Bush himself saying there's a need for "fresh eyes" and James Baker's Iraq Study Group poised to report next month. Among the policy options being considered are redoubled military efforts against the insurgents and diplomatic outreach to Syria and Iran. But even supporters of reaching out to those regimes must realize that U.S. negotiating leverage will be zero if they sense the U.S. is ready to cut and run.

As for the talks with Mr. Maliki, let's hope Mr. Bush resists the pressure he will face from some Arab leaders (and his own State Department) to push Mr. Maliki to make concessions to Baathist and Sunni Islamist insurgents. Such tactics have been tried a number of times in recent years, with no discernible reduction in the insurgency.

That failure in turn has fed suspicions among the majority Shiites that the U.S. would secretly prefer that Iraq be led by a new Sunni strongman. Jordan's King Abdullah didn't help matters recently by hosting Harith al-Dari of the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars -- a terrorist front group -- only days ahead of the Bush-Maliki summit.

One reassuring sign is that the President fingered Sunni extremists as the root cause of the violence during his press conference yesterday in Estonia: "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal." The point here is to define who the main enemy in Iraq continues to be, and that is the Baathist and al Qaeda insurgents. They are the source of the car bombs that continue to go off in Shiite neighborhoods and that have inspired Shiite reprisals. The undearly departed Musab al-Zarqawi's explicit strategy was to fan such sectarian attacks precisely so the Americans would lose patience and leave.

Mr. Maliki will, in turn, have a far easier time building political support for disarming Shiite militias such as the Mahdi Army once Sunni bombs stop killing Shiites. Mr. Maliki reportedly wants more control over the Iraqi Army and better weaponry to tackle Sunni insurgents, and we hope Mr. Bush listens to what the Prime Minister has to say.

Which brings us back to the alleged "civil war." The term seems to have acquired a totemic meaning in Iraq, although the U.S. has intervened successfully in civil wars before: the Balkans and Afghanistan, most recently. Regarding Iraq, the goal of the "civil war" chorus seems to be to delegitimize the war by painting what is a false picture of the balance of power and legitimacy between the Iraqi government and the terrorists.

The sectarian violence is a horrible problem. But by any reasonable definition, a "civil war" implies at least two militarily strong factions with a popular claim on political leadership. Neither of those conditions exists in Iraq.

The country's elected, pan-sectarian government and its several hundred thousand security forces remain the only legitimate power center. The Sunni insurgents, meanwhile, are a mix of Islamists and Baathists who enjoy little support and are capable only of terrorist-style attacks. They hold sway only through murder and intimidation in areas where the government lacks enough troops to assure public safety. Shiite militia leaders are also divided and what support they enjoy is due to the perception among ordinary Shiites that the government has been unable to protect them. Few Shiites would be eager to see Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical cleric, in Mr. Maliki's chair.

The next Iraqi or American official to be asked about "civil war" might want to reply by asking the journalist who, precisely, is fighting whom, and why Iraqi security officers of all backgrounds continue to risk their lives for the elected Baghdad government. The truth is that the enemies of Mr. Maliki's government are terrorists and thugs. Mr. Bush could help give Mr. Maliki the confidence he needs for the tough fight ahead -- first against the Sunni terrorists, then against the Shiite revenge killers -- by assuring him that U.S. policy will be based on this fact.

Gingrich Calls Iraq War A 'Failure' (BOS)

By James W. Pindell

The Boston Globe, November 29, 2006

BEDFORD, N.H. -- Former House speaker Newt Gingrich told a New Hampshire audience yesterday that unless the Bush administration admits that the war in Iraq is a "failure," it will never develop a strategy to leave the country successfully.

Gingrich, who has been laying the groundwork for a presidential run, said the Bush administration needs to plan a "third stage" in Iraq, following the military takeover stage and the recent democracy-building stage. But he says a third stage can come about only if officials admit they must change course.

"If the military, White House, and State Department continue to avoid the word 'failure,' how can you bring about a third stage?" Gingrich said.

Gingrich was in New Hampshire for three campaign-style events Monday night and yesterday. While the former speaker has expressed interest in a presidential run, he said yesterday that he is more interested in injecting ideas in to the 2008 campaign than in putting his name on the ballot. He said he will not seriously entertain a presidential campaign until September.

Gingrich, who served on a key Pentagon board that advised Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in the runup to the Iraq war, was eager to distance himself from the Bush administration's handling of the war.

He said a show of contrition by the White House would help the president regain the trust of the American people and avoid a quick pullout, which would be disastrous.

The first goal in Iraq, Gingrich said, should be to rebuild the national military, even if it requires spending tantamount to the Marshall Plan effort in the aftermath of World War II, in which the United States spent up to 3 percent of its gross domestic product.

"We have to show we are serious about winning and that we will defeat any person, Sunni or Shi'ite, that hopes to disrupt progress," he said. "But we can only do that if we have Iraqi troops on the ground."

Speaking at various campaign-style events, Gingrich reiterated his belief that the Republican Party's loss of Congress earlier this month was attributable to a failure to follow conservative principles, particularly concerning spending.

On Monday night, Gingrich was the keynote speaker at a First Amendment dinner sponsored by the Union Leader of Manchester, the state's largest and historically conservative newspaper.

Yesterday morning he appeared at the classic New Hampshire primary stop "Politics and Eggs," where he fiercely defended the first-in-the-nation status of the Granite State's presidential primary on the grounds that its small size and engaged electorate make it a forum for a discussion of ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0099265

The former speaker also met privately with David Carney , a New Hampshire-based consultant who was the White House political director during the George H. W. Bush presidency. He wrapped up his visit by addressing 100 Republican legislators and activists at a lunch meeting that was part pep rally and part lecture on how to build a strong party.

The lecture was well-received by Republican leaders.

"He was exactly the right person we needed to hear from," said State Representative George Katsakiores , a Derry Republican.

As Iraq Deteriorates, Iraqis Get More Blame (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Robin Wright

From troops on the ground to members of Congress, Americans increasingly blame the continuing violence and destruction in Iraq on the people most affected by it: the Iraqis.

Even Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the occupation say the people and government of Iraq are not doing enough to rebuild their society. The White House is putting pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have debated how much to blame Iraqis for not performing civic duties.

This marks a shift in tone from earlier debate about the responsibility of the United States to restore order after the 2003 invasion, and it seemed to gain currency in October, when sectarian violence surged. Some see the talk of blame as the beginning of the end of U.S. involvement.

"It is the first manifestation of a 'Who lost Iraq?' argument that will likely rage for years to come," said Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University expert on terrorism who has worked as a U.S. government consultant in Iraq.

Americans and Iraqis are increasingly seeing the situation in different terms, said retired Army Col. Jeffrey D. McCausland , who recently returned from a visit to Iraq. "We're just talking past each other," he said, adding that Americans are psychologically edging toward the door that leads to disengagement. "We're arguing about 'cut and run' versus 'cut and jog.' "

Iraqis' role in their own suffering has been an issue since shortly after the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003, when looters ransacked the national museum and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld dismissed it by saying, "Stuff happens." But more than three years later, with schools and hospitals struggling, electrical service faltering, and police and government agencies infiltrated by sectarian death squads, the question of blame is more urgent.

For example, a Nov. 15 meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee turned into a festival of bipartisan Iraqi-bashing.

"We should put the responsibility for Iraq's future squarely where it belongs -- on the Iraqis," began Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the committee's next chairman. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves." He has advocated announcing that U.S. troops are going to withdraw as a way of pressuring Iraqi politicians to find compromises.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) followed by noting: "People in South Carolina come up to me in increasing numbers and suggest that no matter what we do in Iraq, the Iraqis are incapable of solving their own problems through the political process and will resort to violence, and we need to get the hell out of there."

"We all want them to succeed," agreed Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.). "We all want them to be able to stabilize their country with the assistance that we've provided them." But, he added, "too often they seem unable or unwilling to do that."

Later the same day, members of the House Armed Services Committee took their turn. "If the Iraqis are determined and decide to destroy themselves and their country, I don't know how in the world we're going to stop them," said Rep. Robin Hayes (R-N.C.).

Iraqi Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie said he worries about the growing chorus of official voices blaming Iraq, and suggested that a little introspection on the U.S. side could help.

"I am indeed concerned about this trend," he said in an interview. "The U.S. through its actions and omissions has helped to create the current conditions in Iraq. Therefore the U.S. also bears responsibility in putting right the situation."

It isn't just politicians who have decided that the problem with Iraq is the Iraqis. In the military establishment, said Joseph J. Collins, a professor at the National Defense University, "there is lots of disappointment in the performance of Iraqi officials of all stripes."

Thomas Donnelly, a hawkish defense expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said he considers blame a legitimate issue. "Ultimately, just like success rests with the Iraqis, so does failure," he said. "We've made a lot of mistakes, but we've paid a huge price to give the Iraqis a chance at a decent future."

The blame game has also been playing out somewhat divisively within the secretive Iraq Study Group. The bipartisan commission, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is deliberating policy recommendations to put forward next month.

"I'm tired of nit-picking over how we should bully the Iraqis into becoming better citizens of their own country," former CIA Middle East expert Ray Close wrote in an e-mail to the other advisers to the study group.

Several other experts of various political stripes said this tendency to dump on Baghdad feels like a preamble to withdrawal.

"It's their fault, and by implication not ours, is clearly a theme that's in the air," said retired Army Col. Andrew J. Bacevich, a Vietnam veteran and longtime skeptic of the war in Iraq. It reminds him, he said, of the sour last days of the Vietnam War, when "there was a tendency to blame everything on the 'gooks' -- meaning our South Vietnamese allies who had disappointed us."

"People never understood the culture and the challenges that we faced in trying to build a new Iraq," a senior U.S. intelligence official said. "There's incredible frustration . . . but it also shows a great deal of ignorance."

"Definitely," said Paul Rieckhoff, who served in Iraq as an Army officer in 2003-2004 and went on to found a veterans group critical of the conduct of the war. "It is growing into an angry, scolding tone." He said he finds it "sad" -- "especially after all the talk of our mission to 'save the Iraqis.' "

The long-term effect of blaming Iraqis also could be poisonous, said Juan Cole, a University of Michigan specialist in Middle Eastern issues. He predicted that it will "infuriate the Iraqis and worsen further the future relationship of the two countries."

The turning point in the blame game seems to have occurred in early October, when both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) went public with their frustrations, warning the Baghdad government that it must do much more much faster. Warner suggested that the United States should explore a "change of course" if security had not improved within 90 days.

During a surprise visit to Baghdad on Oct. 5, Rice said with uncharacteristic bluntness that the security situation was not helped by "political inaction."

The Bush administration hoped the long-delayed formation of a government, which took about five months after the Dec. 15 election last year, would produce more initiative by Baghdad. But the security and political situation continued to deteriorate, so the administration increased the pressure on Maliki's government. Over the past three months, U.S. officials and foreign diplomats said, senior U.S. military and administration officials visiting Baghdad have conveyed the same message: Get on with it.

"Our role is not to resolve those issues for them," Rice told reporters last month after pressing Maliki to be bolder about disbanding militias and reconciling sectarian differences. "They are going to have to resolve those issues among themselves."

Blaming Iraqis for the woeful situation disregards recent history, some experts argue. Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert and adviser to the Iraq Study Group, calculates that because of policy missteps and other errors, the United States bears about 60 percent of the blame. "You can't say, 'We did this and the Iraqis didn't rise to the occasion,' " she said. "There's enough blame to go around."

U.S. Troop Levels In Iraq Stymie Panel (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

Members of an independent commission on Iraq policy could not reach a consensus Tuesday on how many or how long U.S. troops should remain in Iraq, forcing the group to return for a third day of debate, according to an official close to the panel's negotiations.

Panel members mostly made no comment as they left the Woodrow Wilson Center on Tuesday afternoon. But Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff to President Clinton, hinted at some struggles, telling reporters, "Trying, trying to find a ... trying to find consensus. ... It goes up and down."

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel created to recommend changes in U.S. war policy, is having difficulties reaching agreement on what the appropriate level of U.S. troops should be in Iraq, whether there should be a phased withdrawal, and if so, under what time frame, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the panel's deliberations are private.

A second official has said that the commission was unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but that some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal, an idea that has been pushed by many congressional Democrats.

The first official said Tuesday that the group was still struggling over whether to set a hard deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces or if there should be any short-term increase in troops as the U.S. works to train and build up Iraq's security forces. There are currently about 139,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

The questions are key to the U.S. future policy in Iraq following the November election in which Democrats swept control of the House and Senate largely due to voters discontent with the progress of the war.

Leaving the daylong meeting Tuesday afternoon, members of the panel, which is headed by former Republican Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, played down any divisions among the diverse group.

"It's a good group to work with, let's just put it that way," said Panetta, as he emerged with Vernon Jordan, who was a Clinton adviser, and former Republican Sen. Alan Simpson of Wyoming.

The group was initially expected to wrap up their deliberations Tuesday. People close to the commission said they expect the panel to issue a bipartisan, consensus report some time next month.

Officials have said a consensus report is the group's goal, rather than having the panel issue one that suggests two divergent opinions with no clear recommended path.

Panel members are also expected to urge the Bush administration to reach out to Iran and Syria, as part of an effort to get regional governments involved in stabilizing Iraq.

Bush, attending a NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, renewed his pledge Tuesday not to pull U.S. troops out "until the mission is complete." He also repeated a warning to both Iran and Syria not to meddle in Iraq.

Stepping Into Iraq (WP)

By Nawaf Obaid

In February 2003, a month before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, warned President Bush that he would be "solving one problem and creating five more" if he removed Saddam Hussein by force. Had Bush heeded his advice, Iraq would not now be on the brink of full-blown civil war and disintegration.

One hopes he won't make the same mistake again by ignoring the counsel of Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, who said in a speech last month that "since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited." If it does, one of the first consequences will be massive Saudi intervention to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis.

Over the past year, a chorus of voices has called for Saudi Arabia to protect the Sunni community in Iraq and thwart Iranian influence there. Senior Iraqi tribal and religious figures, along with the leaders of Egypt, Jordan and other Arab and Muslim countries, have petitioned the Saudi leadership to provide Iraqi Sunnis with weapons and financial support. Moreover, domestic pressure to intervene is intense. Major Saudi tribal confederations, which have extremely close historical and communal ties with their counterparts in Iraq, are demanding action. They are supported by a new generation of Saudi royals in strategic government positions who are eager to see the kingdom play a more muscular role in the region.

Because King Abdullah has been working to minimize sectarian tensions in Iraq and reconcile Sunni and Shiite communities, because he gave President Bush his word that he wouldn't meddle in Iraq (and because it would be impossible to ensure that Saudi-funded militias wouldn't attack U.S. troops), these requests have all been refused. They will, however, be heeded if American troops begin a phased withdrawal from Iraq. As the economic powerhouse of the Middle East, the birthplace of Islam and the de facto leader of the world's Sunni community (which comprises 85 percent of all Muslims), Saudi Arabia has both the means and the religious responsibility to intervene.

Just a few months ago it was unthinkable that President Bush would prematurely withdraw a significant number of American troops from Iraq. But it seems possible today, and therefore the Saudi leadership is preparing to substantially revise its Iraq policy. Options now include providing Sunni military leaders (primarily ex-Baathist members of the former Iraqi officer corps, who make up the backbone of the insurgency) with the same types of assistance -- funding, arms and logistical support -- that Iran has been giving to Shiite armed groups for years.

Another possibility includes the establishment of new Sunni brigades to combat the Iranian-backed militias. Finally, Abdullah may decide to strangle Iranian funding of the militias through oil policy. If Saudi Arabia boosted production and cut the price of oil in half, the kingdom could still finance its current spending. But it would be devastating to Iran, which is facing economic difficulties even with today's high prices. The result would be to limit Tehran's ability to continue funneling hundreds of millions each year to Shiite militias in Iraq and elsewhere.

Both the Sunni insurgents and the Shiite death squads are to blame for the current bloodshed in Iraq. But while both sides share responsibility, Iraqi Shiites don't run the risk of being exterminated in a civil war, which the Sunnis clearly do. Since approximately 65 percent of Iraq's population is Shiite, the Sunni Arabs, who make up a mere 15 to 20 percent, would have a hard time surviving any full-blown ethnic cleansing campaign.

What's clear is that the Iraqi government won't be able to protect the Sunnis from Iranian-backed militias if American troops leave. Its army and police cannot be relied on to do so, as tens of thousands of Shiite militiamen have infiltrated their ranks. Worse, Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, cannot do anything about this, because he depends on the backing of two major leaders of Shiite forces.

There is reason to believe that the Bush administration, despite domestic pressure, will heed Saudi Arabia's advice. Vice President Cheney's visit to Riyadh last week to discuss the situation (there were no other stops on his marathon journey) underlines the preeminence of Saudi Arabia in the region and its importance to U.S. strategy in Iraq. But if a phased troop withdrawal does begin, the violence will escalate dramatically.

In this case, remaining on the sidelines would be unacceptable to Saudi Arabia. To turn a blind eye to the massacre of Iraqi Sunnis would be to abandon the principles upon which the kingdom was founded. It would undermine Saudi Arabia's credibility in the Sunni world and would be a capitulation to Iran's militarist actions in the region.

To be sure, Saudi engagement in Iraq carries great risks -- it could spark a regional war. So be it: The consequences of inaction are far worse.

Ten Months Or Ten Years (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

Here is the central truth about Iraq today: This country is so broken it can't even have a proper civil war.

There are so many people killing so many other people for so many different reasons — religion, crime, politics — that all the proposals for how to settle this problem seem laughable. It was possible to settle Bosnia's civil war by turning the country into a loose federation, because the main parties to that conflict were reasonably coherent, with leaders who could cut a deal and deliver their faction.

But Iraq is in so many little pieces now, divided among warlords, foreign terrorists, gangs, militias, parties, the police and the army, that nobody seems able to deliver anybody. Iraq has entered a stage beyond civil war — it's gone from breaking apart to breaking down. This is not the Arab Yugoslavia anymore. It's Hobbes's jungle.

Given this, we need to face our real choices in Iraq, which are: 10 months or 10 years. Either we just get out of Iraq in a phased withdrawal over 10 months, and try to stabilize it some other way, or we accept the fact that the only way it will not be a failed state is if we start over and rebuild it from the ground up, which would take 10 years. This would require reinvading Iraq, with at least 150,000 more troops, crushing the Sunni and Shiite militias, controlling borders, and building Iraq's institutions and political culture from scratch.

Anyone who tells you that we can just train a few more Iraqi troops and police officers and then slip out in two or three years is either lying or a fool. The minute we would leave, Iraq would collapse. There is nothing we can do by the end of the Bush presidency that would produce a self-sustaining stable Iraq — and "self-sustaining" is the key metric.

In his must-read new book about the impact of culture on politics and economic development, "The Central Liberal Truth," Lawrence Harrison notes that some cultures are "progress-prone" and others are "progress- resistant." In the Arab-Muslim world today the progress-resistant cultural forces seem to be just too strong, especially in Iraq, which is why it is so hard to establish durable democratic institutions in that soil, he says.

"Some may hark back to our successful imposition of democracy on West Germany and Japan after World War II," adds Mr. Harrison. "But the people on whom democracy was imposed in those two countries were highly literate and entrepreneurial members of unified, institutionalized societies with strong traditions of association — what we refer to today as 'social capital.' Iraq was social capital-poor to start with and it now verges on bankruptcy."

On Feb. 12, 2003, before the war, I wrote a column offering what I called my "pottery store" rule for Iraq: "You break it, you own it." It was not an argument against the war, but rather a cautionary note about the need to do it with allies, because transforming Iraq would be such a huge undertaking. (Colin Powell later picked up on this and used the phrase to try to get President Bush to act with more caution, but Mr. Bush did not heed Mr. Powell's advice.)

But my Pottery Barn rule was wrong, because Iraq was already pretty broken before we got there — broken, it seems, by 1,000 years of Arab-Muslim authoritarianism, three brutal decades of Sunni Baathist rule, and a crippling decade of U.N. sanctions. It was held together only by Saddam's iron fist. Had we properly occupied the country, and begun political therapy, it is possible an American iron fist could have held Iraq together long enough to put it on a new course. But instead we created a vacuum by not deploying enough troops.

That vacuum was filled by murderous Sunni Baathists and Al Qaeda types, who butchered Iraqi Shiites until they finally wouldn't take it any longer and started butchering back, which brought us to where we are today. The Sunni Muslim world should hang its head in shame for the barbarism it has tolerated and tacitly supported by the Sunnis of Iraq, whose violence, from the start, has had only one goal: America must fail in its effort to bring progressive politics or democracy to this region. America must fail — no matter how many Iraqis have to be killed, America must fail.

This has left us with two impossible choices. If we're not ready to do what is necessary to crush the dark forces in Iraq and properly rebuild it, then we need to leave — because to just keep stumbling along as we have been makes no sense. It will only mean throwing more good lives after good lives into a deeper and deeper hole filled with more and more broken pieces.

Plumb Out Of Mission (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The meaning of the election was clear for all to see: The people plainly believed that the unified, pluralistic Iraq that the Bush administration insisted was growing stronger with each passing day actually had no future at all.

There's no other way to interpret the vote for the first Iraqi National Assembly, held one year ago, in December 2005. Overwhelmingly, Iraqis voted their sect rather than their nation. The Shiites, who constitute roughly 60 percent of Iraq's population, voted for Shiite parties, which now control roughly 60 percent of the National Assembly. The Sunnis and the Kurds voted for their own parties, too.

There was, to be sure, a national unity slate, a coalition of nonsectarian parties headed by former prime minister Ayad Allawi. It pulled down 8 percent of the vote.

For a moment, the U.S. government seemed to understand what the election meant. "It looks as if people have preferred to vote for their ethnic or sectarian identities," said Zalmay Khalilzad, our harried proconsul (okay, ambassador) in Baghdad. "But for Iraq to succeed there has to be cross-ethnic and cross-sectarian cooperation."

But if Iraqis had wanted Iraq to succeed, they would have voted for Allawi. Iraq, it turns out, was not the name of their desire, or their fear. And the civil war that has been growing relentlessly more horrifying since the election is ultimately just the continuation of their politics by other means.

Which is why the parallels to Vietnam are way too optimistic. In Vietnam, at least the United States could identify a government and some genuinely anti-communist constituencies with which it was plainly allied. But with whom do we stand, and who stands with us, in Iraq? Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki heads a Shiite-dominated government that grows closer to Iran and that is propped up by Moqtada al-Sadr, whose militia is the most powerful force in the country other than the U.S. Army, which Sadr has called on to leave Iraq forthwith.

As for the Sunni minority, it's among that group that the insurgency against both the U.S. occupation and the string of post-Hussein governments took root. At first the number of insurgents was relatively small, but as the Shiite-controlled police force joined the Shiite militias in anti-Sunni pogroms, the number of Sunnis taking up arms ballooned.

So -- which side are we on?

In the face of escalating civil war, of an increasingly Hobbesian conflict of each against all, the calls still coming from the U.S. military, the administration and Capitol Hill to step up our training of Iraqi forces seem light-years off the mark. The problem with Iraqi security isn't that Iraqi forces are poorly trained. It's that, like the rest of their countrymen, like the very government whose uniform they wear, they're not really invested in fighting for a unified, nonsectarian Iraq. Why do we expect them to defend an ideal that their countrymen either never believed in or were compelled to abandon under pressure of civil war?

But on matters Iraqi, much of the Beltway -- and not just the administration -- remains impervious to fact. "We've got to get the Iraqi army and police better equipped, better trained and into the fight," retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey declared recently. "And I think we've got 24 months." The police, of course, are already into the fight, many of them working with Shiite militias to execute Sunnis. They are, from any dispassionate perspective, proficient enough. Train them for 24 months and they will be the terror of the Earth.

We have plumb run out of mission in Iraq. We have enemies galore, but, other than the Kurds, precious few friends. We defend the idea of Iraq in the absence of Iraqis willing to do the same. We are at best a buffer -- unable to deter the daily atrocities but ensuring by our presence that they won't grow cataclysmically worse. Since we cannot deter the sectarian polarization, however, the cataclysm will follow our leave-taking whether it comes sooner or later.

Those who argue that we should send more troops (as if we had them) to Iraq, or train more Iraqis, or stay until the situation stabilizes should at least explain how the situation will stabilize, how nation-building will work in a nation that doesn't want to be built. We should, as George Packer has argued, rescue as many individual Iraqis as we possibly can on our way out. But rescuing Iraq from the forces we unleashed is plainly beyond us.

Or we could, I suppose, wait it out. About 100,000 Iraqis now flee the country every month for Syria or Jordan. At that rate, if we just hang on for 20 years, Iraq will be completely depopulated. The insurgency will be vanquished; sectarian strife will subside. Victory will be ours, and we can go home.

America Doesn't Cut And Run . . . (WSJ)

By Amir Taheri

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

The meeting in Jordan this week between George W. Bush and Nouri al-Maliki could be their last opportunity to develop a joint strategy on Iraq. President Bush, entering his lame-duck phase with Congress controlled by political adversaries, may see his influence in shaping policy diminish. Prime Minister Maliki risks being forced from office, pressured by domestic rivals and

Iranian mullahs who resent his emphasis on "uruqa" (Iraqi identity) rather than Shiism. In this context, what Messrs. Bush and Maliki tell each other assumes the utmost importance.

The last time the two leaders met, Mr. Bush promised a U.S. commitment until Iraq could defend itself against domestic and foreign foes, even hinting at measures that would guarantee the vow under the next administration. He is no longer in a position to offer as much. Still, Mr. Maliki ought to ask for a reassertion of American commitment, the most effective weapon against the Saddamist and al Qaeda terrorists in Iraq. At the end of this year, the mission of the U.S.-led multinational force, under a U.N. mandate, will end. Mr. Maliki should ask that it be extended for three years -- that is, until the next general election in Iraq.

While Iraq continues to need a U.S. and allied presence, the country is putting the final touches on a plan under which the army and police assume responsibility for security in all 18 provinces before the end of 2007. (This is already the case in five provinces, with two more slated to be handed over before the end of the year.) Mr. Maliki might also ask for renewed support for the Iraqi army, which the president has often praised, but to which his administration has been reluctant to give the vote of confidence it deserves.

In addition to a lack of modern equipment, the army has virtually no logistics -- without U.S. forces, it would have to hire taxis to reach any battlefield. Too few American and other allied officers and NCOs are seconded to the army. Iraq also faces a desperate shortage of officers. At the current rate of training it might need another 10 years to reach its targets.

There is also talk of approaching some of the enemies of the U.S., notably Iran and Syria, in the hope of getting their help in ending the violence in Iraq. Mr. Maliki must demand that Mr. Bush reject such talk. Suspicions that the U.S. might try to hand Iraq over to Iran would incite Iraqi nationalists against the very democratic process he wishes to defend. Mr. Maliki might suggest: Instead of talking to enemies, why not talk to friends? Ask, for example, the "moderate" Arab friends, and some NATO allies, to end their boycott of the new Iraq. Why do they refuse to reactivate their embassies in Baghdad and appoint full ambassadors? Why do they allow their territory to be used for jihadi recruitment, fundraising and deployment to Iraq?

But the real war over Iraq is fought in the U.S. Here, Mr. Bush's administration continues to fail to explain what is at stake. In the Middle East, the old status quo and the balance of power that sustained it have been shattered. The region needs new structures of stability, which could either be created by the U.S. and its allies, including the new regimes in Kabul and Baghdad, or by the enemies of the U.S., particularly Tehran and its Syrian clients. An undemocratic and anti-American region will become a marshland of fanaticism where terror is bred, a point Mr. Maliki should drive home. U.S. national security requires success not only in Afghanistan and Iraq but also throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Maliki should also emphasize the successes the U.S. has seen in Iraq: Saddam Hussein has been toppled; and power has been transferred to the people of Iraq, who have written their own constitution and conducted free elections. Not surprisingly, this new Iraq is challenged by all manner of retrograde forces: pan-Arabists, pan-Islamists, jihadists, Khomeinists and downright nihilists. That challenge, he should note, must be met with determination.

In his response, Mr. Bush should recognize his own limitations. As the recent elections revealed, a majority of Americans have doubts about the wisdom of involvement. It is not enough for him to say the U.S. has achieved its objectives if the lack of basic security in Baghdad makes it impossible for millions to enjoy their new freedoms. But as the power of the Tikriti clique has devolved on the people of Iraq, Mr. Bush must ask them to be its primary defenders. This will require the government and parliament to take a number of measures.

For one, it needs to postpone plans for a federal system that is anathema to Arab Sunnis and regarded with suspicion by secular Shiites, and recognize that it may take years to build an acceptable consensus on that issue. Parliament must freeze the issue of Kirkuk until after the next general election in 2009. It also needs to develop an equitable system of sharing oil revenues. Even if provinces that have no oil get a bigger role for a few years, the price is worth paying to maintain Iraq's unity.

Mr. Bush should also allow that the disbanding the army of the former regime was a mistake, albeit one done on the advice of the new Iraqi political elite, including Mr. Maliki's camp. The way to rectify the mistake is to invite all former offices and NCOs, if they wish, to return to service. With stringent screening measures in place, Iraq would be able to keep the undesirable elements out while allowing others a second chance. In the same spirit, parliament must also come up with a more comprehensive amnesty law to cover hundreds of thousands of people whose sole offense was membership in the Baath Party, often forced upon them by circumstances.

Mr. Bush must also emphasize that Mr. Maliki's government has failed to develop a coherent strategy for dealing with security issues. It needs a coordinator to make sure that the ministries of defense and interior, the army command, the police hierarchy and the dozen or so different armed units attached to different ministries work together to prevent infiltration and rogue actors, including those that pose as Shiite militias. It also needs to root out corruption and nepotism. Mr. Maliki must have heard what they say in Baghdad teahouses about "a government of thieves and their cousins." Perhaps this is unfair. But corruption could become as much of a threat as the jihadists.

Finally, while Mr. Bush should demonstrate that America remains committed to the new Iraq, he should only prepare to renew the U.S. mission for one more year, dependent on a credible plan for transferring responsibility for security to the Maliki government. In that year, the U.S. ought to intensify its training programs and examine options for expanding the weapons system of the new Iraqi army. Contrary to some perceptions, America does not abandon its friends. It will certainly not hand Iraq to its enemies, least of all Iran. But nor does it write blank checks.

In Statement, Defense Choice Criticizes Iraq Planning (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — In his first detailed public statement since his nomination as defense secretary, Robert M. Gates criticized the Pentagon as failing to prepare adequately for securing Iraq after the invasion in 2003.

Asked in a questionnaire from the Senate Armed Services Committee what he would have done differently in Iraq if he had been defense secretary in the last six years, Mr. Gates responded: “War planning should be done with the understanding that postmajor-combat phase of operations can be crucial. If confirmed, I intend to improve the department’s capabilities in this area.”

He added that “with the advantages of hindsight, I might have done some things differently.”

He kept mainly to generalities in the 60 pages of answers to committee members’ questions. The White House sent the document to committee members on Tuesday.

The confirmation hearing is set for next week.

By criticizing the Iraq planning, however obliquely, Mr. Gates offered a glimpse of how he might distance himself from the record of the current secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who will step down.

Mr. Rumsfeld has acknowledged mistakes in Iraq, but has dismissed criticism that too few American troops were dispatched to preserve order after Saddam Hussein’s fall in 2003.

Mr. Gates is scheduled be the sole witness at a one-day hearing next week that appears to be likely to speed him toward confirmation, Congressional officials from both parties said.

Even Democrats on the committee say that barring an unexpected disclosure Mr. Gates is likely to be approved by the Armed Services Committee and, soon thereafter, by the full Senate before it adjourns next month.

Mr. Gates’s carefully couched answers displayed few policy differences between him and the administration and, in many cases, states administration policy in anodyne language.

Several replies appeared fashioned to reassure that Mr. Gates is entering the job with a realistic assessment of its challenges and leaving open the possibility of changes in policy.

Asked whether the United States should engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq, Mr. Gates shied from endorsing bilateral overtures to either country.

“Engagement with Iran might well come as part of an international conference,” he said.

Talks with Damascus could “take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference,” he added.

But he also said, “No option should be taken off the table,” noting that “even in the worst days of the cold war, the United States maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China.”

A bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton is widely expected to recommend an aggressive regional diplomatic initiative that includes direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Gates was a member of that panel before resigning after his nomination.

His reply on Iran backed slightly from a study of which he was a co-author for the Council on Foreign Relations. The examination called for the United States to "engage selectively" with Iran, in part to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons.

The administration has offered to hold direct talks only if Iran suspends its nuclear enrichment program.

"It is one thing to direct a study as a private citizen and another to serve as a senior policy maker," Mr. Gates said.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will become chairman of the Armed Services Committee in January, said in an interview he intended to question Mr. Gates carefully about his willingness to challenge Iraq strategy in internal administration discussions, something that Mr. Levin said had not been welcome at the top levels of the administration.

In a private meeting this month, Mr. Levin said, Mr. Gates "assured me that this is the approach he will be taking."

Mr. Gates, former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, signaled that he would re-examine Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts to build up intelligence gathering at the Pentagon and its use of special forces for counterterrorism operations.

Mr. Gates and other C.I.A. veterans have criticized that policy.

"Clearly, if confirmed, this will be an area that I would look into," he wrote.

Mr. Gates told the committee that he backed Mr. Bush's decision to invade Iraq in 2003. In response to a question noting that nonconventional weapons were not found, he said: "I believe the use of pre-emptive force should be based on very strong evidence. It is a decision that must not be taken lightly."

He defended the decision in 1991 by the first President Bush, for whom Mr. Gates was deputy national security adviser as well as intelligence director, not to push to Baghdad, after forcing the Iraqi army from Kuwait.

"I do not believe we were mistaken," he said. "The coalition had not planned for, or resourced for, military operations to occupy Iraq."

Gates Warns Against Leaving Iraq 'In Chaos' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to become the next secretary of defense, said he opposes a swift pullout from Iraq, arguing in written testimony submitted yesterday to Congress that "leaving Iraq in chaos would have dangerous consequences both in the region and globally for many years to come."

Gates, whose confirmation hearings are scheduled to begin next week, also staked out positions on Iran and Syria that are consistent with his past views but appear to be at odds with the Bush administration's current policies. He called for diplomatic engagement with both countries, noting that "even in the worst days of the cold war the U.S. maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China and I believe those channels of communication helped us manage many potentially difficult situations."

Until he was nominated earlier this month by President Bush, Gates was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group is said to be leaning toward recommending that the Bush administration seek stability in Iraq partly by holding an international conference that includes Iraq's neighbors. In 65 pages of written answers to the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates repeatedly mentions such a conference.

"Our engagement with Syria need not be unilateral," Gates stated. "It could, for instance, take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference."

That position conflicts with the U.S. stance on Syria particularly. The White House is deeply angry with Damascus, which it believes has broken a variety of commitments, such as pledges to contain traffic by foreign fighters across its border with Iraq and to close the offices of extremist groups. Its support for Hezbollah and its possible role in the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Lebanon -- the other beleaguered model for democracy in the region -- also have infuriated the administration. White House officials say they have already tried talking to Syria, to no avail.

Gates, a veteran intelligence official, also staked out strong positions on a variety of other subjects, from the growing strength of the Chinese military to the need to deploy a missile defense system even if it is incomplete.

In other comments touching on Iraq, Gates appears to criticize the handling of the invasion. "I believe the use of pre-emptive force should be based on very strong evidence," he said when asked about the Bush administration's decision to invade Iraq in part because of the belief, now largely discredited, that Saddam Hussein's regime possessed weapons of mass destruction. But Gates also noted that in 2003, he believed that Hussein possessed such weapons or the capacity to develop them.

He also stated that he intends to "improve" the Pentagon's ability to carry out post-invasion operations. "With the advantage of hindsight, I might have done some things differently," he said in response to a question about the six years in which Donald H. Rumsfeld has been defense secretary.

Discussing the war in Afghanistan, Gates also took the interesting step of criticizing the administration of President Bush's father, of which Gates was part. "In my opinion, we must avoid repeating the mistakes of the late 1980s when in retrospect we neglected Afghanistan after the Soviet withdrawal," he stated.

But he stood by the earlier Bush administration's decision not to invade Iraq after ousting Hussein's military from Kuwait during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Gates, who was then deputy national security adviser, argued that going to Baghdad was not part of the plan and would have shattered the coalition of nations that supported the war's limited objective of pushing Iraqi forces out of Kuwait.

Gates, who had the reputation of being a hawkish realist during the Cold War, seemed to be back in that mode in his discussion of China's growing military strength. "It appears to me that China is building capabilities to fight short duration, high-intensity conflict on its periphery," he wrote.

Although he believes China wants to take over Taiwan peacefully if possible, he writes, "their capabilities suggest they are prepared to consider the use of force if peaceful efforts fail."

He also endorsed continuing to develop and deploy strategic missile defense systems, even if they are incomplete or not fully tested. "North Korea and Iran continue to develop longer range missiles and are determined to pursue weapons of mass destruction," he wrote. "In this regard, defenses with a limited operational capability, at least initially, are better than no defenses."

Touching on a recent flurry of speculation about whether a military draft should be resumed, Gates said he is "absolutely" committed to preserving the all-volunteer force.

Turning On The Puppet (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

The pictures show a handsome blond kid. Nick Rapavi's family and friends described him as a tough guy with a selfless streak. He'd wanted to be a marine since high school, and his dress uniform had a parade of medals for heroism in Afghanistan and Iraq, including a Purple Heart. He was on his third overseas deployment, and planned to go to college when he finished this stint in the spring.

The 22-year-old corporal, the oldest son of a dentist, grew up in Northern Virginia in the shadow of the Pentagon. The kid described as being "full of life" died Friday in Anbar Province, the heartless heart of darkness in western Iraq, the hole-in-the-desert stronghold of the Sunni insurgency and Al Qaeda fighters.

His mother told The Washington Post that her son's squad had approached a gate on patrol, and Nick told his men to "stay back while he went through." He was shot in the neck by a spectral enemy that melted away, one of 2,874 brave Americans to die fighting in Iraq.

In Latvia, President Bush vowed yesterday that "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete." But his words about Iraq long ago lost their meaning. Especially the words "mission" and "complete."

At least in Anbar, the Pentagon may be about to pull troops off the battlefield. In another article yesterday, The Post, reporting on a classified Marine Corps intelligence report, said that "the U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter Al Qaeda's rising popularity there."

The Post went on: "The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as 'embroiled in a daily fight for survival,' fearful of 'pogroms' by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on Al Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital."

ABC Nightly News went even further last night, reporting that the Pentagon is "writing off" Anbar and will send the 30,000 marines stationed there to Baghdad. "If we are not going to do a better job doing what we are doing out there," a military official told Jonathan Karl, "what's the point of having them out there?"

President Bush is still playing games, trying to link the need to stay in Iraq with Al Qaeda. "No question it's tough," Mr. Bush said at a news conference. "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place, fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by Al Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal."

Never mind that W. dropped the ball on Osama, and that his own commanders have estimated that Al Qaeda forces represent only a fraction of the foe in Iraq. Al Qaeda wasn't even in Iraq until the Bush invasion.

The administration still won't admit the obvious, that our soldiers are stuck in the middle of a civil war and that it's going to take more than Dick Cheney powwowing with the Saudis to get us out of it. Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, gingerly talks of "a new phase" in the conflict.

But reality does break through at moments. As Mr. Bush and Mr. Hadley head to Jordan to try to tell Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki not to go all wobbly, a stunning secret memo from Mr. Hadley has surfaced, expressing severe skepticism about whether our latest puppet can cut it.

Michael Gordon reveals in today's Times that in a classified assessment, Mr. Hadley wrote that the Iraqi leader, who is getting pushed around by Moktada al-Sadr, was having trouble figuring out how to be strong.

"The memo suggests that if Mr. Maliki fails to carry out a series of specified steps," he writes, "it may ultimately be necessary to press him to reconfigure his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by providing 'monetary support to moderate groups,' and by sending thousands of additional American troops into Baghdad to make up for what the document suggests is current shortage of Iraqi forces."

Just what the election said Americans want: More kids at risk in Baghdad. (W.'s kids, of course, are running their own risks, partying their way through Argentina.)

Mr. Hadley bluntly mused about Mr. Malaki: "His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shi'a hierarchy and force positive change. But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

It's bad enough to say that about the Iraqi puppet. But what about when the same is true of the American president?

Shi'ites, Sunnis Amass Arms (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Rival Shi'ite and Sunni groups are massing their militias in expectation of major confrontations, Iraqis say, even as President Bush prepares to meet today with the nation's embattled prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Bush's meeting in Jordan is part of a wider attempt to involve Iraq's neighbors in efforts to end Iraq's vicious sectarian violence before it spills over into a larger regional conflict.

But Iraqis on both sides of their nation's sectarian divide report worrisome signs that the conflict will soon evolve into pitched battles between large armed groups.

One secular Shi'ite speaking on the telephone from Baghdad said Shi'ite militias were massing in preparation for a large offensive against Sunnis in the capital.

"They had a big militarylike ceremony today for the Mahdi militia, to show their force. They are making themselves ready for something big -- protests, fighting, killing," said the Shi'ite.

A secular Sunni in close contact with one insurgent faction, said rebel Sunnis were also trying to form alliances among militias for a big push in the city against the Shi'ites, including more raids on government buildings.

"I am waiting for the Sunnis to launch a 'Tet Offensive.' That is the one plug they have not pulled yet, and I could see that happening," said senior Rand defense analyst Ed O'Connell.

The Tet Offensive was a series of attacks by the North Vietnamese and their Viet Cong allies that many consider a turning point in the war, leading eventually to the U.S. withdrawal.

Any emergence of pitched battles between massed groups of Sunnis and Shi'ites would largely settle a long-running argument in Washington over whether the conflict in Iraq should be described as a civil war -- a description the Bush administration has so far rejected.

However the depth of concern over the rising levels of violence is evident in the flurry of diplomacy leading to Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. al-Maliki in Amman today.

Vice President Dick Cheney met with King Abdullah in Saudi Arabia on Saturday, and Iraqi President Jalal Talabani held talks Monday and yesterday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Both Iranian leaders pledged to help Iraq, but sharpened the political divisions with the United States by accusing Washington of destabilizing the region by supporting Sunni "outlaws."

King Abdullah II of Jordan, meanwhile, has said that "something dramatic" must come out of the meeting because Iraq is "beginning to spiral out of control."

While the Bush administration has been reluctant to recruit clearly hostile regimes in Tehran and Damascus into the Iraq effort, many analysts have concluded that there is no other choice.

"The only people who are going to be able to put this back into the box are not the American politicians or American military -- it is the Iranians, the Syrians, the Jordanians and the Saudis," said Mr. O'Connell.

An adviser to the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, said any talks with Iran must deal more with the violence in Iraq than with Tehran's nuclear program.

If Mr. Cheney's meeting with the Saudis "was more about Iraq -- rather than Iran and the nuclear issue -- that would be a more hopeful sign," said the former U.S. military officer who would only speak on the condition of anonymity because of his involvement with the Iraq Study Group.

"There might be some indication that the administration is having dialogue with Iran about Iraq," he said.

Mr. al-Maliki is expected to ask Mr. Bush to set a timetable for removing U.S. troops from Iraq, although there are deep disagreements in Washington whether that would make matters better or worse.

There are also serious questions as to how much control Mr. al-Maliki has over his own government and country.

"Al-Maliki is heavily under the sway of [radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada] al-Sadr. He is afraid of al-Sadr, is kowtowing to the Iranians, has no idea of how to deal with the United States, and is the worst possible candidate to lead the country out of this mess," said Mr. O'Connell.

Iraqis in Baghdad note that Mr. al-Maliki was pelted with rocks on Sunday when he went to visit grieving families in Sadr City -- once the base of his support.

Mr. Bush is expected to publicly reiterate his support for Mr. al-Maliki, but privately push the Iraqi leader to take effective action against the Shi'ite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army of Sheik al-Sadr.

"You are faced with the fact that Sadr has to be stopped, or you have to concede the battle of Baghdad to him," said security analyst Robert Killebrew.

"In the past 30 days, what we've got is the Sadr militia openly trying to take over Baghdad and run the Sunnis out, and we simply can't tolerate Sadr any longer," Mr. Killebrew said. "He has emerged as our number one problem in Iraq."

U.S. Military Predicts Rising Violence In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

DOJ_NMG_0099277

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 -- Parliament voted unanimously Tuesday to keep Iraq under a state of emergency for 30 more days, as a U.S. military spokesman said he expects violence to escalate over the next few weeks in response to Thursday's bombings in Sadr City.

Renewed every month since first authorized in November 2004, the state of emergency allows the Iraqi government to impose a nighttime curfew and make arrests without warrants.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, told reporters Tuesday that he expects to see "elevated levels of violence" as a result of the car bombings that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite district in northeast Baghdad. The coordinated attacks set off a wave of retaliatory killings in Sunni neighborhoods.

While acknowledging the sectarian conflict, Caldwell stopped short of characterizing it as a civil war.

"We don't see somebody competing for control of the country here at all," he said at a press briefing. "What we see is a country that's still functioning and still has duly elected representatives in charge who are able to give instructions and orders to their security forces."

Late Tuesday, the military announced that six Iraqis, including five girls ranging in age from infant to teenager, were killed during a firefight between U.S. soldiers and suspected insurgents in western Iraq.

The fighting began when the soldiers tried to clear a roadside bomb in the town of Hamaniyah, northeast of Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold. As two men fired small arms from the roof of a house, the troops responded with machine guns and tank rounds.

Searching the house after the fighting ended, the U.S. patrol found six bodies and a wounded woman who refused treatment. There were no U.S. casualties, the military said.

In the past 24 hours, 40 bodies were found in Baghdad, showing signs of torture and gunshot wounds to their heads. Among them were three beheaded bodies and two female bodies, said Col. Kareem Abdul Aziz Hussein of the Interior Ministry.

Meanwhile, two car bombs exploded behind Yarmouk Hospital in west Baghdad, killing five people and wounding 11, Hussein said. In the northern city of Kirkuk, a suicide bomber attacked a convoy belonging to provincial Gov. Abdul Rahman Mustafa near the city's hospital, wounding four bodyguards and killing a civilian, Kirkuk police Capt. Shakhwan Abdulallah said.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, during his second day of meetings with Iranian leaders in Tehran, sought the counsel of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, in dealing with Iraq's sectarian strife. Khamenei blamed the United States for the violence, accusing it of hiring terrorists and former members of Saddam Hussein's ousted government, according to Iranian state-run television.

"The first step to resolve the instability in Iraq is the withdrawal of occupiers from this country and the transfer of security responsibilities to the popular Iraqi government," Khamenei said.

The U.N. Security Council, however, voted unanimously to extend the mandate of the 160,000-member multinational force in Iraq through Dec. 31, 2007. The council acted in response to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said his government needs more time to assume full responsibility for security and stability in the country.

As in previous resolutions, the council committed to "terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq."

Meanwhile, the number of U.S. military deaths in Iraq announced by the Pentagon rose to 2,880. The U.S. military announced that a Marine died Monday in Anbar province from injuries sustained in combat.

The military is also investigating the crash of a U.S. Air Force F-16 fighter jet in a field 20 miles northwest of Baghdad on Monday afternoon. Caldwell said the pilot's fate was still unknown. He said there was no evidence that the plane had been shot down, despite the presence of insurgents in the area.

Air Force Brig. Gen. Stephen L. Hoog said at a press briefing that the ejection seat and other instruments had been found and that investigators were analyzing DNA samples. He said that insurgents were in the area immediately after the crash but that he did not know how long it took U.S. forces to get there.

Also on Tuesday, Iraqi police arrested 11 insurgents who set up a fake checkpoint in the Dora neighborhood in southern Baghdad after a two-hour chase, said Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, an Interior Ministry spokesman. One police officer was killed and three injured during the chase.

Witnesses Detail Iraq Burning Deaths (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

The attack on the small Mustafa Sunni mosque began as worshippers were finishing Friday midday prayers. About 50 unarmed men, many in black uniforms and some wearing ski masks, walked through the district chanting "We are the Mahdi Army, shield of the Shiites."

Fifteen minutes later, two white pickup trucks, a black BMW and a black Opel drove up to the marchers. The suspected Shiite militiamen took automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers from the vehicles. They then blasted open the front of the mosque, dragged six worshippers outside, doused them with kerosene and set them on fire.

This account of one of the most horrific alleged attacks of Iraq's sectarian war emerged Tuesday in separate interviews with residents of a Sunni enclave in the largely Shiite Hurriyah district of Baghdad.

The Associated Press first reported on Friday's incident that evening, based on the account of police Capt. Jamil Hussein and Imad al-Hashimi, a Sunni elder in Hurriyah, who told Al-Arabiya television he saw people who were soaked in kerosene, then set afire, burning before his eyes.

AP Television News also took video of the Mustafa mosque showing a large portion of the front wall around the door blown away. The interior of the mosque appeared to be badly damaged and there were signs of fire.

However, the U.S. military said in a letter to the AP late Monday, three days after the incident, that it had checked with the Iraqi Interior Ministry and was told that no one by the name of Jamil Hussein works for the ministry or as a Baghdad police officer. Lt. Michael B. Dean, a public affairs officer of the U.S. Navy Multi-National Corps-Iraq Joint Operations Center, signed the letter, a text of which was published subsequently on several Internet blogs. The letter also reiterated an earlier statement from the U.S. military that it had been unable to confirm the report of immolation.

The AP received no comment Friday when it first asked the U.S. military for information. It then carried portions of a U.S. military statement Saturday that said the U.S. had been unable to confirm media reports that six Sunni civilians were allegedly dragged out of Friday prayers and burned to death. The U.S. military said that neither police nor coalition forces had reports of such an incident.

The Iraqi Defense Ministry later said that al-Hashimi, the Sunni elder in Hurriyah, had recanted his account of the attack after being visited by a representative of the defense minister.

The dispute comes at a time when the military is taking a more active role in dealing with the media.

The AP reported on Sept. 26 that a Washington-based firm, the Lincoln Group, had won a two-year contract to monitor reporting on the Iraq conflict in English-language and Arabic media outlets.

That contract succeeded one held by another Washington firm, The Rendon Group. Controversy had arisen around the Lincoln Group in 2005 when it was disclosed that it was part of a U.S. military operation to pay Iraqi newspapers to run positive stories about U.S. military activities.

Seeking further information about Friday's attack, an AP reporter contacted Hussein for a third time about the incident to confirm there was no error. The captain has been a regular source of police information for two years and had been visited by the AP reporter in his office at the police station on several occasions. The captain, who gave his full name as Jamil Gholaiem Hussein, said six people were indeed set on fire.

On Tuesday, two AP reporters also went back to the Hurriyah neighborhood around the Mustafa mosque and found three witnesses who independently gave accounts of the attack. Others in the neighborhood said they were afraid to talk about what happened.

Those who would talk said the assault began about 2:15 p.m., and they believed the attackers were from the Mahdi Army militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. He and the Shiite militia are deeply rooted in and control the Sadr City enclave in northeastern Baghdad where suspected Sunni insurgents attacked with a series of car bombs and mortar shells, killing at least 215 people a day before.

The witnesses refused to allow the use of their names because they feared retribution either from the original attackers or the police, whose ranks are infiltrated by Mahdi Army members or its associated death squads.

Two of the witnesses — a 45-year-old bookshop owner and a 48-year-old neighborhood grocery owner — gave nearly identical accounts of what happened. A third, a physician, said he saw the attack on the mosque from his home, saw it burning and heard people in the streets screaming that people had been set on fire. All three men are Sunni Muslims.

The two other witnesses said the mosque assault began in earnest about 2:30 p.m. after the arrival of the four vehicles filled with arms. They said the attackers fired into the mosque, then entered and set it on fire.

Then, the witnesses said, the attackers brought out six men, blindfolded and handcuffed, and lined them up on the street at the gate of the mosque. The witnesses said the six were doused with kerosene from a 1.3-gallon canister and set on fire at intervals, one after the other, with a torch made of rags. The fifth and sixth men in the line were set afire at the same time.

The witnesses said the burning victims rolled on the ground in agony until apparently dead, then the gunmen fired a single bullet into each of their heads.

The witnesses said residents, in the meantime, had taken up arms and began a gunbattle with the suspected militiamen that raged in the neighborhood until 4 p.m. They said eight to 10 gunmen were killed and left in the streets. Iraqi law allows each household to own an AK-47 assault rife for protection.

One witness said he and other people from the neighborhood took the six immolation victims to the Sunni cemetery near Baghdad's Abu Ghraib suburb and buried them after the gunbattle. That witness said one of the victims was the Mustafa mosque muezzin or prayer caller, Ahmed al-Mashadani. He did not know the names of the five others, but said they were all members of the al-Mashadani tribe.

Security Council Extends Mandate In Iraq (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 29, 2006

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Tuesday to extend the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq for one year, acting quickly ahead of a key meeting between U.S. and Iraqi leaders aimed at halting escalating violence in the country and paving the way for a reduction of American troops.

The council responded to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout the country but that it needs more time.

Al-Maliki, who was scheduled to meet with President Bush in Amman, Jordan, on Thursday, gave no timetable for a takeover of military and security operations. But the Iraqi prime minister said the government is committed to putting all 18 provinces under Iraqi control — up from the two now under Iraqi authority.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, extends the mandate of the multinational force for one year starting on Dec. 31 and authorizes a review of the mandate at the request of the Iraqi government or by June 15. The resolution contains the same provision as past resolutions — a commitment that the council "will terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton welcomed the council's support for the multinational force and its speedy adoption of the resolution, which was co-sponsored by Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia.

"I think this is a very important decision by the council," Bolton said. "It shows the resolve to continue to cooperate with the government of Iraq."

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin backed the resolution but expressed concern that it did not include Moscow's proposal to continue "the political process in Iraq," or promote "a constructive interaction" with Iraq's neighbors to help stabilize the country quickly.

Despite efforts made by the Iraqi government and the multinational force, he said, "the growth of violence and terrorist activity continues." He called the continuing division of Iraq's Arab population a great threat for the future of the country and said national reconciliation is vital.

France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere also expressed concern at the worsening security situation. "We all share the same objective, which is to help Iraq to not fall into the civil war that threatens it, and to recover the stability that it aspires to," he said.

Sectarian violence in Iraq is at its worst level in the 3 1/2 years since a U.S.-led coalition invaded the country and toppled Saddam Hussein.

Bush's summit comes as members of the Iraq Study Group, an independent U.S. panel, mull recommendations for changes in U.S. war policy that would help restore peace and security and enable the United States to reduce its 141,000 troops.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday that Iran and Syria should work with the United States and the international community to resolve the Iraq conflict.

"I have been quite clear that the two countries have a role to play and they should become part of the solution," he said. "And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue, and let them assume some of the responsibility."

Annan indicated this was one of "quite a few" recommendations he made to the Iraq Study Group's members by teleconference on Monday, hours after he told reporters Iraq is close to civil war.

"I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there," Annan said. "In fact, we are almost there."

Asked about Annan's call for Iran and Syria to be brought into an Iraq solution, Bolton said, "We take due note." Bush has said the U.S. will not talk to Iran until it suspends uranium enrichment, a process that can be used to make nuclear weapons.

Annan Seeks Summit Outside Iraq To Reconcile Factions (WP)

By Robin Wright And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The U.N. Security Council unanimously extended the mandate for the 160,000-strong U.S.-led coalition in Iraq for an additional 12 months yesterday, as Secretary General Kofi Annan proposed an international conference at a venue outside the war-torn country to forge reconciliation among Iraq's political parties.

Addressing what may be the most controversial issue to face the Bush administration, Annan said that Iran and Syria should be included in efforts to stabilize Iraq.

"The two countries have a role to play, and they should become part of the solution," he told reporters, reflecting strong international momentum behind a broader approach to Iraq's strife. "And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue and let them assume some of the responsibility."

The Iraq Study Group, the independent, bipartisan U.S. panel that is wrapping up an eight-month search for alternatives, has been discussing whether to reach out to Tehran and Damascus. But on the eve of talks between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, U.S. officials once again appeared to reject that option.

In its earlier discussions, the group of 10 prominent thinkers has explored ways to take a stronger regional approach to stabilizing Iraq, which overlaps with thinking at the United Nations.

In a surprise move, the panel heard last-minute testimony from Annan and Sen. John McCain, (R-Ariz.) a strong advocate of sending more troops to Iraq. Annan's testimony, by videoconference from New York, had been deferred from an earlier date, but the 10-member panel asked McCain to talk to them in a hastily organized teleconference, according to sources in McCain's office. The panel, which has held months of informal, secret hearings, was supposed to have finished its interviews last week.

Neither of the two options put forward by experts advising the panel called for deployment of additional troops, although the idea of sending as many as 50,000 more was advocated in testimony by other Middle East experts.

McCain's aides would not disclose the substance of the senator's comments but referred to recent media appearances. On NBC's "Meet the Press" this month, McCain warned that even providing a date for withdrawal would lead to chaos in the region.

"There are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said.

To stabilize Iraq, McCain advocated first getting Sunni areas under control, to show Shiites that they do not need militias to protect themselves from Sunni attacks. The present formula is "unacceptable," he said. He also predicted that the U.S.-led coalition is "either going to lose this thing or win this thing within the next several months."

The final report of the panel, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is due to be released as early as next week, before Congress adjourns.

Late yesterday, the panel decided to continue meeting for a third day of deliberations.

At the United Nations, Annan said the world body could host a conference to bring Iraq's ethnic and sectarian parties together, modeled on efforts to create stability in Afghanistan and the former Yugoslavia.

"The security in Iraq today is a major constraint," Annan said. "If we were to work out an arrangement where one can get the Iraqi political parties together, somewhere outside Iraq, as we did in Afghanistan, the United Nations can play the role it normally plays."

But in a reflection of growing concern about Iraq's turmoil, Annan and other U.N. officials have suggested that the United Nations would not be able to fill the vacuum if the United States lowered its profile in the country or left Baghdad.

"We should be very clear Washington can't move the problem a few hundred miles north" to the United Nations, the world body's deputy secretary general, Mark Malloch Brown, said at a recent conference on the Middle East sponsored by Princeton University. "Nobody should operate under the illusion that there is any other force out there which can replace the U.S. The U.N. couldn't do it. The neighbors won't do it."

Bush is likely to face more pressure for a broad solution when he meets with Jordan's King Abdullah, who will host a summit between Bush and Maliki. In a speech to parliament yesterday, Abdullah said the Arab-Israeli conflict remains the "core" issue in solving all other major problems in the Middle East.

6 Iraqis Killed As GIs Fight Insurgents (AP-Y)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

U.S. soldiers fought with suspected insurgents using a building as a safe house in Ramadi on Tuesday, killing one Iraqi man and five females, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the U.S. military said.

Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, has been the scene of some of Iraq's fiercest fighting between U.S. forces and Sunni insurgents. It is the capital of Anbar province, where many Iraqi insurgents are based.

The bloodshed came on a day that saw sectarian violence kill nine other Iraqis and wound about 50, police said. The bodies of 50 torture victims also were discovered, most of them in Baghdad and the city of Baqouba to the north, police said. Several of the corpses had been dumped at a bus station or outside a government building.

The battle in Ramadi began when a U.S. patrol discovered a roadside bomb in the Hamaniyah section of the city, and two suspected insurgents fled to a house, where they took up positions on the roof, the military said.

As coalition forces removed the bomb, the militants fired on the soldiers, who fought back with machine guns and tanks, the statement said.

Afterward, coalition forces searched the house and found the six bodies, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the military said, without providing ages. Another female was wounded but refused treatment, it said.

One of the gunmen may have been wounded and removed from the scene by other militants, the statement said, adding that there were no coalition casualties.

The military quoted residents as saying the building "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a military spokesman, said efforts were under way to "coordinate and offer available assistance to surviving family members."

A U.S. Marine died Monday in another area of Anbar province, the military said, raising to at least 2,881 the number of members of the American military who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Iranian supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei blamed the United States for the chaos in Iraq, saying the answer to the violence is the withdrawal of foreign forces.

But following Khamenei's comments, the U.N. Security Council voted unanimously to extend for one year the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq.

The council acted ahead of a key meeting in Jordan between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki aimed at halting escalating violence in the country and paving the way for a reduction of American troops.

The Security Council responded to a request from al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout Iraq but that it needs more time.

The Iraqi Parliament voted to extend the country's state of emergency through December, but the U.S. military warned of even worse sectarian violence after last week's deadly insurgent attack on Shiites in the capital.

Citing the insurgent attack that killed at least 215 people in Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum on Thursday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said al-Qaida in Iraq is determined to dominate Baghdad, weaken the Iraqi government and kill as many Shiites as possible to deepen Iraq's sectarian divisions.

"We expect to see elevated levels of violence as a result of this over the next several weeks," Caldwell told reporters in the Green Zone, the heavily fortified section of Baghdad where the Iraqi government and the U.S. and British embassies are based.

He also said that while recent polling has indicated a large majority of Iraqis feel more loyalty to their democratically elected government than to their sect, ethnic group or tribe, "these numbers by themselves do little to counter the violence currently raging on Baghdad's streets."

The parliamentary vote continues the state of emergency that allows a nighttime curfew and gives the government extra powers to make arrests without warrants and launch police and military operations. The measures, in place everywhere except for the northern autonomous Kurdish region, have been renewed every month since they were first authorized in November 2004.

Meanwhile, videotape footage obtained by AP Television News appears to show the wreckage of a U.S. single-seat F-16CG jet in the farm field where it crashed Monday and the remains of an American serviceman with a tangled parachute nearby.

U.S. forces investigating the crash said insurgents had reached the site before American forces and the pilot is missing. Al-Jazeera satellite television broadcast similar pictures Monday, but declined to show the dead pilot, saying the footage was too graphic to air.

The U.S. Air Force jet crashed about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad while supporting extensive ground combat by coalition forces in Anbar, the Air Combat Command said.

U.S. Troops Kill 5 Girls In Assault On Insurgents (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 — American troops killed five girls, including at least one baby, and what the military described as either a boy or a man, when the troops attacked a house Tuesday in volatile Anbar Province after they suspected insurgents of firing at them from the roof of the house.

Another person, which the military described in a written statement as either a girl or a young woman, was wounded in the attack and refused treatment by the Americans.

The military said the killings occurred after troops spotted two suspected insurgents before dawn near a roadside bomb in the town of Hamaniyah, west of Baghdad. The men fled to the roof of a nearby house. When troops began defusing the bomb, the suspected insurgents began shooting, the military said.

The military said the Americans returned fire with machine guns and small arms and rounds from the main gun of one or more tanks. After the firefight, the Americans discovered the six dead Iraqis in the house.

It was unclear what happened to the suspected insurgents, but the military said “it was reported” that one was injured in the fight and carried away by other insurgents.

“In a very tragic way, today reminds us that insurgents’ actions throughout Iraq are felt by all,” Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a Marine spokesman, said in the statement. “Efforts are underway to coordinate and offer available assistance to surviving family members.”

Anbar Province, a vast swath of desert and Euphrates River towns stretching from Baghdad to Iraq’s western border, is the heartland of the Sunni Arab insurgency, which is battling to drive out the Americans and unseat the majority Shiites from the Iraqi government.

American troops in Anbar are fighting a holding action, unable to make any real headway against the insurgency while facing a mostly hostile civilian population. The pressures have already led to prominent incidents of civilian deaths — one unit of Marines is being investigated for whether it wrongfully killed 24 unarmed civilians in the town of Haditha last year.

In Baghdad, an Air Force spokesman, Brig. Gen. Stephen Hoog, said the military was still recovering parts from an F-16 fighter jet that crashed near the capital on Monday. It was unclear whether the jet and its pilot had been attacked, he said. Using an aerial drone, the military had observed insurgents in the area of the crash site, the general said.

The military said a marine died on Monday in Anbar from combat injuries.

Violence continued to roil Iraq one day before a scheduled meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Amman. At least 30 bodies were discovered in Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Four people were killed and 40 wounded when two car bombs exploded behind the morgue at Yarmouk Hospital in western Baghdad. A barrage of mortar rounds in the Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya injured at least 20 people.

At least 19 people were killed or found dead in Diyala Province, a police official said. In Kirkuk, at least one civilian was killed and 22 wounded when a suicide belt bomber exploded near a convoy carrying the governor of Tamim Province.

NATO Seeks More Troops In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

NATO was divided at its summit Tuesday on deploying more troops to Afghanistan's volatile south, with Germany resisting any permanently expanded presence and Canada complaining of bearing the brunt of an increasingly bloody mission.

Despite the strengthening Taliban insurgency and unexpectedly high casualties, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said that by 2008, he hopes Afghan forces can begin taking over security tasks.

President Bush called the Afghanistan mission — which has mobilized 32,800 troops_ NATO's No. 1 operation. Defeating Taliban forces, he said, "will require the full commitment of our alliance."

"The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," Bush said, crediting the alliance for helping Afghanistan go from "a totalitarian nightmare" to stability and steadily growing prosperity.

But German Chancellor Angela Merkel made clear that her country would not permanently expand its 2,900-strong force, though she said German forces could be deployed in the south in an emergency. Canada's foreign minister warned that public support will fade if other countries don't relax restrictions on use of their troops and help Canadian forces in the south.

Canada has suffered 44 deaths in Afghanistan — 36 this year alone. Most occurred after NATO forces moved into the south this summer.

Poland's Defense Ministry, meanwhile, said the full deployment of hundreds of new Polish troops to Afghanistan will be delayed by about three weeks because barracks for them will not be ready as scheduled.

De Hoop Scheffer urged NATO allies not to lose heart, insisting the operation was a "mission possible."

"We need to be frank about the risks, but we also need to avoid overdramatizing," he said. "NATO has been in Afghanistan for three years — time enough to know what it takes to succeed."

Afghanistan dominated the discussion at a gala dinner Tuesday evening, a senior NATO diplomat told The Associated Press, speaking on condition of anonymity. But the leaders were unable to persuade some countries to ease restrictions on the movement of their troops, he said.

Wednesday's summit-ending communique "will call on the Afghan government to assume a more distinctive role in maintaining security, and also call on the U.N. to manifest a leading role in the country," the official said.

Three countries pledged additional troops, one offered fighter aircraft, and in cases of emergency, all 26 NATO allies agreed "to come to the aid of each other," another alliance official said on customary condition of anonymity. He refused to elaborate on the countries or the troop levels.

The dangers to the NATO force were underscored by recent attacks that have shattered a period of relative calm.

On Tuesday, a suicide car bomber exploded his vehicle next to a counterterrorism police truck that had been chasing him in western Afghanistan, killing a police officer and wounding another. Two Canadian soldiers were reported slain by a suicide car bomber Monday, and on Sunday a suicide bomber killed 15 Afghans in a restaurant.

During a stop in Denmark en route to the summit, British Prime Minister Tony Blair stressed that NATO forces must have the flexibility and the troops to go where the need is greatest.

"We have got to send a clear message that NATO is prepared to make the military commitment necessary to sustain its mission in Afghanistan," he said. "It's important that we have the force generation and flexibility we need to make our mission successful."

"The important thing is that we recognize the operation in Afghanistan is of crucial importance to our own security," he added. "NATO's credibility is at stake here, and if we don't succeed in Afghanistan, the whole of our world will be less secure."

U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, said he had commitments from some of the nations that have imposed restrictions on the use of their troops that could free up about 2,000 additional soldiers for possible duty in the south.

Italy was expected to lift restrictions in extreme circumstances.

In addition to Afghanistan, NATO leaders plan to discuss the organization's emerging role as a guarantor of peace in global hotspots at the summit, which runs through Wednesday. They also planned to explore the possibility of forging closer ties with their Pacific allies.

Twenty-six presidents and prime ministers have gathered in Riga, the first to be held on the territory of the former Soviet Union.

Latvia, which shares a border with Russia, broke away from the Soviet sphere in 1991 and joined NATO in 2004.

De Hoop Scheffer called Russia, which long opposed NATO's expansion to its borders, an "important and privileged partner." He added that NATO's relations with Moscow must be "rejuvenated."

All 26 NATO allies have troops in the Afghanistan force, but military forces from Britain, Canada, the United States and others are fighting in the front line in the Taliban's southern heartland. These nations have complained that Germany, Italy, Spain and France are keeping their troops in the more peaceful north and west.

"Other NATO nations have troops there, but have imposed caveats on the use of them and on the use of their equipment — this at a time when NATO's commanders on the ground urgently require additional manpower," said Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga.

"NATO cannot afford to lose this crucial struggle against the regressive forces of a resurgent insurgency by being indecisive or lacking commitment," she said.

France is preparing to assume an expanded role in the Afghan mission. Officials said President Jacques Chirac would propose forming a contact group on Afghanistan to ensure that a global strategy guides NATO action in the country.

"The Europeans have relied on their American allies for too long," Chirac said in a statement. "They have to shoulder their share of the burden."

Bush Asks Nato To Step Up Afghan Efforts (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099285

President George W. Bush on Tuesday demanded Nato governments step up efforts in Afghanistan ahead of an alliance summit that sought to overcome differences on issues ranging from energy security to relations with Iran.

In a pointed speech in Riga, Mr Bush urged greater commitment from Nato governments that have been reluctant to deploy troops in the south of Afghanistan or relax restrictions on their contingents elsewhere in the country – such as France, Germany, Turkey and Spain.

"For Nato to succeed the commanders must have the resources and the flexibility to do their job," he said.

France, Germany and Spain all said this week they could relax restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan to enable them to help in the turbulent south in case of emergencies. On Tuesday James Jones, Nato's military chief, said that 10 to 15 per cent of restrictions were being lifted, a step equivalent to providing 2,000 soldiers.

On Tuesday night, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato secretary-general, was due to ask Nato's 26 nations for confirmation that they would all come to the assistance of their allies in Afghanistan in case of emergency.

US officials say that the recent moves are encouraging but insufficient.

On Tuesday Tony Blair, the British prime minister, also called for greater flexibility in a speech in Copenhagen en route to the Riga summit. "It's important that we recognise that this operation in Afghanistan is of crucial importance to our security. Nato's credibility is at stake and if we don't succeed in Afghanistan the whole of our world will be less secure," he said.

Peter Mackay, Canadian foreign minister, also warned that support for the mission in his country – this week two Canadian soldiers died in Afghanistan – could deteriorate if other Nato missions did not reduce restrictions.

In one sign of emerging consensus, Mr de Hoop Scheffer said he "completely agreed with" a call from Jacques Chirac, French president, for an international "contact group" to work out international policy on Afghanistan. Such an entity would bring in neighbouring countries and international organisations.

But Washington has reservations about Mr Chirac's proposal to include Iran, which has influence over the west of Afghanistan but has faced off the world's big powers in a dispute over its nuclear programme. On Tuesday Mr Bush insisted that he would only contemplate direct talks with Tehran if it reined back on uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme.

In his speech, Mr Bush also highlighted the membership prospects of Georgia, although France and Germany are much less enthusiastic.

Nato officials sought to overcome their differences on a host of other issues, including energy security, an issue that Poland and the US would like to give greater prominence to but France says could distract the alliance from its core mission.

This week Richard Lugar, chairman of the US Senate's foreign relations committee, said that Nato should include energy security in its mutual defence commitments and that allies should focus on helping other Nato states cope with cut-offs of Russian gas.

NATO To Bear Afghan Burden (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush yesterday challenged NATO members to boost their own defense spending and be willing to accept rough combat assignments, arguing that the alliance is now on a make-or-break mission in Afghanistan.

"To succeed in Afghanistan, NATO allies must provide the forces NATO military commanders require," the president said in Estonia, before heading to Latvia for a summit to chart the next two years' course for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. "Member nations must accept difficult assignments if we expect to be successful."

Mr. Bush also blamed al Qaeda for the increased violence in Iraq, and vowed not to withdraw troops from that nation as he prepares to meet today with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan.

"There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal," Mr. Bush said at a press conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves.

In the middle of a four-day international trip to deal with the twin wars to which he has committed U.S. troops, Mr. Bush finds himself at the limit of military options and pushing other nations to step up their commitments.

In Iraq, he is dependent on how well Mr. al-Maliki's government handles the violence and political problems that threaten to tear the nation apart.

But on Afghanistan, he is not alone. Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer have called for European nations to step up their commitments and ease the burdens on the U.S., Canada, Britain and the Netherlands.

"It is not acceptable that our mission in the south still lacks 20 percent of its combined joint status of requirements," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said yesterday, calling on governments to stop adding conditions and limits to how their forces can be deployed. "We can ill afford reconstruction armies that cannot handle combat."

During his swing through these two Baltic countries, Mr. Bush pointedly praised Estonia and Latvia for their commitments in the war on terrorism, and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said those two nations are "punching above their weight" in terms of their military commitments.

The two countries have committed nearly 10 percent of their armed forces to Afghanistan and Iraq, and are "providing leadership in European institutions, despite their small size."

Asked if that meant some larger NATO members such as Germany were failing in their obligations, Mr. Hadley did not answer directly, saying instead it was right for Latvia and Estonia to be "acknowledged and recognized."

Also yesterday Mr. Bush:

•Took a swipe at Belarus, whose authoritarian leader is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Mr. Bush said oppression of democracy advocates in the former Soviet state "offends the conscience of Europe, and it offends the conscience of America."

•Said NATO will invite other nations to join at the next summit, in 2008, with Croatia, Albania and Macedonia being likely candidates. Georgia is also a potential member, and Mr. Bush said the United States supports Ukraine's membership -- if the Ukrainians want it themselves.

•Said talking to Iran and Syria about the situation in Iraq is a job for the sovereign Iraqi government, not the United States.

The president also ducked a question about whether Iraq has fallen into a "civil war," instead focusing on what he called increased sectarian violence. He said fomenting such violence is part of al Qaeda's plan in Iraq.

"The Samarra bombing that took place last winter was intended to create sectarian violence, and it has. The recent bombings were to perpetuate the sectarian violence," he said.

Meanwhile, Democrats are focusing on trying to get Mr. Bush to say the conflict has turned into a civil war.

"While news agencies, numerous experts and many American and Iraqi leaders all agree that Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, President Bush neither acknowledges the facts on the ground nor recognizes that his administration's failed policies have contributed to the chaos," said Democratic National Committee press secretary Stacie Paxton.

Bush's NATO Message Signals Concern On Afghanistan Front (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

RIGA, LATVIA — President Bush has long called the defeat of the Taliban a triumph of freedom over tyranny. But on Tuesday he tacitly acknowledged that not all is well in Afghanistan, four years after the U.S.-led invasion, and he exhorted allies to step up their cooperation or risk failure there.

Bush spoke on the first day of a summit among the 26 member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which now oversees about 30,000 allied troops in Afghanistan.

Some European nations have been reluctant to commit troops to the more dangerous southern regions of the country, where NATO faces a stubborn Taliban insurgency.

"For NATO to succeed, its commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," Bush said during a speech at a university here in the Latvian capital. "Today Afghanistan is NATO's most important military operation, and by standing together in Afghanistan, we'll protect our people, defend our freedom, and send a clear message to the extremists the forces of freedom and decency will prevail."

Earlier in the day, in neighboring Estonia, Bush said NATO members "must accept difficult assignments if we expect to be successful."

Bush's comments, and the skittishness among allies in the face of an increasingly deadly Taliban insurgency, illustrate the troubles facing the president as he tries to build global support for his agenda, in Afghanistan and across the Middle East.

It served as a reminder that, although Iraq dominates the world headlines and shaped the debate in the U.S. midterm election, the war that was once considered a slam-dunk success is now very much in doubt.

Some of the early discussions Tuesday focused on Germany, which has troops in the safer, northern part of Afghanistan and has resisted sending troops to face combat in the south.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel reiterated those concerns during an appearance on Germany's N24 television, though she appeared to give some ground by pledging to do what she could to ensure NATO success.

"In emergencies we can help out in the south," she said. "But our place is in the north, where 40% of Afghanistan's population lives."

A NATO spokesman, referring to negotiations between Merkel and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, said Merkel's comments on emergency situations reflected a "meeting of the minds on the role of German forces in Afghanistan." The spokesman said that negotiations were ongoing but that the progress with Germany and other countries would lead to some improvement in the use of troops.

Officials are also taking a closer look at how violence has erupted anew in Afghanistan.

The White House said Tuesday that the insurgency had grown in the south largely because of an absence of government institutions outside of the capital, Kabul. Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, said the Taliban had "clearly exploited the absence of those institutions to begin burrowing into the south and mounting its attacks on coalition and Afghan forces."

NATO's supreme allied commander, U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, told reporters that it was a mistake to blame all of the country's troubles on the Taliban, listing drug traffickers, common criminals and tribal warriors as additional culprits.

Although the bulk of Bush's four-day trip is focused on a seemingly uphill struggle in the Middle East, the president appeared to relish his brief time in a corner of the world where the U.S. remains popular.

In Estonia and Latvia, he was greeted with applause and welcomed by both countries' presidents as a friend. Citizens of the former Soviet republics credit the U.S. with helping them win independence.

It is no coincidence that NATO, an organization created as a counterweight to the Soviet Union, decided to hold its summit in a Baltic state — a symbolic choice at a time Bush and others are seeking to expand the organization to include additional former Soviet republics.

"We will also not falter in making Afghanistan more secure, where Estonian soldiers are helping to protect the welfare of Afghan citizens, again, together, hand in hand with the United States," said Estonian President Toomas Ilves, an Ivy League-educated former English teacher who made his remarks during Bush's visit to Tallinn, the country's capital.

Bush did not hesitate to express his enthusiasm for some of Estonia's more Republican-like policies, including its adoption 12 years ago of a flat income tax system. He mentioned Estonia's system no fewer than three times.

"They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple," he said.

A Strained Alliance (WP)

THE NATO alliance has been confounding prophets of its demise ever since the Cold War ended 15 years ago. For much of that time the military pact has played an unlikely but invaluable role as mentor to the formerly communist nations of Europe, granting 10 of them membership after requiring them to build democratic institutions. For the past several years it has played an increasingly important role in Afghanistan: Since the summer, NATO has led the fight against the Taliban in the unstable south, routing a large concentration of insurgents near Kandahar in the biggest battle in its history.

The skeptics were nevertheless back in force as NATO began its biennial summit meeting in Riga, Latvia, yesterday. They argue that despite NATO's battlefield success, Afghanistan is not looking good: The very fact that the Taliban has been able to infiltrate large parts of the south and stage major attacks on Western forces is one bad sign, along with a large increase in the production of poppies for opium, which funds insurgents and criminals. More than 90 percent of NATO's casualties have been borne by just three countries -- Canada, Britain and the United States -- which has created political problems on several home fronts as well as resentment toward those governments that refuse to send their troops to the south or that restrict the missions they can undertake.

NATO's democracy nursery is also in trouble. Western European governments suffering from "expansion fatigue" are resisting the entry of new countries into the process -- including several neighbors of Russia that badly need protection from the neo-imperialism of Vladimir Putin's Kremlin. Several Balkan countries that were already promised eventual membership are in danger of getting stuck halfway.

These are worrisome developments. Fortunately, there were signs at the summit that NATO's members will, as they often have before, do what is needed just before it's too late. The alliance's top commander, Marine Gen. James L. Jones, reported that a new appeal to governments for more troops and fewer restrictions in Afghanistan has yielded about 2,000 more soldiers who could be dispatched to the south. Poland will deploy a 1,000-member rapid reaction force early next year.

In a speech in Riga, President Bush spelled out a U.S. aim to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO by 2008 and to work toward membership for Georgia -- a democracy that Russia is doing its best to destabilize. NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer rightly pointed to the need for the alliance to step up development and reconstruction operations in Afghanistan, so that areas cleared of the Taliban will have a shot at stabilizing. If NATO's leaders can follow through on those commitments and objectives, the alliance could defy the prophets of its doom once more.

France's Two Faces On NATO (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

JACQUES CHIRAC IS expected to step down next year as France's president, so his clownish performance at Tuesday's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, was apparently something of a final Bronx cheer for his fellow Atlantic Alliance leaders. At a time when the alliance is crying out for sober deeds, the French are yet again uttering meaningless words.

Chirac's office was negotiating with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin to drop by Riga after the summit to celebrate the French leader's 74th birthday and perhaps dine with Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga. It's hard to imagine how even Chirac could be so tin-eared about politics in the Baltic states, where no Russian leader has visited since the Soviet collapse in 1991. The incident created an uproar, threatening to upstage the summit's few accomplishments, even though in the end the Kremlin canceled.

More tangibly damaging was Chirac's latest effort to assert French leadership out of one side of his mouth while limiting French support out of the other. "It is essential for each member state to agree to an appropriate defense effort," Chirac wrote in the Christian Science Monitor this week. "The Europeans have relied on their American allies for too long." Quite right, yet France is hardly setting a strong example.

The primary issue that NATO leaders hoped to address Tuesday is a shortage of troops in southern Afghanistan, where unexpectedly heavy resistance from the Taliban is endangering the alliance's most important mission. Among those not pulling their weight is France. Like Germany, Italy and Spain, France has placed caveats on the use of its 1,900 soldiers, preventing them from being shifted nimbly to the areas where they're most needed. The French also have refused to deploy a NATO strategic reserve battalion to address calls for 2,500 more combat troops.

NATO's mission in Afghanistan, unlike the war in Iraq, is a multilateral effort against a foe that presents a well-known threat to the West. A failure there would not only create a terrorist haven, it would expose NATO as a feeble, divided force. There were indicators Tuesday that some members have agreed to eliminate their caveats, which might bring more troops to the south. But the reluctance in many European capitals to commit the needed forces to such a vital effort is distressing.

This is not new territory for France. In 2005, Chirac announced with great fanfare that he would help stabilize Iraq by sending one (1) training officer to Brussels. When the call came out for a peacekeeping mission in Lebanon, Chirac's answer was a measly 200 French engineers. Stunts like the Putin invitation may make headlines, but it's the country's reluctance to participate fully in NATO — and lack of alternative ideas — that keep France from fulfilling a truly international role.

Living Symbols Of Reform In Afghanistan (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

AMONG the crowd of 800 turbaned elders who gathered in a vast tent, one person stood out: a slender woman in a white head scarf.

She took the podium only briefly, but when she did, most conversation came to a standstill. And though many of the bearded, tradition-bound elders are uncomfortable talking to a woman in public, several dozen clustered around her afterward to ask questions.

Her name is Zahera Sharif, and she is the only woman among the four members of Afghanistan's parliament from Khowst province. In a conservative area where it is possible to drive through towns without seeing a single woman on the street, she is a rarity.

As a member of parliament, she represents an institution that Western observers and experts in Afghanistan say is the country's best shot at building a stable democracy after years of war and religious extremism.

Among the 248 members of parliament's lower house, there are elders such as those Sharif met here. But there are also former exiles in Western-style business suits. All of the country's ethnic groups have a place: Uzbeks sit next to Tajiks; Pashtuns with Hazaras. There are onetime Taliban as well as their former Northern Alliance enemies. A quarter of the parliament members are women; not one wears a burka.

Some of those who gather in the low-slung building on the western edge of Kabul use old militia ties to get things done. Others take the floor to criticize the warlords. Or, like Sharif, they forgo the debate and focus instead on meeting the needs of their constituents.

"For the first time after 30 years of war, we've brought some major figures, who in the past would only talk to each other with a gun, under one roof," said Younis Qanooni, the speaker of parliament.

Western diplomats find some hope in that inclusiveness, as well as in the institution's willingness to challenge President Hamid Karzai.

The president has considerable authority, but parliament has insisted on its right to review his decisions. Deputies rejected five of Karzai's 25 nominations for Cabinet posts in the spring and seven of his picks for the Supreme Court, including one accused of selling legal decisions.

"More often than not, the reform impulse has come from the parliament," a senior Western diplomat said.

Not that it has been easy. The majority of Afghanistan's lawmakers still have their roots in the country's warring past. A number served as militia commanders and made their names and their money behind the barrel of a gun.

Even among the 68 women in parliament, U.S. and United Nations officials estimate that half have militia ties, and can be counted on to keep quiet and vote as they are told.

Some lawmakers still spit during sessions as though they were on a mountain road. Others doze off. A popular television news program was banned briefly from broadcasting parliamentary sessions because it showed lawmakers, heads thrown back, snoring. Many take the floor seemingly without any idea of what they want to say.

Despite their lack of experience in representative democracy, deputies have developed a range of styles to pursue their different political agendas on the floor of parliament and in visits to their districts.

Malalai Joya, a 27-year-old woman, publicly challenges the enduring power of warlords in a Western-style media campaign. For that, she has been pelted with water bottles in the parliament chamber, and twice her microphone has been shut off.

Haji Almas, 45, is a member of the old commanders network. He is angry that Karzai's government and its Western allies refuse to allow former warlords to run the country's military. But he also has embraced education and points with pride to schools that have been built.

Sharif, meanwhile, is a realist. Afghanistan will not change overnight, she believes. So she keeps quiet when commanders arrive at parliament sessions with their bodyguards in tow.

"They know they have done nothing for Afghanistan; they don't have answers for Afghanistan," said Sharif, 46. "But they are still there; they have supporters."

DOJ_NMG_0099290

"People in parliament need to focus on issues one by one: electricity, jobs, education," she told the Khowst elders who had gathered in the tent to discuss pressing nationwide problems. "Everybody should think of the benefit of the society."

Getting an education

Sharif is no stranger to the conservative religious attitudes of southern Afghanistan. Her father was an imam, and he objected to her going to school past age 11. Miserable, she stayed in the women's quarters of the family home and stopped eating.

Her eldest brother finally won permission from their father to let her return to school, and later to take all his siblings to Kabul to finish high school, because schools there were better. Sharif went on to Kabul University, where she earned a master's degree in education. She became a member of the elite Academy of Sciences. At the time, Afghanistan was a Soviet satellite and many women were attending university and becoming professionals.

At the university, she met the man who became her husband, Mohammed Sharif Zadran, a Khowst native who also holds an advanced degree in education. In his own way, he is no less remarkable.

From the beginning of their courtship, he helped her to advance. When she was required to submit two copies of her 300-page master's thesis, he copied the second one by hand because Afghanistan had no copy machines.

But then the Taliban took over. She and her husband were forced to quit their jobs. Zadran had to do manual labor to help the family get by. After two years, they fled to Pakistan, where Sharif started a magazine for women, organized classes for Afghan refugee girls and trained female teachers who she hoped would go back to Afghanistan after the Taliban fell.

Within days of their return to Khowst when the rule of the mullahs was over, Sharif took off her burka and walked down the main street.

"Everybody was watching her as if they thought something terrible would happen — they were leaning out of doors, staring out of windows," recalled Naquibullah, the deputy director of Khowst's main radio station.

Despite ridicule from other men, Zadran stood by his wife when she decided to plunge into politics, even though it meant doing something unheard of for a woman here: going door-to-door in remote villages and introducing herself to strangers.

"People would say to me, 'How can you let your wife do that?' " recalled Zadran. He shrugged. "I said, 'What do you want me to do? Lock her in the house?' "

The answer for many Afghan men would have been 'yes.'

Sharif and Zadran have four children; both are devoted to caring for their youngest daughter, Zala, 3, who has Down syndrome.

And Sharif has tried to address the problems of young people in her legislative work.

She successfully fought legislation that would have allowed children as young as 13 to be punished as adults if they were found guilty of crimes.

She has been less successful fighting the corruption that permeates public and private life, or getting the central government to respond to her district's needs.

The agriculture minister gave Sharif barely 15 minutes of his time and flatly refused her request for subsidized fertilizer for farmers in her district. He didn't even respond to her complaints that most of the 40 goats that were designated for needy Khowst women ended up going to families who had connections to Agriculture Ministry officials.

More than once Sharif has joined with other reform-minded legislators to urge Karzai to replace corrupt police chiefs and governors connected with the opium trade.

"I told Karzai, 'You are just playing chess, taking the same person and moving him from one job to another,' " she said. "Then Karzai said, 'Give me men, give me names.' And we gave him names and he said, 'No, he's a Communist, no, he's this, he's that.' And he took almost none of them."

Afghan and international observers say Karzai's weak government relies on such local strongmen.

When she does overcome barriers to helping her constituents, Sharif finds it difficult to get credit.

She persuaded a rich Kabul resident to donate uniforms, sneakers, nets and balls to the Khowst volleyball and soccer teams, and she brought them when she returned from Kabul for the summer. But when she invited team members to her home to hand out the equipment, her husband and the coaches did most of the talking, and her resourcefulness went largely unappreciated by her constituents.

Where Sharif really shines is in her interaction with women, her original inspiration for entering politics. Women cast 45% of the votes in Khowst, and though some voted for men, analysts in Kabul believe that the vast majority voted for Sharif.

When she entered the high-walled compound that surrounds the Khowst women's center and the school for girls, she had hardly stepped out of her car before the women surged around her. There were young girls in their school uniforms clutching notebooks and pencils, older women who worked as cleaners, some still carrying their brooms. Teachers, middle-aged women with worn faces, reached over their students to touch her shoulder or hand.

As she handed out books and information about Women's Ministry programs from two huge sacks of supplies she had brought from Kabul, it was possible to believe Sharif could achieve her dream of "taking all the women with me" on her way forward.

There is a long way to go. A bare room serves as the reception area in the women's center. In stark contrast to the rooms warlords use when they hold court, this one had no rug or cushions, just flimsy plastic chairs, three scarred desks and a few torn fliers pinned to the walls.

There were no tea and biscuits, no plates of fruit. But the women's voices rose and fell as if they were at a feast. They recounted their latest trials and small victories: the difficulty of getting a job as a midwife, recent cases of child brides abused by men, the challenge of teaching science to students when there is not a single Bunsen burner in all of Khowst.

Sharif listened closely, nodding, occasionally asking a question or jotting something in a small notebook.

She believes in personal persuasion to bring about change. She knows that without female teachers, many families will not send their daughters to school. So she goes to the homes of women who have a university education and asks why they are not teaching. If they say their families will not allow it, she meets with their husbands, uncles, fathers and brothers, until she gets their agreement.

"I do not accept 'no,' " she said. "Usually, the men have not thought so hard about it, they have not thought that their wife will be earning money, that the family will be richer if the wife works. When they understand this and they understand that she will be with women, most of them accept it."

An influential man

Sharif's journey to her legislative district could not be more different than such a trip by Almas, the former commander of the Northern Alliance's 5th Corps.

Almas conveys his status with every gesture. He is so well known in Parwan province that when he stops his car to point out the location of a strategic battle, half a dozen vehicles pull off the road so their drivers can greet him.

Thickset, he wears a spotless white shalwar kameez and, even in the hot Afghan summer, the brown wool hat favored by Northern Alliance leaders. He moves with a determined stride.

His tone with subordinates is often peremptory; with supplicants, impatient. With those who consider themselves equals, he listens, then issues orders.

Westerners and some Afghan police officials describe him privately as a bully and a criminal who is active on the periphery of the lucrative narcotics trade, complicit in kidnappings and enriched by corrupt business deals. Some election officials attempted to prevent him from running, but failed, said a senior Western diplomat.

"Almas is one of the former commanders who has really cemented his power since he came into government," the official said.

Nasreen Gross, a sociology lecturer at Kabul University, said the international community must make an effort to win over men such as Almas. These former commanders influence many Afghans, and without their support, democracy could well fail, she said.

"They desire so much to be accepted by the West," Gross said. "Before, they had to do things illegally. No one helped them when they were fighting the Taliban. When you get involved in illegal activities, it's a cycle, it's self-perpetuating and insidious.

"We have to find an opening for those who want to gain respectability.... They can help us."

A trip home with Almas indicates that he is still divided between his warlord past and his emerging identity as a member of parliament, as though he has yet to decide whether the legitimacy of being in government is worth the payoff. So he veers wildly, dispensing tribal justice and bullying government officials, even while espousing education and adherence to the rule of law.

A man of limited education, Almas started fighting in his early teens. Now he is a fanatic about schooling.

In the early 1990s, when little education was available for girls, he built two schools in his district, one for boys and one for girls. His daughters are in high school, and he says he will allow them to attend university. He has two wives and is proud that the second is a university graduate.

When he arrived in his home village of Rabat to eat lunch at the funeral of a village elder, scores of men gathered around him, a mirror image of Sharif's experience with women.

A privileged few ate with him in a small room and pressed their demands. Chief among them was jobs. They wanted the government to start a long-promised water project. Almas listened as he gnawed on a mutton bone and scooped up saffron rice with his fingers in the traditional Afghan style.

A little later an elder cornered him as he walked to the mosque for Friday prayers and asked for help. There had been trouble the night before, a knife fight between two boys. Both were wounded.

At the mosque, Almas spoke after the imam finished. "Don't behave in ways that make people call us the thieves of Rabat," he admonished the villagers.

Then he lashed out at imams for failing to preach the importance of education. "The mullahs taught us to reach for our guns but not for our pens. That is why our country is so behind," he said as the imam shifted uncomfortably.

After prayers, Almas held a meeting in a vast open tent in his family's walled rose garden. As young men served tea and candy, the two wounded boys, their heads bandaged, appeared with their fathers and grandfathers to apologize to the community for fighting the night before.

Almas made the fathers sign a pledge that they would go to jail if their sons started another dispute.

The next morning, Almas and an entourage of armed bodyguards zoomed in SUVs to the Parwan governor's office to discuss the delayed water project.

The governor, who wears Western clothes and comes from another province, explained the delay. He was trying to determine who needed the water most. He often consulted a thin, elderly engineer, who nervously flipped through a folder.

As he spoke, the governor sipped a cup of coffee. He failed to offer any to Almas, an insult seemingly intended to show that he stood outside Almas' influence.

Almas looked pointedly at the cup. "We are parched, and you are drinking. Why don't you offer us some?"

The governor didn't answer. After a few more minutes Almas, who was less interested in who got the water than in starting the project and distributing the jobs, slapped his knees and got up. His entourage rose around him.

"So the project starts tomorrow," he said, less a question than a command. The governor said nothing, but gave a slight nod, indicating that Almas would get his way. Satisfied, Almas clapped him on the shoulder as though they were friends. He and his men moved on.

War of words

Joya focuses on one theme, the enduring power of men such as Almas. She uses radio and television exposure to denounce them, and despite Afghanistan's limited media outlets, hers is a familiar voice in the country's larger cities.

The youngest member of parliament is already a master of the well-turned phrase, the eloquent exaggeration, the slight simplification. Along with parliament colleague Ramazan Bashar Dost, who works out of a simple tent in the middle of a Kabul park, she is one of Afghanistan's most prominent populists.

Her message is that despite the changes in Afghanistan, corruption is still rampant and the warlords are still in power.

"How can we have democracy when we have these warlords? The majority of seats [in the parliament] have been taken by these black persons…. First they should be tried by a court, but unfortunately the courts don't do that in Afghanistan," she said in one of the many interviews she gives to foreign and domestic reporters.

Even though she has become a well-known figure in many parts of Afghanistan, she remains a mystery in many ways. Most people who denounce the warlords will describe specific instances in which they, their families or perhaps their entire villages suffered. But Joya lived in Iran during much of the Taliban's rule.

Asked how she formed her viewpoint, she said only, "I suffered a lot and I saw people I know suffer. They cried, and I cried with them."

She has yet to make a concrete proposal for neutralizing the power of former commanders. So far, that doesn't seem to matter. Many people believe she is one of the few politicians who speak the truth.

They agree with her that brutal warlords now serving in high government positions are unlikely to look out for the best interests of the country.

"Malalai Joya says what many people know to be true," said Saad Mohseni, the director of Moby Capital Partners, which runs the popular Tolo TV channel.

Sharif's husband, Zadran, also says he admires Joya. "Not many people are willing to say the things she says, and to speak honestly about our situation in Afghanistan," he told his wife as they discussed corruption in their home province.

Joya's candor has provoked such serious threats that she canceled plans to visit her home province of Farah during parliament's six-week summer break because she could not get the United Nations to provide sufficient protection. In Kabul, she moves every few days among several houses where friends or relatives shelter her.

She stays in the public eye through high-profile speeches in parliament and regular interviews with journalists. One evening last summer, she invited 20 reporters to dinner at her home in Kabul.

"The current government is in the hands of warlords," she told the journalists. "Peace and security cannot be established. Bribery has reached its zenith. The current government is involved in bribery, smuggling and bombings."

There is little difference between the Taliban and its Northern Alliance enemies, she declared. "The Taliban and Northern Alliance are connected to each other like a chain. In fact, the Northern Alliance is a good brother of the Taliban."

Former militia commanders resent her deeply, some because she reminds the country of their misdeeds and others because they believe they deserve thanks for fighting the Taliban.

When Joya took to the parliament floor in May with another of her denunciations, some threw water bottles at her. Other legislators ran forward to shield her. Someone ordered her microphone turned off so her comments would not be audible on television.

Despite the obstacles, legislators all have their own reasons for staying in parliament. But for many, the frustration level is high and their commitment is tenuous. "Sometimes I wake up and I think I should just stay home and not go out and try to change things," said Sharif.

The bigger risk is that Afghanistan will fall back on the code of violence that has dominated its history.

Joya said that along with the water bottles came a threat from Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, a warlord notorious for his cruelty who has become a powerful member of parliament: "She is lucky it was water bottles and not knives."

Leftist Politicians Try To Take Control Of Mexican Congress (MCT)

By Jay Root

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

MEXICO CITY - Fistfights and shoving matches broke out in the Mexican Congress Tuesday after leftist lawmakers, hoping to block the inauguration of conservative President-elect Felipe Calderon, stormed the podium and tried to seize control of the chamber.

Conservatives, surrounded by security guards, pushed back the protesting lawmakers and vowed to keep order until they formally bestow the presidential sash on Calderon in a ceremony in the Chamber of Deputies this Friday.

The fisticuffs underscore the deep well of bitterness that remains after the closest and most hotly contested presidential race in modern Mexican history and highlight the possibility that Friday's ceremony will be marred by violence.

Members of the leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD, claim Calderon, a member of the National Action Party, or PAN, stole the July election.

"We're not going to allow this inauguration to happen," said Roberto Lopez, a PRD spokesman. "Felipe Calderon will not govern a single day in this country."

Calderon's transition office declined comment. Calls placed to the PAN headquarters weren't returned.

But Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said Calderon will take over on Friday no matter what happens in Congress.

"There is an institutional mechanism" for it, he said. "After the first second on the first day of December of this year, we will have a president who was elected by the majority of the citizens of this country."

Though PRD militants had made no secret of their plans to seize the podium to prevent Calderon's inauguration, the clashes inside the chamber were sudden and unexpected. Both sides blamed each other for inflaming tensions, and neither had abandoned their positions within the chamber as night fell.

In September, PRD militants seized the podium and forced Fox to deliver his final state of the nation address on television.

Calderon won the July elections by less than one percentage point over populist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. But the charismatic leftist claimed widespread fraud and never conceded, even after the nation's highest electoral court pronounced Calderon the victor in September. For weeks his followers camped out in downtown Mexico City, snarling traffic and shuttering shops.

Last week, Lopez Obrador declared himself the "legitimate president" of Mexico, strapped on his own presidential sash and began making plans for a "parallel" government. His supporters are planning a massive protest in Mexico City's central square, or Zocalo, to coincide with the inauguration on Friday.

Though Tuesday's clashes signal volatile times ahead, the increasingly bizarre protests have taken their toll on Lopez Obrador and his party. Polls taken weeks after the election show that Calderon would now trounce Lopez Obrador. Likewise, a poll in El Universal newspaper this week showed 64 percent of those surveyed opposed PRD moves to seize the chamber.

Calderon has promised to reach out to those who didn't support him. But his critics on the left say his Cabinet picks suggest otherwise. On Tuesday he announced that former Jalisco Gov. Francisco Ramirez Acuna, criticized for his hard-line approach in dealing with street protests, would be his new interior secretary, handling domestic security matters.

The U.S. Embassy said that former President George Bush, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez would travel to Mexico to attend the inauguration.

What they'll find when they get here is anybody's guess. Tuesday's trouble started around lunchtime, as rumors swept the chamber that PRD supporters would try to seize the chamber. PAN leaders, who have the largest bloc of votes and control the gavel, began assembling near the dais, along with a coterie of guards.

When PRD members began pushing and shoving toward the crescent-shaped stage, they clashed with a human wall of conservative lawmakers.

Jorge Zermeno, the PAN leader who presides over the chamber, ordered the rebel legislators to stand down and asked a throng of reporters and cameramen to leave the chamber. He then called a recess, but lawmakers stayed in the chamber, hurling insults at each other.

A second clash broke out at about 5 p.m., but each side held its ground.

Calderon Names Mexico Interior, Foreign Ministers (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Patrick Harrington

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Nov. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Mexico's President-elect Felipe Calderon named Francisco Ramirez Acuna as his interior minister, making the former Jalisco-state governor the country's chief political negotiator and strengthening the ruling party's hold on power.

Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1, also named former ambassador to Austria Patricia Espinosa as foreign minister during a Mexico City news conference. Arturo Sarukhan, Calderon's former chief foreign policy adviser, will become a liaison for U.S. relations.

Calderon, 44, has so far used his Cabinet posts to appease leaders of his own National Action Party rather than opposition party members, said Chappell Lawson, a political science professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. During his campaign, Calderon promised to forge legislative alliances in congress by building a coalition government.

``So far, his appointments are a representative sample of the National Action Party," Lawson said in a telephone interview. ``These are not a collection of people who are likely to elicit cooperation from congress."

Calderon today also named German Martinez, head attorney for his presidential campaign, as federal auditor. Juan Camilo Mourino will serve as chief of staff, Calderon said. The president-elect is expected to name his public-safety team tomorrow and must appoint all cabinet members by Dec. 1, when he is scheduled to swear in as president before congress.

U.S. Delegation

Former U.S. President George H.W. Bush will attend the swearing-in ceremony, the U.S. Embassy in Mexico said in an e-mail statement. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez will also attend, according to the statement.

Ramirez Acuna is known as a governor willing to use force as well as incentives to resolve conflicts, said Jorge Chabat, a political science professor at the Center for Economic Research and Teaching in Mexico City.

``He is a politician who knows how to get things done the old-fashioned way with a carrot and stick approach," Chabat said in a telephone interview. ``I don't know if that's the way things should be in a democracy, but it will probably work."

Speaking at today's news conference, Ramirez Acuna promised to maintain order and apply the law to attack corruption and impunity.

``Together we will return to Mexicans the peace and tranquility that they need to work and that is required to spur development in every corner of the country," he said.

Calderon Cabinet

On Nov. 24 Calderon named six non-economic Cabinet ministers from his National Action Party, including his former campaign manager Josefina Vazquez Mota as education minister.

On Nov. 21 Calderon named Agustin Carstens finance minister, making the former International Monetary Fund official leader of U.S.-educated economic team. Three of Calderon's six economy-related appointments have doctorate degrees in economics from U.S. universities.

Calderon's decision to avoid appointing opposition parties to his Cabinet is not necessarily a mistake, Michael Hood, chief Latin America economist with Barclays Capital Inc. in New York, said in a phone interview. Such choices can lead to infighting within the Cabinet, he said.

``It's one of those situations where legislative progress is going to have to come from the top," he said. ``It's going to come down to his political capital and how he's going to employ it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Five Years After Enron, Firms Seek Weaker Rules (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Business interests, seizing on concerns that a law passed in the wake of the Enron scandal has overreached, are advancing a broad agenda to limit government oversight of private industry, including making it tougher for investors to sue companies and auditors for fraud.

A group that has drawn support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. plans to issue a report tomorrow that argues that the United States may be losing its preeminent position in global capital markets to foreign stock exchanges because of costly regulations and nettlesome private lawsuits.

Interest groups are trying to build political support to review long-standing rules that govern companies, as well as parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which imposed stringent responsibilities on accountants, boards of directors and corporate executives. Some key members of Congress have recently expressed concern that U.S. companies may be over-regulated.

For example, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) joined New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) to commission a study by McKinsey & Co. on whether U.S. stock exchanges are losing listings to more lightly regulated overseas markets. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who is set to head the Banking Committee, has expressed skepticism that the Sarbanes-Oxley law has led businesses to flee overseas but has signaled a willingness to hold hearings next year on how the legislation is working.

The business groups are initially focused on getting rules changed at the Securities and Exchange Commission, the independent federal agency that oversees U.S. capital markets and companies. The growing bipartisan concern about over-regulation will help set the tone for deliberations at the agency, which is led by Christopher Cox, a Republican and former congressman from California.

"From our perspective, the more people talking about this, the better," said David C. Chavern, director of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's corporate-governance initiative. The chamber plans to publish its own study next year that attacks what it views as duplicative rules and overly aggressive enforcement by securities regulators.

The renewed push to soften government oversight of business comes as the outcry begins to diminish over a series of financial scandals that erupted five years ago after Enron collapsed, costing thousands of employees their jobs and wiping out billions of investor dollars. The phony accounting at Enron and the bankruptcy of WorldCom months later prompted Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

The chamber panel studying regulation contains several prominent Democrats, including two members of President Bill Clinton's Cabinet -- William M. Daley, who headed the Commerce Department, and former U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor.

Lobbyists at the chamber are moving to line up meetings with Dodd, who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008, and soon-to-be House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.). Frank recently spoke in general terms of his willingness to compromise with business on some matters to win concessions on minimum-wage legislation and housing reforms.

The current drive to roll back regulation pivots on a complex rule that requires companies to assess their financial controls to prevent fraud and mistakes. The provision, contained in Sarbanes-Oxley, has proved more expensive than regulators envisioned, particularly for small businesses.

With the encouragement of senior federal lawmakers, officials from the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which sets rules and oversees accountants, are meeting to hash out an accord on scaling back the rule. How far they go, perhaps effectively exempting smaller companies, is raising intense concerns from those who think the rules are necessary to protect investors from fraud.

If they decide to exempt small companies, that would take out "the guts of getting accounting and auditing straightened out" after years of cursory reviews by accountants helped fuel financial scandals, warned Charles A. Bowsher, former comptroller general.

But business groups are not stopping there. They were encouraged when Paulson gave a speech last week calling for "a more balanced approach" to regulation.

The private panel is frequently called "the Paulson group," even though Paulson is not a member. Instead, the panel is directed by Harvard University law professor Hal S. Scott. Other members include R. Glenn Hubbard, former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, and Brookings Institution Chairman John L. Thornton.

The group's report tomorrow is to advocate raising the standard for charging companies with crimes, according to sources briefed on its content who spoke on condition of anonymity because the document has not been officially released. It also is to propose shielding accountants from fraud lawsuits under certain circumstances.

Many of the group's recommendations would require congressional action, and passage of new laws is uncertain in the last two years of the Bush administration, even with a growing concern over regulation among senior lawmakers.

University of Rochester President Joel Seligman expressed concern about any new limits on the ability of people to sue companies over accounting, saying it could "handicap the ability of the SEC to be a vigilant watchdog."

"To have this occur, so soon after the dramatic increase in fraud that led to Sarbanes-Oxley, would be deeply troublesome," he said.

Paulson Walks Fine Line Amid Calls (WSJ)

Some of the best minds in American finance have put their heads together and come up with a diagnosis for Wall Street's competitiveness problem:

Too many lawyers.

They aren't just talking about the securities-class-action-lawsuit type, although those certainly top their hit list. They also are talking about the battalion of legal beagles who staff the Securities and Exchange Commission and write the mind-numbing rules that publicly traded companies have to follow. And the armies of lawyers who represent those publicly traded companies and demand excruciatingly detailed rules for their clients to hide behind.

Or worst of all, the politically ambitious lawyers who become state attorneys general and U.S. attorneys and believe beating up corporations is their ticket to career advancement.

While I haven't seen the report of the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, which is scheduled to be released tomorrow, I have talked to others who have seen it. Beyond that, I listened to a speech that the committee's unofficial godfather, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson -- who isn't a lawyer -- gave last week to the Economic Club of New York.

The committee has been portrayed as an effort to roll back the law written by Sen. Paul Sarbanes and Rep. Michael Oxley -- both lawyers -- in the wake of the corporate scandals of 2002. That may be the least controversial part of its work.

Like almost everyone else, the committee concludes that the current interpretation of section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires publicly traded companies to do costly audits of their internal financial controls, needs to be relaxed, especially for smaller companies. The SEC is already at work on that.

More interesting is the call for moving from a regulatory regime based on "rules" to one based on "principles." In his speech, Mr. Paulson complained of "an ever-expanding rule book in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule." He extolled "the desirability, where practical, of moving toward a principles-based system."

As I listened to Mr. Paulson last week, I had no clue what the practical consequences of his call for "principles-based" regulation might be. So I investigated and discovered that the world's leading financial market has, rather suddenly, developed a bad case of Anglophilia. The model for a principles-based regulatory approach, it turns out, is Britain's Financial Services Authority.

I called up Sir Howard Davies, the founding chairman of the FSA who is now the director of the London School of Economics. Sir Howard is most definitely not a lawyer -- he studied French and history, then attended Stanford Business School.

He explained that when the FSA was created in 1997, in an effort to consolidate Britain's financial regulators, it wrote a rule book that began with a set of principles explaining what the regulators hoped to accomplish.

"There are, of course, also rules," he says. "But you can afford to be less intrusive because as a regulator, you have principles you can fall back on." In other words, once you have said no killing, there is no need to specifically prohibit sticking a hunting knife through another man's sternum.

As simple as that sounds, it proved difficult in practice. The reason? Lawyers. "It's a struggle," Sir Howard said. "We wanted more principles and fewer rules, but the market pushed back."

For instance, the FSA wanted a simple principle saying financial firms must segregate their clients' money from their own money. Lawyers representing the financial firms responded: "What do you mean by clients? What do you mean by money? What do you mean by segregated?"

Still, the FSA was able to limit its rule-making, in part because it was staffed largely by economists. The lawyers were relegated to the general counsel's office. "We kept them on tap, not on top," Sir Howard says.

Could such a system work in the U.S.? Well, first, it would require a restaffing of the SEC: More economists, fewer lawyers. (The current count is 1,344 attorneys, 27 economists.) More importantly, it would require reining in the trial bar, which empowers corporate lawyers by creating the constant threat of lawsuits. It also would probably require curbs on state attorneys general like soon-to-be New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who was always happy to step in whenever he thought the SEC was going soft.

The biggest problem facing Mr. Paulson and the Committee for Capital Markets Regulation is one of perception. Can they convince people that their call for principles-based regulation isn't just an effort to go soft on corporate miscreants? With public approval ratings of corporate executives still in the dumps, that won't be easy.

Setting Aside Of Wittig Sentence May Be Challenged (TCJ)

By Robert Boczkiewicz, Special to The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal, November 29, 2006

DENVER -- Prosecutors may ask an appeals court to reconsider last week's decision that set aside a five-year prison sentence for David Wittig, former chief executive of Westar Energy, for bank crimes.

In a new filing at the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a federal prosecutor in Topeka said attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., are evaluating whether to ask the court to rehear Wittig's appeal.

A three-judge panel of the court dealt a blow to prosecutors on Nov. 22 by setting aside Wittig's sentence and instructing U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson, of Topeka, to resentence him.

The appellate judges concluded that she erred in computing his sentence under sentencing guidelines.

They pointed out that a sentence of six months is the maximum recommended in the guidelines unless she justifies a longer sentence.

Wittig's sentence is for convictions in 2003 of hiding from bank regulators a $1.5 million loan he made to former Capital City Bank president Clinton Odell "Del" Weidner II. Wittig is serving a separate 18-year sentence for convictions in 2005 of looting Westar of millions of dollars.

In the new filing, prosecutor Richard Hathaway said prosecutors are considering asking all of the appeals court judges to consider the case, instead of only the three judges who issued last week's decision.

The Denver-based court seldom agrees to rehear cases, especially those in which a three-judge panel was unanimous, as it was in last week's decision.

The court typically operates in three-judge panels.

Hathaway said Dec. 6 is the deadline for prosecutors to ask the judges to rehear Wittig's appeal. The prosecutor said lawyers of the solicitor general's staff in Washington need more time to decide whether to make the request.

Hathaway asked for a 30-day extension of the deadline but said Wittig's lead attorney opposes an extension.

Charges Of Bribery In A Chinese Bank Deal (NYT)

By David Barboza

SHANGHAI, Nov. 28 — The American company says it was a legitimate cost of doing business in China, the price it had to pay to help secure a large software contract with one of China's biggest banks.

But a Chinese company that says it got pushed out of the deal has a different version: executives there say it was bribery, a case of an American company secretly funneling money to powerful Chinese government officials to ensure the lucrative banking contract.

According to a lawsuit filed earlier this year in United States District Court in Florida, Fidelity Information Services, an American software company, paid for two Chinese banking officials and family members to travel on vacation to Hong Kong, Paris, Rome, Las Vegas and the golfing resort of Pebble Beach, Calif.

The suit contends that Fidelity arranged for these trips through a consultant in China who was reimbursed for giving the Chinese bankers and their families an array of gifts, including expensive Sony cameras, luxury outfits from Versace and Burberry, and perhaps even a $330,000 apartment here in Shanghai.

The lawsuit grows out of a business dispute between Grace and Digital Information Technology, a Beijing-based consulting company and Fidelity, based in Jacksonville, Fla. It accuses Fidelity of trying to avoid paying $58 million in consulting fees after Grace helped the company win a series of software contracts worth $176 million with the China Construction Bank in 2001.

The lawsuit charges that after the contract was suspended in 2002, Fidelity dumped Grace and chose instead to hire another middleman, who was a close friend of the chairman of the huge Chinese bank. Fidelity, the lawsuit contends, made large cash payments to the middleman, who then passed money and gifts on to the Chinese bank's chairman and other bank officials, possibly in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977.

That law forbids American companies from paying off foreign government officials to win or influence business deals outside the United States.

"This was bribery," said John Zhang, a lawyer working for Grace and Digital. "They were paying bribes to government officials and their families. What else could those payments be?"

Lawyers representing Fidelity, a division of Fidelity National Financial, strongly dispute the allegations, saying company executives simply reimbursed legitimate business expenses and that Fidelity never violated its contracts or the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

"The Justice Department says paying for typical business expenses is not against the law," said David W. Shapiro, a lawyer for Boies & Schiller, which is defending Fidelity in the case. "If the golf game is inappropriate, most of the companies doing business in this country are engaged in inappropriate activity."

In government filings earlier this year, Fidelity acknowledged that the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were looking into the allegations.

Three weeks ago, a Beijing court sentenced Zhang Enzhao, the 60-year-old former chairman of China Construction Bank, to 15 years in prison for accepting more than $500,000 in gifts and bribes, including gifts that came from a consultant who worked for Fidelity, as well as I.B.M. and Cisco Systems, according to Bloomberg News and Cai Jing, a Chinese business magazine. None of the American companies have been charged with any crimes.

Whether or not the lawsuit brought by Grace and Digital stands up in court, the case could force other large American and European companies doing business in China to consider whether they are exposed to similar lawsuits or dangers as they move operations and executives to China, a country where corruption and bribery are endemic.

Amanda Garland, a spokeswoman for I.B.M., said the company was investigating the bribery case against Mr. Zhang of China Construction Bank. NCR and Hitachi are also looking into the charges.

The case began in December 2004, when Grace and Digital initially sued Fidelity in Superior Court in California, charging in its filing that Mr. Zhang, then the chairman of China Construction Bank, had been paid a $1 million bribe.

The case was dismissed after a judge ruled that California was not the proper locale for the lawsuit. The suit was then refiled in Florida.

In March 2005, after reports about the suit spread, Mr. Zhang stepped down as chairman of Construction Bank for "personal reasons." The Chinese police later detained him, just months ahead of the bank's planned initial public offering.

A new chairman was appointed and the bank went ahead with its public listing, which raised over $9 billion in October 2005 in the world's biggest stock offering of that year.

In court filings, lawyers for Grace said they had obtained copies of detailed e-mails and other records that show that Fidelity made a $1 million payment to a Hong Kong company called Prosten Technology. A Chinese consultant named Zou Jianhua, who was a close friend of Mr. Zhang, represented that company.

Mr. Zou, the filings said, submitted about $170,000 in expenses that were reimbursed by Fidelity covering an array of gifts, hotels, shopping sprees and entertainment costs.

For instance, in May 2002, the suit says, a Fidelity official e-mailed another company executive saying the chairman of China Construction Bank was interested in playing golf at "Cobble Beach," though he meant Pebble Beach.

Soon after, Fidelity paid for Mr. Zhang's hotel, car services and green fees in Pebble Beach.

And in October 2004, after the chairman expressed an interest in seeing Florida, the lawsuit says Fidelity sent its corporate jet to fly him from San Francisco, where he had been visiting with I.B.M., to its headquarters in Jacksonville.

The lawsuit also charges that Fidelity reimbursed tickets for Mr. Zhang's wife and son to travel in China and the United States. It also paid, the lawsuit claims, for his son's tennis club fees in Shanghai and golfing fees in Shenzhen and for the daughter of the bank's chief information officer to travel to Europe.

Mr. Zou, the Fidelity consultant, accompanied Mr. Zhang's son to Las Vegas and also escorted the daughter of the bank's chief information officer on a trip to Europe.

Grace lawyers also say that on one occasion, after Mr. Zou's expenses were questioned by Fidelity, Mr. Zou responded that he was renting a hotel room in Beijing because Mr. Zhang and his wife needed to use the hotel's gym and swimming pool.

Mr. Zhang, the lawyer at Greenberg Traurig who is representing Grace, said the trips were "payoffs" to the family of the banking executives and that among the expenses reimbursed were luxury goods from Dunhill, Versace, Burberry, Mont Blanc and at least nine Sony and Canon cameras bought in Hong Kong. "What kind of business trips are these?" Mr. Zhang asked.

Fidelity's lawyers counter that entertaining government officials and their families is proper promotional activity. The company also says there was no breach of the original consulting contract, which was suspended by the government. A new software contract was later negotiated with another middleman, Mr. Zou, the lawyers said.

China Construction Bank officials have refused to comment on the case, saying it was a personal matter involving Mr. Zhang.

Citing court documents in the case, Bloomberg News said the Beijing No. 1 Intermediate Court indicated that I.B.M. had paid $225,000 to Success Century Technology, a company registered in Hong Kong by Mr. Zou, who was named by the government as one of the three businessmen who bribed Mr. Zhang.

Through Ms. Garland, I.B.M. released a statement: "I.B.M. has been unable to access the court documentation regarding this case, and therefore cannot comment on the allegations. I.B.M.'s Business Conduct Guidelines, to which I.B.M. employees in China certify annually, require I.B.M. employees to comply with all laws and regulations that apply to I.B.M.'s business worldwide. The guidelines also specifically prohibit bribery of any kind."

The statement went on: "We have turned this matter over to our legal team, who are investigating the allegations."

A reporter at the "21st Century Business Herald" says he got special access to the court documents in the bribery case. He says the documents show that Mr. Zhang accepted large gifts and bribes from three Chinese business executives in exchange for helping them secure large loans or software contracts.

Those court documents also show, he said, that Mr. Zou met with officials from I.B.M., NCR and Hitachi and that he recommended Hong Kong Hitachi as a supplier to Mr. Zhang and his bank.

NCR, based in Dayton, Ohio, issued a statement, which reads: "Under our marketing agent agreement with Mr. Zou, we required him to conduct business activities in a lawful manner. NCR maintains a clear and stringent code of conduct that requires the highest ethical standards and compliance with the local laws in all business dealings."

Hitachi, the Japanese electronics company, released its own statement, saying the case is under investigation and "according to the internal audit, up to now, we find no connection between Hitachi data systems and Mr. Zhang."

The Beijing court documents did not name Fidelity, though Mr. Zou worked as a paid consultant for Fidelity from 2002 to 2005. Gao Zicheng, a lawyer who represented Zhang Enzhao, the banker, in court, said his client admitted to mistakes.

"Zhang Enzhao said that as a government official he shouldn't have received money from friends," Mr. Gao said, but he declined to comment beyond that on the Fidelity case.

In its Florida court filing, Grace charges that Fidelity made a $1 million payment to Mr. Zou and that part of that money was funneled to Zhang Enzhao, partly through the gift of a luxury apartment.

Lawyers for Fidelity say Grace helped secure the original $176 million software contract in 2000, when Wang Xuebing was the chairman of China Construction Bank.

The software was supposed to allow the bank to track its lending activities. But Mr. Wang was fired and jailed in January 2002, after he was accused of accepting bribes during an earlier tenure, while he was serving at another large state-owned bank, the Bank of China.

After the firing of Mr. Wang, the government suspended the huge Fidelity contract. Then, after Zhang Enzhao came in as chairman, Fidelity hired Mr. Zou, a longtime friend, and 18 months later Fidelity signed a new software contract, Fidelity's lawyers say. Then Fidelity made a $1 million payment to Prosten, which had employed Mr. Zou.

Strangely, however, Prosten now denies that Mr. Zou ever worked for the company. An individual who picked up the phone at the Hong Kong headquarters said Mr. Zou had never worked for the company.

Mr. Shapiro, Fidelity's lawyer, said that its payments were legitimate. "It's only bribery," he said, "if he promised to do it in exchange for something."

But Patrick M. Norton, a lawyer at O'Melveny & Myers in Washington and an expert on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, said the law went further than that.

While some promotional activities may be allowed, Mr. Norton said, "the operative language in the statute is you can't provide a government official anything of value."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Brother Of Philadelphia Mayor Indicted On Fraud, Tax Charges Involving City Contracts (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

The older brother of Mayor John F. Street was indicted Tuesday, accused of using his last name to convince companies he could get them lucrative city contracts and failing to pay taxes on $2 million of income.

Soon after Street took office in 2000, T. Milton Street Sr. began hiring himself out as a high-priced consultant to companies that thought he could help them get city contracts, the indictment charged. One firm paid Milton Street, who is a longtime hot dog vendor, a $30,000-a.m.onth consulting fee and required him to do no work, authorities said.

He and two other businessmen face charges of mail and wire fraud, filing false tax returns and related counts.

"Milton Street wanted the IRS to believe he was a humble street vendor selling hot dogs and soda," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said. "What he didn't tell them was that he was making millions on nothing more than his last name."

Milton Street, a state lawmaker in the 1980s, has long been a colorful character on the local scene. He made news in recent years with entrepreneurial efforts including a startup company that offers "Duck boat" tours, a venture that landed him in court in a fight with an established tour operator.

The 69-year-old vowed he would be vindicated of the charges and blamed any problems on poor record-keeping.

"I think, honestly, that I stayed in bounds (of the law)" Milton Street said as he arrived at a home in Moorestown, N.J., on Tuesday. "Now, I have to tell you, I am the worst record-keeper in the history of the modern man."

The mayor, who was not charged, said he did not know details of his brother's financial dealings but defended his right to pursue city contracts.

"My brother is allowed to do business with the city of Philadelphia just like any other person," Mayor Street said at a news conference. "As far as I know, he has played by the rules."

The indictment stemmed from an investigation into municipal corruption in Philadelphia.

The wide-ranging probe, which ensnared the former city treasurer and several businessmen, became public three years ago when an FBI listening device was discovered in the mayor's office. The mayor was never charged.

Federal prosecutors say Milton Street was awarded consulting contracts with companies doing business at two city-owned airports even though he had no experience in facilities maintenance work. His consulting firms contained the name Notlim, which is Milton spelled backward.

One company, General Asphalt Paving, paid him $8,000 a month _ and later $12,500 a month _ to get city business, including a contract for maintenance at Philadelphia International Airport and Northeast Philadelphia Airport, prosecutors said.

Milton Street also was accused of defrauding a prospective airport contractor, who gave him $80,000 on a promise from Milton Street that he could get them a $3.2 million contract that didn't exist, prosecutors said.

Mayor's Brother Indicted In Alleged Scams (PHI)

By Marcia Gelbart And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 29, 2006

Mayor Street's flamboyant brother, T. Milton Street Sr., was indicted on federal corruption and tax charges yesterday in connection with alleged scams at Philadelphia International Airport.

Specifically, Milton Street is accused of failing to pay taxes on more than $2 million worth of income from 2000 to 2004.

He also was accused of defrauding a prospective airport contractor, which gave him $80,000 on the promise that Street could get it a $3.2 million contract that didn't exist.

In another instance, Street is accused of kicking back almost $100,000 to a businessman in exchange for help that businessman provided in ensuring that Street obtained a lucrative airport contract.

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said Street made "millions on nothing more than his last name," securing a $30,000-a-month consulting job on an airport-maintenance contract for which he did little or no work.

The mayor was not involved in his brother's alleged crimes, Meehan said, but the case is related to the broader pay-to-play climate that has tainted the current administration.

In an interview in front of his Moorestown home, Milton Street said he was "not going to lose any sleep" over the charges, which could mean two or more years in prison if he is convicted.

"Let's face it: They didn't get John, they have to go after somebody," Milton Street said. "We will go to court. They will present their side, and I will present my side. And 12 people will decide. It will work out. I've been through lots of battles, lots of battle scars. I'll be OK."

The mayor, appearing somber and subdued, defended his brother to reporters outside his City Hall office about three hours after the public release of the indictment.

"My brother Milton has been one of my best friends in all the world," Street said, calling the charges a "very, very sad and distressing development for me... . He will have the full support of me and my family as he goes through this very difficult time."

The mayor - who phoned his brother yesterday but would not discuss what was said - rejected Meehan's suggestion that Milton Street tried to profit from their relationship. "My brother is allowed to do business with the City of Philadelphia just like any other person, and as far as I know he has played by the rules."

The Milton Street case was handled by some of the same FBI and IRS agents who worked on the City Hall corruption cases that have led to more than 20 convictions.

The grand jury alleged that Street did not file income-tax returns for 2002, 2003 and 2004, and that he underreported income for 2000 and 2001 by $175,000.

It was during those years that Street allegedly brought in $2 million, thanks to contracts he obtained at the airport.

Milton Street, 67, is a former hot-dog and T-shirt vendor, and served as a Pennsylvania state representative and a state senator. He filed for personal bankruptcy last year.

The 25-page indictment alleged that after John Street took office in January 2000, Milton Street "began hiring himself out as a highly paid consultant to area businesses who believed that Milton Street could help them obtain business with the City of Philadelphia."

Those actions did not represent a crime, but provided the backdrop for crimes allegedly committed, according to the indictment.

One of the businesses that hired Street was General Asphalt Paving Inc., which is owned by the family of city Republican Party chairman Michael Meehan (no relationship to Patrick Meehan). The company was then part of a joint venture named Philadelphia Airport Services (PAS). It hired Milton Street as a consultant to help land a $50 million, four-year contract to maintain airport facilities.

For his work, Street was paid $8,000 and then $12,500 a month, according to the indictment.

General Asphalt is no longer part of the joint venture, which has netted almost $74 million from the city since 2001, and company officials have said Street is no longer a consultant on the project. The current contract expires Jan. 1.

Under his arrangement with PAS, Street created a company to maintain the airport's baggage-conveyor system. The company, named Notlim (Milton spelled backward) Service Management Co., had no experience in the field.

Under the alleged scheme, Street in November 2002 began collecting $166,000 a month from PAS. Because his company had no experience or employees to do the work it was contracted to perform, it returned $133,000 to PAS, which then performed the work in question.

In the process, Street kept $33,000 for himself each month, the indictment alleged.

That represented some of the income Street is alleged to have failed to pay taxes on, according to the indictment.

Federal officials yesterday also charged two men, both employees of Philadelphia Airport Services, with conspiring with Street to defraud their company. They are John H. Velardi Sr., 53, of Drexel Hill, and Matthias A. Schwabe, 38, of Malvern.

The indictment says Street paid $98,000 to Schwabe, who in return did favors for Street.

Schwabe provided cell phones from his company for Street to use. Moreover, the indictment said, Schwabe put together a bid for Street to maintain kitchen exhaust hoods at the airport, and also helped arrange renovation work for Street's girlfriend's hair salon. All of this was done without PAS's knowledge or approval, according to the indictment.

The indictment also alleges that Street and Velardi defrauded a company called V-Tech out of more than $80,000 after promising the company owner they would deliver $3.2 million worth of airport work. Street and Velardi had no authority to assign such a contract.

Neither Velardi nor Schwabe could be reached for comment.

Milton Street is expected to surrender to the FBI this week. He is scheduled to be arraigned tomorrow in U.S. District Court. The case has been assigned to Judge Legrome D. Davis.

Life: A One-way Street (PHDN)

By Dave Davies

Philadelphia Daily News, November 29, 2006

One thought no doubt occurred to veteran observers of Milton Street after his indictment yesterday on fraud charges: for sheer entertainment, this should go to trial - and Milton should take the stand.

There's no more colorful figure in local politics in the past quarter century than the mayor's brother. He's been a state legislator (both Democrat and Republican), a truck driver, a street vendor, a wig salesman, and a duckboat entrepreneur.

While he's left behind a trail of bad debts and colorful quotes - like calling a mayor "a Mafioso," a City Council president "a lying bastard" and a congressman "an Uncle Tom" - he's managed to stay out of serious criminal trouble before now.

"I've never known Milton to be a crook," Shawn Fordham, Milton's nephew by marriage, said yesterday. "Can he talk you out of five dollars? Yes. But that's his skill. He makes his case, and then you think he needs your last five dollars more than you do.

"But he's a really generous guy, too," Fordham added. "He'd give you the shirt off his back."

Milton remained upbeat yesterday when he greeted reporters in front of his Moorestown, N.J. home, predicting success in his coming legal battle and saying he wasn't feeling old.

"I think I'll run for office," he said.

Milton Street was a housing and vending activist in the 1970s who made it to the state legislature, changed parties and got voted out, blew a patronage job in traffic court by racking up fines, then pursued a string of business opportunities which became more lucrative when his brother John was elected mayor in 1999.

Among the more colorful episodes in the Milton Street story:

• In 1982, after changing parties in the State Senate to become a Republican, Milton challenged U.S. Rep. Bill Gray in one of the nastiest elections in memory. He called Gray "an Uncle Tom and a house n-----... controlled by white people." Milton lost.

• In 1989, Republicans rewarded Milton for his help in the legislature by making him an assistant budget director in traffic court. He lost the post for failing to pay $2,000 in traffic tickets. "Why the f--- should I pay?" he told an Inquirer reporter at the time.

• In the 1990s, Milton returned to street vending. Despite numerous citations by the Department of Licenses and Inspections, the Rendell administration in 1996 and '97 put Milton in charge of controlling vending at the Penn Relays. The Penn's Landing Corporation took Milton to court last year for unpaid vendor fees.

• In 2000, political contributors got invitations to pay from $300 to $10,000 to sponsor a birthday gala for Mayor Street. It turned out the money was to go to a new political committee registered to Milton and an associate, and the mayor didn't even know about the event. He pulled the plug on it.

• In 2004, Milton emerged as an operative in Super Ducks, a business of amphibious touring vehicles which sought to use a pier controlled by its rival, Ride the Ducks. Milton was accused in a court filing of threatening to get access to the pier "the hard way." He denied the charge, but his firm lost the case.

Editorial | Milton Street Indicted (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 29, 2006

The indictment yesterday of Mayor Street's brother on tax-evasion charges seems an almost inevitable result of the crony-friendly city contracts that have defined the mayor's tenure. The charges against T. Milton Street Sr. arise from city contracts at Philadelphia International Airport, long a source of pay-to-play rewards for people with friends (or relatives) in City Hall.

Milton Street says he's innocent. And that should be easy enough to prove or disprove in federal court. The mayor's brother either paid income taxes on his sweet, $30,000-per-month salary as an airport maintenance "consultant," or he didn't. The IRS says he didn't.

Also indicted were two officials of Philadelphia Airport Services, John H. Velardi Sr. and Matthias A. Schwabe. General Asphalt Paving Co., a joint-venture partner of PAS, put the mayor's brother on the payroll in 2001 to help PAS get a $50 million city contract to maintain the airport grounds and non-flying equipment.

Milton Street's qualifications for airport maintenance work, other than being the mayor's sibling, included stints as a state senator and a hot-dog vendor. Later, he launched a duck-boat business.

In 2003, PAS tried to award Milton Street a $1.2 million, no-bid contract to maintain the airport's baggage conveyors. The mayor, in the midst of his reelection campaign, nixed the deal amid cries of cronyism. The public didn't find out until nearly two years later that Milton Street still earned about $1 million from the airport contract, courtesy of a $30,000-a-month consulting deal.

His brother's airport deal has weighed down the mayor with plenty of political baggage. That's because, other than the one occasion in which he intervened, the mayor has tolerated cronyism and nepotism in city-funded work at the airport.

For example, the FBI investigation of City Hall corruption showed that the mayor's rainmaker, the late Ron White, got an airport printing contract for his girlfriend, who didn't own a real printing company.

Philadelphia's airport is the first place for the region to make a good impression on visitors. A seamless, customer-friendly operation is crucial to the city's image and its economic future. Instead, the mayor has allowed a system in which patronage takes precedent over efficiency. It's an odious system that puts private agendas ahead of serving the public.

The airport has endured baggage headaches enough without having the mayor's career-challenged brother in a position to potentially run the luggage carousels.

Mayor Street isn't responsible for making sure his brother pays taxes. But the final year of the mayor's tenure will be tainted by yet another criminal prosecution involving people close to him. It is no accidental legacy.

Executive Pleads Guilty To Racketeering, Agrees To Testify Against Ex-Senator (WP)

By Eric Rich

A construction executive at the center of Maryland's largest public corruption investigation in years pleaded guilty yesterday to racketeering and other offenses, agreeing to testify against his codefendant, former state senator Thomas L. Bromwell.

As part of his plea agreement, W. David Stoffregen certified as accurate a document that outlines secret payments to Bromwell and free or steeply discounted contracting work at the lawmaker's home in exchange for Bromwell's steering of state contracts to Stoffregen's firm, commercial contractor Poole and Kent Corp.

The guilty plea is by far the most significant of the six such pleas that federal prosecutors have netted in their investigation of Bromwell, a Baltimore County Democrat who was one of the most powerful figures in Annapolis before he left office in 2002.

Allegations of the improper exchange of cash and favors between the two men are at the heart of the prosecution's case, and with his plea, Stoffregen immediately becomes the star witness in a trial scheduled to begin in March.

The summary, filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, largely mirrors assertions made in the original racketeering indictment and in related cases involving other defendants.

Bromwell and his wife, Mary Pat, who was also charged in the racketeering indictment, have pleaded not guilty. Joshua Treem, one of Bromwell's attorneys, did not respond to a message seeking comment on the plea agreement. Stoffregen's attorneys and U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein declined to comment.

According to the summary, Stoffregen paid more than $190,000 to Bromwell, arranged the contracting work at his house and gave the lawmaker an ownership stake in International Partners Construction, a company that Stoffregen formed in 2000 to do business in Russia.

In exchange, it says, Bromwell saw to it that Poole and Kent was awarded a $13 million contract with the University of Maryland Medical System and arranged for expedited payments for work that the company performed on a state juvenile justice center project.

Bromwell's influence in the state Senate was considered so valuable, the summary says, that when he considered leaving the legislature for financial reasons, Stoffregen told him that if he agreed to stay, his wife would be given a job -- with an annual salary of $80,000 and no requirement to show up. Bromwell agreed, it says, and received payments of $192,000 disguised as salary from Namco, a company that Stoffregen controlled.

Stoffregen, 53, of Towson, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud and filing a false tax return. Under the terms of the agreement, he will probably be sentenced to six to 18 years in prison. Stoffregen also agreed to forfeit more than $5.6 million, including his residence and a number of bank and other accounts.

The plea agreement is all but certain to complicate efforts to defend Bromwell, who was one of the most colorful figures in the legislature and who has been the head of a state agency, the Injured Workers' Insurance Fund, for three years.

Bromwell, a former tavern owner, was elected to the Senate in 1983. He rose to the powerful position of Finance Committee chairman and staged a daring but failed campaign to dislodge the Senate's longtime president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), in the final days of 2000.

In the summary filed, Stoffregen also acknowledged orchestrating a minority contracting fraud scheme involving Namco, a front company that was certified as female-owned and whose presence on a job allowed Pool and Kent to appear to meet minority contracting goals or requirements. The company, for example, enabled Poole and Kent to meet such requirements on a 2003 terminal expansion at Baltimore-Washington International Airport, it says.

The summary says that Stoffregen and others went to elaborate lengths to make the front company appear legitimate when inspectors from the Maryland Aviation Administration, which oversaw the project, announced that they wanted to visit Namco offices.

Stoffregen ordered that furniture, computers and documents be delivered to the largely empty space listed as the company address, the summary states. He directed Poole and Kent employees to create a company brochure. And on the day of the visit, it says, Mary Pat Bromwell posed as a receptionist.

South Gate's Former Treasurer Gets 10 Years (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Former South Gate Treasurer Albert Robles was sentenced today to 10 years in federal prison for plundering $12 million over five years from the small working-class city.

A federal judge handed down the sentence after Robles made an impassioned speech, admitting he acted "immorally" during his year as a leader of South Gate but claiming he never broke the law.

"There are different levels of hoodwinking, but I didn't think hoodwinking was a crime," Robles said. "During that period, I decided not to be a very good man every day. But I did not decide to be a criminal."

Federal Judge Stephen V. Wilson seemed incredulous at Robles' statements, at one point telling the defendant's attorney that "what you have just said is among the most absurd things I have ever heard."

Wilson ultimately said he found Robles to be a "puppet master" who won control of a corrupt enterprise that preyed on the city and its residents.

In addition to prison time, Robles was ordered to pay back more than $600,000 to the struggling city.

A federal grand jury in 2004 indicted Robles on 39 counts of money laundering, bribery, wire fraud and public corruption, alleging that he used his elected office and political influence to funnel money from a variety of city projects to family and friends between 1998 and 2003. He was convicted last year.

Federal officials estimated that Robles, 41, personally received $1.2 million from the various schemes. The charges come a year after voters in the predominantly Latino city about seven miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles recalled Robles and several political allies from office.

The recall capped a tumultuous period in the city's history, when one councilman was shot, the city neared bankruptcy, and Robles was accused of threatening to kill political opponents.

Ex-state Lawmaker Sent To Prison (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 29, 2006

Roscoe Dixon, former senator, was guilty of bribery in Waltz case

MEMPHIS - Former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first state lawmaker to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal, reported to a federal prison Tuesday to begin a five-year sentence.

Dixon, 57, is to serve the sentence, which has no provision for parole, at the Federal Correction Complex at Oakdale about 35 miles south of Alexandria, La., in the south-central part of the state.

Dixon is assigned to an unfenced prison camp at the complex and will bunk with about 70 other inmates in an open-bay dormitory, said public information officer Roland Jimenez.

While in prison, Dixon likely will work at a manual-labor job paying 12 cents to 40 cents an hour. "All inmates who are medically able are required to work," Jimenez said.

Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, was convicted in June of taking bribes from FBI agents posing as employees of E-Cycle Management, a company that offered payoffs for favors from state lawmakers and local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, pleaded guilty to Tennessee Waltz bribery charges last year and is serving a one-year sentence at a federal prison in Atlanta.

State Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Sens. Kathryn Bowers and John Ford, both Democrats from Memphis, are awaiting trials.

In all, the investigation has led to indictments against 11 defendants. Four have pleaded guilty, with three still waiting to be sentenced. A former county commissioner in Chattanooga was convicted at trial and sentenced to three years in prison.

Dixon was convicted on all charges in a five-count indictment and sentenced to five years and three months in prison. He also was sentenced to three years of supervised release when the prison term ends.

Dixon has vowed to appeal his conviction and has continued to argue that he was set up to take FBI money by overzealous federal agents and lying government informants.

In handing down the longest sentence in a Tennessee Waltz conviction, Judge Jon McCalla noted Dixon's lack of a public showing of remorse.

The Louisiana prison camp is part of a complex that includes a detention center for prisoners awaiting trial and a fenced prison for low-security inmates.

While the camp is not surrounded by a fence, any inmate leaving without authorization can be charged with escape and sent to a tougher prison.

Ala. And Fla. Men Face Child Pornography Charges (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099307

A federal grand jury in Birmingham has charged two Florida men and one Alabama man on multiple charges related to an interstate child pornography business disguised as a child modeling agency.

An 80-count indictment was unsealed Tuesday charging 42-year-old Marc Evan Greenberg, 39-year-old Jeffrey Robert Libman and Webe Web Corporation, all of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

A two-count criminal information charging 43-year-old Jeff Pierson of Brookwood with conspiring to transport child pornography in interstate commerce using a computer was also unsealed Tuesday.

"The indictment alleges that these defendants conspired to produce pornographic images of underage girls posing in lascivious positions for profit, under the pretense of offering professional modeling services," said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Justice Department's Criminal Division.

Greenberg and Libman are charged with establishing a "child modeling" internet business called Webe Web Corporation. The indictment says Pierson was a photographer who provided images of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct in Alabama and sent those images to Greenberg and Libman in Florida.

A statement from the Justice Department says that, from December 2002 through April 2005, Greenberg, Libman and Webe Web conspired with Pierson to "use minors to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing visual depictions of that conduct."

The Web site was presented as "a Web site to promote models age 7 thru 16 and their photographers." Visitors to the site could view between 15 and 21 photos of underage girls for free and could subscribe - for a $25 initial fee and then $20 per month - to the individual Web site of the "model" to see additional photos.

If convicted, Greenberg and Libman face 15 to 30 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. The corporation faces a $500,000 fine. And Pierson would face five to 20 years on each count and a $250,000 fine on each count.

Pellicano Witness Charged (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Former SBC employee accused of lying under oath

A former SBC Communications employee, who was acquitted in September of lying to a grand jury in the investigation of Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano, was charged again with lying under oath.

Joann Wiggan, 52, is accused by U.S. prosecutors of lying during trial testimony about voicemail messages from another former SBC employee, who is charged with helping Pellicano wiretap the telephones of actors and producers. Wiggan is also charged with lying to investigators and the grand jury.

Wiggan's lawyer, David Reed, didn't immediately return a call to his office. Her case was the first to go to trial in an investigation that has led to charges against 14 people, including Terry Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian and "Die Hard" helmer John McTiernan.

A federal jury in Los Angeles found Wiggan not guilty on four counts of perjury and deadlocked on a fifth count. McTiernan pleaded guilty in April to lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wiretap the phone of a movie producer.

Wiggan had been ordered to testify before a grand jury in October 2005 and again in January. She denied using a voicemail account that Ray Turner, the other indicted former SBC employee, called more than 100 times.

FBI: Ill. Man Targeted Immigrants (CHIT)

By Azam Ahmed, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, November 29, 2006

A southwest suburban man allegedly preyed on immigrants by posing as a government or law enforcement official who could help them with legal problems in exchange for fees, the FBI disclosed today.

Omar Abbas, 40, of Justice, was charged with a felony count of extortion after he was arrested in Chicago by FBI and Department of Homeland Security special agents on Oct. 19, authorities said.

Abbas, a Jordanian citizen who was working to obtain permanent U.S. residency, is accused of taking more than $25,000 from three different people since 2003. Abbas was living in the U.S. legally at the time, the FBI said.

In the first instance, Abbas posed as an FBI agent and was paid more than $8,000 after he offered to assist a man facing possible deportation from the U.S., according to a criminal complaint.

In the second incident, Abbas pretended that he could bribe high-level City of Chicago attorneys to secure the release of a victim's son, who was held on an attempted murder charge, the complaint said. The father paid Abbas an estimated $5,000, according to the complaint.

In the third case, Abbas, posing as a government official, was paid more than $13,000 by an individual whose grocery store had been robbed, after Abbas said he could recover the stolen merchandise or get money for what was stolen, the complaint stated.

In all three instances, Abbas was introduced to the victims by third-party associates, authorities said.

Abbas, whose last known address was in the 8000 block of Marion Drive in Justice, was ordered held on $100,000 bond at his detention hearing at U.S. District Court in Chicago five days after his arrest, the FBI said.

Abbas is currently being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center, awaiting his next court appearance in early January. If convicted, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The FBI believes there may have been additional victims and urged anyone with information to come forward.

"I would encourage anyone, regardless of their immigration status, who might have been victimized by Abbas to contact our office immediately," said Robert D. Grant, the special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI.

FBI Says Man Targeted Troubled Immigrants For Extortion (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, November 29, 2006

Omar Abbas told people he could fix their problems -- for the right price.

One man gave Abbas $8,500 because Abbas allegedly said he was an FBI agent. Another trusted Abbas to be a high-level attorney and paid him $5,500.

Abbas was nothing but an extortionist, the FBI said Tuesday.

Abbas, 40, made promises he didn't keep as he collected $25,000 from just three people, according to charges.

Abbas usually preyed on immigrants caught in tough circumstances, authorities said. He was arrested last month on extortion charges and is being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center on a $100,000 bond.

Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said.

"We want them to know they can come to us to complain," Simon said. "We will work with them every step of the way to make sure they're not punished for coming forward."

In one case, a man asked Abbas for help in getting his son out of jail pending his trial. Abbas allegedly said he was connected to assistant state's attorneys who would get his son out of jail immediately for the right price. The two met at the Daley Center downtown where the man handed cash to Abbas.

Faces 20 years if convicted He never saw Abbas again.

The man's son wasn't released until months later.

Another man went to Abbas when he faced deportation. Abbas allegedly said he was an FBI agent and would fix the problem for him. But Abbas allegedly pocketed the payments and did nothing.

Official: FBI Unresponsive To Taiwan (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, November 28, 2006, 5:18 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, November 29, 2006

Lee Hsiang-chen, director of the High-tech Criminal Center of the National Police Agency, said Taiwanese requests for help from the FBI representative at the American Embassy in Tokyo routinely went unanswered.

Lee made his remarks from Taipei during a video conference with Raul Roldan, acting deputy assistant director of the FBI's cyber crime division. Roldan was taking part in the conference from Hong Kong.

"We have no FBI agents in Taiwan, so when we have cyber crimes involving the U.S., we go through the American Embassy in Tokyo," Lee said. "But very few (of our inquiries) come back. It makes us feel very depressed."

Roldan promised he would look into the problem.

Lee's complaint appeared to stem from the deliberately low profile assumed by the U.S. representative office in Taiwan, which was set up when Washington transferred its recognition to Beijing in 1979.

The mainland and Taiwan split amid civil war in 1949, and the U.S. operates according to the principles of the "one China policy," which keeps its presence in Taipei deliberately low key.

While diplomats and military officers no longer need to go through the subterfuge of serving on a contract basis, some U.S. government agencies are not represented on the island, despite its relative importance.

This includes the FBI, which maintains representatives in 12 Asian locations, including Cambodia, a far smaller country than Taiwan.

2 Ex-NASA Officials Take Issue With Investigation (ORS)

By Michael Cabbage

The Orlando Sentinel, November 29, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL -- Two former NASA officials cast doubt this week on a pair of allegations outlined in a federal probe of space agency Inspector General Robert Cobb.

An oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, is reviewing preliminary findings from an investigation into Cobb's conduct to determine what, if any, action to take. An internal report from the probe, obtained by the Orlando Sentinel, details the findings from 69 allegations made against Cobb, a former White House ethics lawyer.

Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. In a Nov. 17 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Cobb described the report as "replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies."

One of the allegations investigated in the report states that Cobb did former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe's "bidding" by terminating a contract with the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers for the agency's annual chief financial audit. NASA's inspector general is responsible for independently monitoring the agency.

Investigators wrote that O'Keefe was "not happy" with the audit, and after discussing the matter with then-Inspector General Roberta Gross, she "subsequently [was] asked to resign." The report notes "Cobb [was] selected" to replace Gross and "Cobb subsequently terminate[d] the contract with PWC [PricewaterhouseCoopers]."

In an interview, O'Keefe said that the chronology in the report omitted several important details and ignored the timing of events that would have shown they had no connection.

It "was a completely unrelated set of events," said O'Keefe, now chancellor of Louisiana State University. "It was not even in the same time span that we're talking about here."

The report makes no mention that more than a year passed between Cobb's arrival at NASA in 2002 and the end of the PricewaterhouseCoopers contract. Nor does the report state that the contract was allowed to expire instead of being terminated.

Paul Pastorek, NASA's former general counsel, made those points in an e-mail to the Sentinel on Monday. Neither Cobb nor his office "canceled the contract at any time," Pastorek wrote.

"It expired on its own terms. As the PricewaterhouseCoopers contract came to its natural conclusion, it was competed and another nationally recognized and well qualified firm won the competition."

O'Keefe also discussed the report's contention that Gross was asked to resign because he was unhappy with the audit. Factors behind her departure, he said, included her lack of awareness about systemic NASA accounting problems turned up by the audit.

Gross, a widely respected veteran investigator, told the Sentinel in an interview Tuesday that she monitored the audit closely, but NASA accountants did not produce needed records in a timely fashion.

"Of course, I knew the agency had problems with its records," Gross said.

"For him [O'Keefe] to say I didn't know there were problems misconstrues what happened."

DOJ_NMG_0099310

O'Keefe said the overly contentious relationship between the inspector general's office and other NASA departments was another reason he asked for Gross' resignation. O'Keefe cited an ongoing turf war with NASA's security office. Gross contends the tension was caused by her staff "doing their jobs."

One of the report's allegations appears related to that rivalry between the inspector general's office and NASA security personnel.

Several current and former employees in Cobb's office accused him of failing to investigate claims that NASA security specialists were carrying firearms aboard commercial aircraft without legal authority. One of the report's findings related to that allegation was an excerpt from an e-mail Cobb sent telling his staff they would get along with the security office "whether they like it or not."

A copy of the Feb. 14, 2003, e-mail obtained by the Sentinel shows it had no connection to the firearms issue, but instead was a message from Cobb to his employees in the aftermath of the space shuttle Columbia accident. The e-mail praised the work of his staff and asked them to get along better with security personnel while working on shuttle debris collection and removal.

Fairfield Woman Pleads Guilty To Attempted Extortion (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A Fairfield woman pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge that she threatened to kill a man's son if he did not pay her $197,000, federal authorities said.

Pamela Boccanfuso, 44, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to mailing threatening communications. She faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when she is sentenced on March 20. She also must pay $50,000 restitution to a previous victim of an extortion scheme in 2004.

In February, the victim received a seven-page typewritten letter threatening to kill his son if he did not deliver $197,347.72 to the author, later identified as Boccanfuso. In the letter, Boccanfuso accused the victim's son of supplying drugs to Boccanfuso's son, nearly killing him and causing significant financial hardship due to medical and rehabilitation costs associated with his drug addiction.

About a week later, the victim received a second letter that directed him to place an advertisement in the Connecticut Post on Feb. 22 with a contact number. The FBI subsequently placed an advertisement in the newspaper that day listing a cellular telephone number as directed.

A few days later, the victim received several telephone calls between 3 a.m. and 3:45 a.m. over the number provided in the ad. The woman told him to place the money in a plastic bag and drive to Interstate 95 south, and that he then would receive another telephone call.

The victim told the caller that he could not raise that amount of money that quickly. Later, at about 3:45 a.m., the victim received another telephone call from the same female caller who said she had spoken to "her uncle" and that the man had two weeks to raise the money or his son would be killed.

On March 10, the FBI captured an incoming telephone number and identified it as belonging to a public telephone in Norwalk. Around the same time, a law enforcement surveillance team observed a woman, later identified as Boccanfuso, using that telephone.

Boccanfuso consented to a search of her car, which resulted in the seizure of gloves, an electronic voice changer and an Orbits gum box with the cellular telephone number identified in the Connecticut Post, authorities said.

Boccanfuso said she had telephoned the victim because she had been instructed to do so by unknown individuals who were threatening to disclose intimate pictures of her if she did not follow their instructions, authorities said.

A search of her home recovered a handwritten note containing instructions for the making of an extortion payment and other evidence, authorities said.

John Robert Gulash, Boccanfuso's attorney, said the claims in the February letter related to drugs were not true. He declined further comment.

Atlanta Homebuilder Faces Up To 40 Years In Jail For Wire Fraud (ABC)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, November 29, 2006

A metro Atlanta homebuilder and seller has pleaded guilty to selling incomplete or non-existent houses in Forsyth County, Ga., and arranging more than $5 million in fraudulent mortgage loans for the houses.

Jeffery Alan Teague (also known as Jeffrey Allen Bryant), 49, pleaded guilty late Nov. 27 in federal district court to two counts of wire fraud for a scheme to defraud mortgage lenders by arranging loans to buy incomplete homes in the names of California, New York, and Florida "investors." Teague provided the lenders with false Certificates of Occupancy, stating the houses securing the loans were "completed to code" and "suitable for occupancy."

Teague was arrested by the FBI on Aug. 3 in connection with the execution of a series of search warrants on his offices and the incomplete Forsyth County houses.

He now faces a maximum sentence of 40 years in prison and a fine of up to $500,000. Sentencing is set for Feb. 9 before U.S. District Judge Thomas W. Thrash.

According to information provided by U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias, from 1999 to 2001 Teague, using the name "Jeffrey Allen Bryant" and operating as the builder/seller "Quantum Builders" and "Premium Property Management," defrauded mortgage lenders by obtaining more $10 million in loans for the purchase of non-existent and incomplete houses in Rockdale County from Bryant/Quantum Builders. These loans were obtained in the names of unqualified "straw borrowers," using fraudulent appraisals with photographs of completed houses and false Certificates of Occupancy provided by Teague.

Following detection of this scheme, Teague moved to Maryland, but returned to Atlanta in 2006 under the name Jeffery Alan Teague and "The Pacific Group Inc., d/b/a Value Homes Ltd." Teague again began to arrange mortgage loans for the purchase of incomplete houses in Forsyth County from Teague/Value Homes in the names of California, New York and Florida "investors." In 2006, Teague also collected "investor" money for property in subdivisions in Fayette and Fulton Counties which he did not own.

"This case highlights the problems created by mortgage fraud where the builder is involved in the fraud and out-of-state 'investors' sign loans without inspecting the properties," Nahmias said. "Even the partially built houses in this case may be subject to condemnation as the portions completed were not built to code, thereby leaving mortgage lenders with little security for their loans and 'investors' with nothing to resell."

San Quentin's Execution Team Is Called Incompetent (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

A brief filed on behalf of killer Michael Morales finds broad problems with death penalty cases.

California's procedures for executing prisoners by lethal injection fall short of standards set by the veterinary profession for animal euthanasia and were formulated with less care than methods in China, the world leader in capital punishment, according to a brief filed Tuesday in San Jose federal court by attorneys for a death row inmate.

In addition, the brief asserts that the execution team at San Quentin State Prison is "unlicensed, untrained, unprofessional and incompetent" to carry out its duties.

The brief was lodged as U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel prepares to rule on perhaps the most fiercely fought of a number of legal challenges in several states to lethal injection, the dominant method of execution in the nation. Fogel is expected to rule by the end of the year in the case of Michael Morales, who argues that California's injection methods create an unnecessary risk of excessive pain and as a consequence violate the 8th Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation "conducts its executions in an outdated, cramped gas chamber with an undersized and dark anteroom," from which prison staff are supposed to assure proper administration of a three-drug protocol, the brief says.

The brief also says the state uses chemicals "mixed by untrained and unsupervised prison staff, while ensuring that there is no meaningful oversight or review."

Earlier this month, the California attorney general's office issued a ringing defense of the state's procedures, maintaining in its brief that "there is no evidence that any prior execution resulted in the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."

But the 274-page brief filed by Morales' attorneys finds fault with virtually every aspect of California's administration of capital punishment, frequently citing statements by state personnel during the proceedings.

For example, the execution team leader, identified only as Witness No. 5, said that for the last eight executions, he did not require team members to practice mixing sodium thiopental, which is supposed to anesthetize the inmate before the two other drugs — pancuronium bromide, which paralyzes the inmate, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest — are administered.

One of the key arguments in the Morales case, and in several other lethal injection challenges around the country, is that the anesthetic has not been properly administered, with the result that the inmate experiences excruciating pain but cannot express it because he is paralyzed.

Witness No. 4, a licensed vocational nurse, said in a deposition that she was not trained to mix thiopental. The first time she prepared it was the night of an execution, she said.

The Department of Corrections "has failed to comprehend both the importance of properly preparing [the drug] and the difficulty of doing so," according to the brief filed by defense lawyers David A. Senior, Kathleen T. Saenz and Benjamin D. Weston of Century City. Attorneys Ginger Anders of Washington, John Grele of San Francisco and Richard Steinken of Chicago helped prepare the brief.

In response to a question from the judge, the defense brief indicated that it might be less risky to use a single drug. Still, Morales' lawyers cautioned that there would still be risks. Significant problems with the execution chamber and drug delivery apparatus, including cramped quarters, poor lighting and bad sight lines, still exist.

Fogel asked the lawyers how the procedure could be improved. But Morales' lawyers said that they were ethically constrained in their answers, saying they could not "be put in the position of designing for the state its execution procedure."

In response to another question from Fogel, defense lawyers said many of the dangers in monitoring the inmate, inserting the IVs and injecting the drugs "flow from the fact" that the state continues to execute prisoners in San Quentin's old gas chamber, instead of in a facility designed for lethal injection.

"It is common sense that a facility should be designed to accommodate the specific elements of the procedure that will be performed in that facility. The veterinary profession has recognized this and advocates using dedicated rooms for euthanasia," the defense brief stated.

Defense lawyers noted that a witness for the state, Dr. Robert Singler, observed that "the cramped quarters and positioning of the gurney rendered placing the IVs more difficult than in a clinical setting." Execution staffers have repeatedly experienced difficulty inserting IVs to deliver the lethal drugs, the brief pointed out. It noted that several other states have built a facilities for lethal injections.

Defense lawyers said there may be a better execution anesthetic than thiopental. But as long as the protocol includes pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride, "it is imperative" that the state provide for a clinical bedside evaluation of anesthetic levels by a trained professional, the brief said.

The defense said it "should not be that difficult" for the state to retain such a doctor, although a brief filed by the California attorney general's office earlier this month asserted that such a requirement would effectively shut down capital punishment in California because leading physicians' organizations have urged their members not to participate in executions.

Morales' lawyers criticized state officials for failing to adequately research either their original lethal injection protocol or a modified procedure adopted in the face of his legal challenge. In contrast, they said, Chinese government officials conducted detailed experiments on animals before executing humans by lethal injection

Morales' lawyers argued that the state needed to bring its execution procedures into the open.

"For the past 14 years," they said, the Corrections Department has undertaken the recruiting, screening and training of execution team members "in total secrecy. That secrecy has permitted the execution system at San Quentin to operate in an unbelievably dysfunctional manner."

NC Execution Delayed For Mental Tests (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - ALBEMARLE, N.C.-A judge ordered an execution delayed for 60 days Monday so psychiatrists can evaluate a man who wore a Superman T-shirt while representing himself at trial and pleaded with jurors to sentence him to death.

Guy Tobias LeGrande, 47, had been set to die Friday for the 1993 murder of Ellen Munford, whose estranged husband offered to pay him $6,500 from a $50,000 life insurance policy.

The stay of execution granted Monday by Stanly Superior Judge William R. Bell includes 45 days for psychiatrists to submit their observations and evaluations to the court.

Death penalty opponents argue that LeGrande is one of the nation's most extreme examples of a mentally ill person who never should have been allowed to represent himself. Prosecutors suggest his courtroom antics were parts of an elaborate act.

Defense attorney James Coleman, a Duke University law professor, says a psychiatrist who recently examined LeGrande's records concluded that he is psychotic. The defense said LeGrande believes that the governor has already pardoned him and that he will receive billions of dollars from the state once freed.

A defense attorney who represents LeGrande without his permission said he doesn't know whether LeGrande will cooperate with the doctors.

"Mr. LeGrande doesn't want any of this to occur because in his mind he has been pardoned," attorney Jay Ferguson said.

Michael Parker, the current district attorney, said transcripts from LeGrande's 1996 trial show he appeared to know what he was doing much of the time. LeGrande's outbursts came at the end of the trial, when he didn't get the verdict he wanted, Parker said.

Beyond the issue of whether LeGrande should have been allowed to represent himself, his defenders question whether the state should execute an inmate they believe is mentally ill. Both the American Bar Association and American Psychiatric Association oppose executing defendants with severe mental disorders.

LeGrande's attorneys also are challenging the motivations of trial witnesses, saying they likely were paid for their testimony.

Protecting Reporters' Phone Records (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A journalist's ability to protect the identity of confidential sources has been further eroded by the Supreme Court's refusal this week to stop a prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two New York Times reporters. This is the latest legal blow to the diminishing right of journalists to shield informants who often provide information of great interest and importance but who might be punished if their identities were known.

The case arose from a Chicago grand jury investigation into who told the two reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government planned to take against two Islamic charities in late 2001. The government contends that the reporters, in performing the normal journalistic practice of calling the charities for comment, effectively tipped them off to impending raids and asset seizures, undermining the effort.

Rather than drag the reporters into court, where they could have protected their sources by refusing to testify, the prosecutor subpoenaed their phone records for 11 days in 2001. A trial court prohibited the government from obtaining the records from the phone companies, but a divided appeals court reversed that decision. Now the Supreme Court, in refusing to intervene, has effectively allowed the prosecutor to search through the records in hopes he can pinpoint the source of the leak.

This is a bad outcome for the press and for the public. The phone records reveal the identities of lots of sources having nothing to do with the leaks. The appeals court's disingenuous suggestion that The Times might redact irrelevant records would simply have helped point to possible leakers.

The public will be ill served if this case reduces the willingness of officials to reveal important but sensitive information. The privilege granted to journalists to protect their sources needs to be bolstered with a strong federal shield law that would preserve the public interest in newsgathering and dissemination of information.

CIVIL LAW:

Justices Today Tackle Consumer Protection (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court today takes up a hotly contested business case with major implications for the nation's banking industry and, more broadly, for states' ability to set consumer protection and other laws that are tougher than federal standards.

The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, pits Michigan regulators, supported by consumer groups and state attorneys general, against the banking industry, federal officials and business groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. A decision is likely by July, when the court recesses for the term.

"This is really the front lines of the ongoing, evolutionary struggle over the balance of power between the federal government and the states," says Columbia Law School professor Thomas Merrill.

The states and federal government have shared jurisdiction over the banking industry. In the past several years, however, the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC) has issued rules that, among other things, expanded its authority to oversee not just national banks, but their subsidiaries.

In response, Wachovia Mortgage, operating under a Michigan charter, changed its status in 2003 to become an operating subsidiary of Wachovia Bank and told Michigan regulators it was now subject to OCC regulation. Michigan moved to bar Wachovia Mortgage from operating in the state, and Wachovia sued.

The Michigan Office of Financial and Insurance Services, headed by Linda Watters, says the OCC rules have transformed state-charted subsidiaries into "creatures of the federal government" without the permission of states. Michigan argues that the OCC's pre-emption of state regulations exceeds its power under federal law and infringes on state sovereignty in violation of the U.S. Constitution.

Banking groups, which have won in the lower courts, say the OCC has federal law and court precedent on its side. Vance Beck, associate general counsel of Wachovia, says transforming Wachovia Mortgage into a subsidiary allows the bank to operate under one federal standard rather than a costly, inefficient patchwork of state laws.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has filed a legal brief in support of the OCC, noting the decision could affect a wide swath of businesses.

The case comes as financial products have become more complex and states have passed a rash of laws to combat predatory mortgage and other lending.

Consumer groups say the case will, at a minimum, affect hundreds of banks and weaken consumer protections. They say state banking regulators have more expertise in such areas as mortgage lending and far more enforcement personnel than the OCC, and that the OCC has brought only a handful of consumer-protection cases.

"The notion that states should lose their ability to protect consumers when they're dealing with national banks or their operating subsidiaries is pretty disturbing," says Ellen Harnick of the Center for Responsible Lending.

AARP, National Consumer Federation and other groups supporting the Watters complaint assert that the OCC, rather than working on behalf of consumers, has in recent years frequently intervened on the side of national banks or their operating subsidiaries against consumers.

While the debate is now in court, it could move to Congress. Incoming House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., would like to set national standards to combat predatory mortgage lending.

Key Test Of State Power For Supreme Court (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, November 29, 2006

For 11 years, the conservative wing of the US Supreme Court did something decidedly unconservative. It sought to tip the balance of power between the national government and the states.

DOJ_NMG_0099315

This so-called federalism revolution was aimed at bolstering the status of the states as dual sovereigns in the face of an ever-expanding sphere of federal power. The justices wrote of state sovereignty and the dignity of the states in terms reminiscent of Colonial distrust of the kind of draconian central authority wielded by the British crown.

But by the time Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in 2005, the "revolution" resembled little more than a constitutional skirmish.

Now with two new members of the Supreme Court, it is unclear whether the justices might again take up the mantle of states' rights. Will a majority seek to boldly build on the string of federalism precedents handed down by the Rehnquist court, or will the judicial minimalism of Chief Justice John Roberts leave it to federal regulatory agencies and Congress to police the constitutional contours of federal-state power?

The high court's first significant opportunity to address those questions arrives in a case set for oral argument Wednesday.

At issue in Watters v. Wachovia Bank is whether a federal agency has the power to preempt state regulations governing national mortgage companies doing business within a state's borders. Put another way, the issue is who regulates mortgage companies affiliated with national banks, state regulators or federal regulators.

Traditionally, mortgage companies had to comply with state registration and other requirements. But in 2001, the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which regulates national banks, issued a new rule that subsidiary companies of national banks are governed by federal, not state, regulations.

That action preempted state laws and rules governing mortgage companies and other national bank subsidiaries operating in a particular state.

The current case arose in Michigan. Wachovia Mortgage Corp., a subsidiary of Wachovia Bank, had long done business there. The mortgage company was set up as a Michigan corporation. But because it is a subsidiary of a national bank, company officials said after the OCC rule change that they did not have to comply with Michigan regulations, only federal ones enforced by the OCC.

Linda Watters, who heads Michigan's Office of Insurance and Financial Services, insisted that the company would have to comply with state laws if it wanted to continue to conduct business there.

The dispute went to court. A federal judge and a federal appeals court panel ruled for the company. Two other federal appeals courts have also ruled against state governments in similar litigation.

Michigan is now asking the Supreme Court to reverse the lower court decision, in part, according to state lawyers, because the OCC's preemptive actions encroach on an area of traditional state power enforced by principles of federalism guaranteed in the 10th Amendment.

"In the absence of Congressional authorization, the OCC has no independent power to preempt the validly enacted legislation of a sovereign state," writes Michigan Solicitor General Thomas Casey in his brief to the court.

Lawyers for Wachovia disagree. "These rules are within the OCC's delegated rulemaking authority," says Robert Long in his brief. Any protections of state power under the 10th Amendment are abrogated by Congress's constitutional power under the commerce clause to regulate national banking, Mr. Long adds.

The Bush administration is backing Wachovia and the OCC. Federal agencies have the power to issue regulations that preempt state laws even when Congress has not specifically authorized such preemption, says Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief.

The case is being closely followed by bankers as well as other nationwide businesses that face a patchwork quilt of differing state regulations. Federal preemption offers a significantly more efficient means of conducting business nationwide.

"For some of us, we're not even sure how the 10th Amendment ended up in this case," says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the US Chamber of Commerce. "We have two new members of the court, and they have yet to show their cards in cases involving federal preemption," she says. "We see this as a pretty clear case that uniform national law is of primary importance."

Also watching the case are attorneys general from the nation's 49 other states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico, who are urging the justices to uphold Michigan's power to regulate companies doing business within its own borders.

"If [the OCC rule] is allowed to stand, it would render states powerless to protect their residents from abusive and discriminatory consumer practices by state- created entities that are operating subsidiaries of national banks," writes Caitlin Halligan, New York solicitor general, in a friend-of-the-court brief filed by the states.

Consumer protection is an area traditionally regulated by the states, Mr. Casey writes in the Michigan brief. In contrast, he says, the primary mission of the OCC is to ensure the safety and soundness of the national banking system.

There are 40 full-time OCC staff members in a central office to investigate consumer complaints against national banks and their subsidiaries, Casey says. By contrast, there are nearly 700 full-time examiners and lawyers at the state level who handle consumer complaints, he says.

Lawyers for National City Bank offer different numbers in their friend-of-the-court brief. Of OCC's 1,800 examiners, they say, 300 spend all or part of their time enforcing bank compliance with consumer-protection laws.

The OCC receives 70,000 consumer complaints a year, the National City Bank brief says, and in 2004 returned $4 million in wrongful fees and charges to complaining customers.

The brief says that state and local consumer-protection efforts "provide no real benefit to consumers." It adds that federal examiners located on-site in large national banks effectively monitor not only the financial soundness of the bank's operations but also compliance with federal consumer-protection laws.

The Power To Destroy (WSJ)

The Supreme Court today is hearing Watters v. Wachovia, a case whose lineage goes all the way back to McColluch v. Maryland in 1819. In that seminal case on the powers of the federal government, Chief Justice John Marshall famously ruled that Maryland could not levy a tax against the Bank of the United States because "the power to tax involves the power to destroy," and states lacked authority under the Constitution to "destroy" federal entities through taxation.

The Bank of the United States is long gone, but in Watters v. Wachovia states are still trying to exercise authority over federally chartered banks. The refrain in today's case could well be that the power to regulate is the power to destroy. Linda Watters, the petitioner in the case, is Michigan's state banking regulator. In 2003 she tried to bar Wachovia Mortgage Corporation from making loans in Michigan unless it submitted to direct state regulation.

Wachovia Mortgage happens to be a wholly owned, North Carolina-based subsidiary of Wachovia Bank, a national bank chartered by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, or OCC. And so Wachovia argued that its subsidiary, like the parent bank, was not subject to state regulation or registration when it came to banking activities that the parent company was authorized to conduct under federal law.

That the power to destroy is no exaggeration is illustrated best by a similar case involving Wells Fargo. California's banking regulator came within 72 hours of shutting down all Wells Fargo mortgage-lending activities in the state after the bank announced that it would no longer submit to state regulation of its mortgage-lending subsidiary. Only prompt judicial action prevented Wells Fargo's entire portfolio of mortgages in the state from being wiped off its books.

Banks have been winning cases such as Watters, in part because federal law is clear that national banks are not subject to state regulation when they conduct business authorized by the National Bank Act and regulated by the OCC. The only ambiguity is whether this federal pre-emption of state law applies equally to subsidiaries and the parent companies. But even that is a slender reed, because the subsidiaries in question aren't doing anything that the parent companies couldn't do themselves. After its brush with death in California, Wells Fargo absorbed the offending subsidiary into the parent company, despite winning in court, rather than face future state threats.

This hasn't stopped all 50 state Attorneys General from filing an amicus brief supporting state regulation of national bank subsidiaries. It should surprise no one that the brief was authored by none other than New York AG Eliot Spitzer, who has made a specialty out of intruding on traditional federal authority. Mr. Spitzer has already tangled with the OCC (and has so far lost) over national mortgage lenders, and he is not one to forget a slight. His case is to be heard by an appeals court next week.

Supporters of state regulation cry "federalism," and this paper yields to no one in trying to restrict Washington to its Constitutionally delegated powers. But the Constitution contains the Commerce Clause for a reason. If banking across state lines isn't interstate commerce, it's hard to know what is. Given that the appeals courts have sided with the banks in earlier cases, one is left to hope that the Supreme Court has taken Watters in order to eliminate whatever uncertainty remains when it comes to state regulation of national banks.

NWA Strike Appeal Argued (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, November 29, 2006

The union representing flight attendants at Northwest Airlines asked an appeals court Tuesday to overturn a judge's ruling and allow them to go on strike.

Arguing before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a lawyer for the Association of Flight Attendants-CWA, Edward Gilmartin, said the law allows for a strike because Northwest made unilateral changes in its employees' contract terms and working conditions, including imposing pay cuts.

A focus of the argument was on the federal Railway Labor Act, which governs labor relations at U.S. airlines.

The appeals court will decide whether New York U.S. District Court Judge Victor Marrero properly overruled a bankruptcy court judge over the summer when he stopped the flight attendants from engaging in any strike activity.

Northwest is operating in bankruptcy protection, and it imposed the cuts after union members twice voted down negotiated settlements with the airline. Northwest maintains it needs the cuts to exit bankruptcy.

A lawyer for Northwest, meanwhile, said that the airline wants peace with its flight attendants and urged a federal appeals court to support a judge's decision to block the workers from striking.

And the U.S. Justice Department, represented by Assistant U.S. Attorney Heidi Wendel, argued that a strike, "would come at the expense of the public."

Northwest lawyer Brian Leitch told the court that the airline would continue to negotiate with representatives of its 7,300 active flight attendants who were prevented from striking on Aug. 25 after the company imposed the pay cuts.

"Northwest recognizes we still have to achieve an agreement with our flight attendants," Leitch told the three-judge panel. "It's just good business."

The bankruptcy judge let Northwest slice pay and benefits for its flight attendants. The union has said the cuts amounted to 40 percent.

At Tuesday's hearing, lawyers for the Air Line Pilots Association appeared in court in support of the AFA's appeal.

Northwest said it believes the appeals court will uphold the judge's ruling. The Eagan-based airline outlined to the court "why it believes that provisions of the Railway Labor Act apply during the airline's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings," said company spokesman Roman Blahoski.

"We feel very confident that the appeals court will uphold the Railway Labor Act and our right to go on strike," said Ricky Thornton, a spokesman for the AFA at Northwest.

The three-judge panel, which didn't immediately rule, acknowledged that it had never considered a case quite like it.

Chief Judge Dennis Jacobs cautioned the lawyers to keep in mind that there was more to the dispute than flight attendants and an airline company that carries 130,000 passengers a day on 1,200 flights.

"There's a third party — the public interest," Jacobs said. He noted that Congress has purposely structured labor laws regarding the transportation industry to ensure "the ability to travel from here to there."

Another judge, John Walker Jr., interrupted AFA attorney Gilmartin shortly after he said Northwest tried to win concessions through the courts that it was unable to get at the bargaining table.

"That's one way to look at it," Walker said. "Another way is to say that this is a company in financial distress looking to get reorganized."

Judge Reene Raggi said Northwest did what the law permitted it to do by seeking permission from the bankruptcy judge to impose pay cuts.

In a related development, Northwest and the AFA are scheduled to continue their mediated negotiations on a consensual contract on Dec. 12 in Minneapolis. The airline remains committed to negotiating a consensual agreement with its flight attendants. The AFA has repeatedly said that talks are at an impasse.

Schools Appeal Ruling On No Child Suit (AP-Y)

By Terry Kinney, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

School districts in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to revive a lawsuit challenging the way government-mandated programs are funded.

The National Education Association and districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law, President Bush's signature education policy. They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government.

Chief U.S. District Judge Bernard A. Friedman in Detroit dismissed the lawsuit in November 2005.

Attorney Robert Chanin, representing the Pontiac, Mich., school district and the other plaintiffs, told the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday that states submitted compliance plans based on their understanding of the level of government support that would be provided. But Congress appropriated far less than needed, leaving local school districts to make up the difference, he said.

Government attorney Alisa Klein told the panel that the intent of the law was never to fully fund the provisions laid out in No Child Left Behind.

The law requires states to revise academic standards and develop tests to measure students' progress annually. If students fail to make progress, the law requires states to take action against school districts.

The three-judge appeals court panel took the case under advisement and did not say when it will rule. The outcome would apply directly to the districts in the case, but could affect how the law is enforced in schools across the country.

Justice Dept. Settles Saraland Housing Discrimination Claims (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

SARALAND, Ala. (AP) — The Justice Department reached a housing discrimination case settlement Tuesday with a landlord in Saraland accused of trying to force a white renter out of an apartment after learning she had a biracial daughter.

The settlement, which includes a $40,000 damages payment, stems from a federal complaint alleging that Beulah Stevens violated the federal Fair Housing Act in her actions against Michele Jones, according to the Justice Department.

Although Jones is white, the complaint states that Stevens tried to force Jones out of the apartment "upon learning that her child is biracial and that she associated with African Americans," the agency said in a news release. It also said Stevens was accused of using racial epithets when speaking about black people.

According to the complaint, two fair housing tests carried out by the Mobile Fair Housing Center — now called the Center for Fair Housing, Inc. — showed that Stevens, who manages 19 rental properties, treated white testers who asked about availability of rental units more favorably than black testers.

Stevens said Tuesday that the claims were baseless.

"There's not a prejudiced bone in my body," she told The Associated Press in a phone interview. "I like black people. I grew up playing with black people, eating with them and everything else."

Stevens said her objection to Jones was based on other legitimate grounds.

Under the settlement, Stevens agreed to pay more than $40,000 in damages and penalties, to post a non-discriminatory rental policy, to undergo training on the requirements of the Fair Housing Act and to submit periodic reports to the Justice Department.

The settlement still needs to be approved by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama.

"This case shows that the Department of Justice and this office believe that housing discrimination is a serious violation of the law," said U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes of Mobile. "We will enforce federal laws against racial discrimination."

N.Y. Mayor Meets With Dead Groom's Family (CNN)

CNN.com, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK (CNN) -- New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg met Tuesday with the family of a man shot and killed by police early Saturday in an incident that has sparked community outrage and could lead to a federal investigation.

Sean Bell, 23, was shot to death by police officers outside a Queens nightclub hours before he was to be married to the mother of his two children.

Two others -- 31-year-old Joseph Guzman and 23-year-old Trent Benefield -- were seriously wounded in the incident.

Bloomberg told reporters he met for an hour with Bell's family and fiancee to express his condolences and discuss the investigation of the incident. (Watch Bell's father explain his son's fear of police)

Community leaders have demanded to know why NYPD officers fired as many as 50 rounds -- one officer alone fired 31 shots -- at the unarmed group of men as they were leaving Bell's bachelor party early Saturday morning. (Watch police acknowledge 'contagious shooting')

"They are obviously feeling a terrible pain, and the one thing that they would like the mayor to say is the one thing the mayor can't say -- that there is nothing the mayor can do to bring back their son or their fiance," Bloomberg said of Bell's loved ones.

Bell was pronounced dead Saturday at Jamaica Hospital in Queens. An autopsy showed he was struck four times in the neck and torso.

As of Tuesday, Guzman remained in critical condition after being shot at least 11 times and Benefield was in stable condition with three bullet wounds, said a representative of Mary Immaculate Hospital in Queens where the two are being treated.

All five police officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave Sunday pending an investigation by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown.

Bloomberg said Brown's office was investigating the incident diligently and trying to determine whether a grand jury should be involved.

"District Attorney Brown is the one who now has responsibility for trying to ascertain what happened," Bloomberg said.

Bloomberg rejected claims that the incident was racially motivated, citing an NYPD policy against ethnic profiling.

Many black leaders have said the victims, all African-American, were unjustly targeted because of their race.

"There's no evidence that race had anything to do with it," Bloomberg said. "The police officers were as diverse as the people in the car." (Watch how high-capacity police weapons may bear part of blame)

Federal law enforcement officials said the Justice Department was nearing the formal opening of a federal civil rights investigation into the fatal shooting.

Justice Department officials acknowledged the matter remained under review and that federal authorities in Washington and New York continued to monitor events in the aftermath of the shooting.

Officials declined to confirm that a decision to formally investigate the case could be announced as early as Tuesday or Wednesday.

FBI officials asking not to be identified said they expected the Justice Department "very soon" to request agents for the federal probe.

"Until that happens, this investigation is completely in the hands of the Queens district attorney," said one FBI official.

The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division frequently investigates cases in which law enforcement actions taken against members of minority groups prompt complaints of police violations of federal civil rights statutes.

Shooter: They Knew I Was Cop (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar And Corky Siemaszko, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, November 29, 2006

The undercover cop who fired the opening salvo in a 50-shot barrage that felled a Queens man on his wedding day told his story yesterday for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0099320

The detective insisted he identified himself as a cop well before he fired on the car carrying Sean Bell and his buddies.

"This cop screamed, 'Police!' and he had his shield out," attorney Philip Karasyk told the Daily News.

The News is withholding the name of the Brooklyn-born detective to protect his safety and the undercover operations he has worked on.

The detective held his fire despite Bell clipping him with his Nissan Altima, said Karasyk, who refused to name his client, even as police sources confirmed his identity.

"Once the car hit him, he jumped to the side," Karasyk said.

But when the cop saw the man sitting in the passenger seat - whom police sources identified as Joseph Guzman - reach into his waistband, the officer fired the first of 11 rounds at the men.

Four other officers, believing they were being shot at, also opened up on the car, Karasyk said. When the gunfire was over, Bell was dead and Guzman and another man, Trent Benefield, were badly wounded.

"The other officers believed the shots were coming from the vehicle," Karasyk said. "They only did so in this case because they were in mortal fear for their lives."

Queens District Attorney Richard Brown has vowed to get to the bottom of the Saturday morning shooting that has outraged black New Yorkers - and that Mayor Bloomberg said looked like "excessive force."

Karasyk, however, said the five cops involved in the shooting - none of whom ever fired his gun on the job before - had no qualms about telling their stories before a Queens grand jury.

"That's our offer to the prosecutors - to waive immunity," Karasyk said.

The lawyer's client is a Hispanic officer in his late 20s.

A 66-year-old relative told The News that the detective is a good cop.

"Only God knows what happened," he said. "Police never shoot for no reason. Maybe he's got a reason."

The Justice Department is monitoring the unfolding investigation, but Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslyn Mauskopf emphasized it is not independently collecting evidence or interviewing witnesses.

At an NAACP meeting in Queens last night, black leaders called for the feds to appoint a special prosecutor if Brown doesn't obtain an indictment.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said police were questioning a new witness. Sources said that witness was China Flores, who had told The News that a fourth man nearly jumped in Bell's car before the shooting.

Police are still searching for that fourth man, who is believed to have left the Kalua Cabaret in Jamaica, Queens, with the victims - and to have disappeared shortly before the shooting started. Police also believe that the mystery man may have been armed.

All five officers have been placed on paid leave and ordered to surrender their guns.

Life-long friends Guzman and Benefield took Bell out for a bachelor bash at the club - unaware that cops investigating drugs and prostitution were staking out the joint.

Two undercover detectives - Karasyk's client and a female officer - were inside. NYPD guidelines permitted them to have two drinks; Kelly said it wasn't yet known whether Karasyk's client was drinking because he hasn't been questioned pending the grand jury probe.

When Bell and his pals left at 4 a.m., Karasyk's client followed. Kelly conceded on Monday that it was unusual for an undercover officer to pursue suspects; normally, the undercover signals his colleagues to move in.

Karasyk said his client followed because he heard Guzman say outside the club that he was going to get a gun to settle a beef with another club patron.

Many in the African-American community believe there was a racial component to the shooting because Bell and Benefield are both black.

Detective Mike Oliver, who fired 31 shots, and Officer Mike Carey, who fired three times, are both white - as is Lt. Gerard Napoli, the supervising officer who did not fire his weapon. The two other officers who fired the remaining shots are both black. Their names have not been revealed.

Investigators have a mountain of evidence to go through, and there also are more than 50 people to interview, delaying the empaneling of the grand jury. If charges are brought, all the cops' names will come out.

Rally Held For Elderly Woman Slain By Police (AJC)

By Saeed Ahmed, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 28, 2006

About 70 residents gathered outside the house of Kathryn Johnston Tuesday evening, some holding placards condemning police, others venting angrily about the botched narcotics raid that claimed the life of the elderly woman a week ago.

"I'm enraged," said Walterine Jones, 50. "I mean, my God, if they can do this to an elderly woman like her, what does it mean for the safety of the rest of us."

The rally participants marched to a church for a community meeting, bringing the crowd to about 300.

Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington addressed the crowd, saying he became concerned after community response to the shooting.

When he learned that the information he received conflicted with what a confidential informant told the Internal Affairs Unit, he brought in the FBI to lead the investigation, he said.

"I am not new to police misconduct," he said. "I've worked in Washington, D.C., and New Orleans. I've made this move based on law enforcement and my gut feeling."

Marchers to the church carried signs that mocked the police, passed around by rally organizers, the New Black Panther for Self-Defense.

"Warning taxpayers & black citizens. Don't dial 911. The police will kill you," said one.

Another was a cartoon of a smiling uniformed officer holding a phone, with the caption: "They gave me administrative leave ... with pay. Kill a black citizen and get paid."

The message was a reference to Pennington's decision to place on paid leave the sargeant and seven detectives who are part of it.

Residents angry

Even without the signs, there was plenty of anger to go around among those who gathered in front of a makeshift memorial outside the now-boarded up house where Johnston died in a gunbattle with officers.

Residents said that while crime is rampant in the area, the stretch of Neal Street where Johnson lived alone for almost two decades was home to other elderly residents.

"There's crime that needs to be tackled here, that's true. But this road right here, there's never been any drug dealing here," said Michael Jaye, 46, who has lived in the area since he was 4.

"But the police don't come here to fight crime. They come to knock heads," he added. Johnny Colbert, 27, echoed many of the attendees' suspicion that police made up the description of "Sam," who they said was the man who sold drug to an undercover informant.

"There are a lot of 'Sam' around here. They are all make-believe by the police," he said.

As some of the attendees pumped fists into the air and shouted "Black Power" at the exhortation of the organizers, a handful of stoic GBI and FBI agents stood by watching.

On a nearby porch, an elderly woman leaned on the railing, straining to catch what was happening.

She too would have walked down and shown her support, she said. But she was too feeble to, she said.

The meeting, at the Lindsay Street Baptist Church on North Avenue, was organized by State Sen. Vincent Fort and Rep. "Able" Mabel Thomas, both Democrats from Atlanta.

"I just don't understand how you bust in someone's house and don't know who lives there," said Mary Thomas, an usher at the church. "My daughter and I said this could be any of us."

Joe Cobb, who works in the neighborhood, said he never believed Johnston or anyone else sold drugs at the house.

"What's unfolding just reinforces what I first thought: the police lied," he said.

Services Held For Woman Slain By Atlanta Police (AJC)

By S.a. Reid , Rhonda Cook, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 29, 2006

Friends and family who gathered at an East Point funeral home Tuesday for the funeral of Kathryn Johnston said they just want to know the truth about the drug raid that led to the elderly woman's death.

"When this occurred, we were shocked that this could be real," said Johnston's niece, JoAnne Trawick. "I've always believed from the beginning that this was a mistake."

Commenting on revelations that the informant narcotics officers say led them to the Johnston's house is accusing the officers of asking him to lie about his role, Trawick said, "I hope he is telling the truth.

"Nobody wins in this situation," Trawick said, outside Gus Thornhill's Funeral Home. "We just want to see the truth come to light."

Vera Washington, Johnston's sister-in-law, said she suspected police "were lying all the time. A woman that age would not be selling drugs."

The Rev. Markel Hutchins, who has acted as spokesman for the family, said Johnston's family is encouraged by the FBI's entry into the investigation of the Nov. 21 gun battle that left Johnston dead and three narcotics officers wounded.

"They had zero confidence before yesterday," Hutchins said. "Now their confidence is increased."

"Finally, the truth is coming out so that her name will not be seen in such a bad light," said family friend Carletta Sutton. "I think that a number of people expressed concern that her memory and her name has been sullied by the allegations that drugs have been sold from her house."

A neighbor of Johnston's, Utamu Onaje, said Johnston practiced holistic health and "didn't even take medications, let alone drugs.

"She should have been able to be safe in her hown house," Onaje said.

Johnston's funeral service drew about 100 people, including members of the New Black Panthers Party for Self-Defense and Atlanta City Council members C.T. Martin and Mary Norwood.

The Rev. Robert Melson offered words of comfort and encouragement as Johnston lay in a steel gray, closed casket topped with a spray of pink and white carnations mixed with baby's breath.

Melson prayed for justice and for God to bring peace to the souls of Johnston's family and friends.

"Sleep on mother," he said, referring to Johnston. "We love you, but God loves you best."

Kelly Hill, a young friend, described Johnston as " the strongest person I've ever known "and said she often spoke, as senior citizens sometime do, of being ready for death and that the time was near.

"I never thought I'd see her leave this earth the way that I did," said Hill during her emotional remarks at the service.

Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington confirmed Monday that the informant now claims police asked him to lie about his role in an alleged drug buy that led to the shooting.

The informant, who has not been identified, complained to department officials that the drug investigators involved in the bust had asked him to go along with a story they concocted after the shooting, said Pennington. He said the informant had been placed in protective custody.

The informant told an Atlanta television station that the officers asked him to lie to provide them cover in the shooting.

Pennington confirmed the television station's account of what the informant had claimed and said it mirrored what the informant had told his internal affairs unit over the weekend.

"The informant said he had no knowledge of going into that house and purchasing drugs," Pennington said. "We don't know if he's telling the truth."

8 officers suspended with pay

All seven narcotics investigators and a sergeant have been suspended with pay pending the investigation, Pennington said. Their names were not made public.

"The complete truth will be known," Pennington said.

After nearly a week of unanswered questions prompted by the northwest Atlanta shooting of Johnston, the chief on Monday called for an unusual multi-agency review of the incident.

Pennington announced the investigation at a news conference that featured officials from the U.S. attorney's office, the FBI, the Georgia Bureau of Investigation and the Fulton district attorney's office.

David Nahmias, the U.S. attorney in Atlanta, said federal agents "come to this investigation with an open mind," but he cautioned that anyone who lies could face federal charges.

"No one should get in the way of the truth," Nahmias said.

Johnston was shot to death last Tuesday night as the drug investigators burst into her house at 933 Neal St. Johnston was shot twice in the chest by officers who have said that they were returning her fire.

The 88-year-old woman, whose age was previously reported as 92, wounded three of the officers with a rusty revolver her niece said she had bought her aunt for her protection. One officer was hit three times, including once in the center of his bulletproof vest, while the other two where shot once each. None of their wounds were life threatening.

Police officials have said the officers went to Johnston's small brick house after the informant purchased drugs there from a man identified only as "Sam." Police have obtained an arrest warrant for Sam.

In a court affidavit released Monday, Jason R. Smith, an Atlanta narcotics officer, said that the informant had used $50 of city money to buy crack cocaine from Sam at the Neal Street house. Smith, who could not be reached for comment Monday night, described the informant as a reliable source who has helped police make drug arrests in the past.

In the affidavit, Smith said Sam greeted the informant at the front door and spoke briefly to him on the porch. Sam disappeared into the house and reappeared with two bags of crack cocaine, which the informant later turned over to the officers, according to the affidavit. Smith's statement also said that the informant had alleged that Sam had installed surveillance cameras at the house and monitored them constantly.

Smith's affidavit was sufficient to persuade Fulton County Magistrate Kimberly Warden to sign a warrant allowing the officers to enter the house without knocking at the door. Smith asked for the special "no-knock" authorization because of the possibility that officers would be injured or evidence would be destroyed. Warden signed the warrant shortly before 6 p.m., about an hour before the shooting.

However, the informant has since denied to police and a local television station that he purchased the drugs. He also said there was no person named Sam.

The informant, who said he worked with Atlanta police for four years, also told WAGA-TV that he hadn't been to 933 Neal St. His identity hidden, he told the TV station that one of the drug officers called him soon after the shooting with instructions.

Quoting the officers, the informant told Fox 5 News: " 'This is what you need to do. You need to cover our [rear]. ... It's all on you man. ... You need to tell them about this Sam dude.' "

Pennington said investigators were trying to determine the truth. "I don't know if he went in or not," he said.

Many questions and conflicting accounts have surfaced since police shot the woman, described by neighbors as feeble and afraid to open her door after dark. At first police said that the drug buy was made by undercover police, but later they said the purchase was made by an informant. Early on, police said narcotics were found at the house after the shooting, but on Sunday investigators said they had found only a small amount of marijuana, which police don't consider a narcotic.

Also, even though the affidavit said that the house was outfitted with surveillance cameras, Pennington said the informant had told internal affairs investigators that police officers had asked him to lie about the cameras. Pennington could not confirm whether the cameras existed.

From the beginning, it has been unclear why police targeted the woman's house, and the affidavit and warrant documents shed little light. The documents do not suggest that police had been keeping the house under surveillance and provide no rationale for entering it other than the informant's alleged buy earlier in the afternoon. The raid did not produce the cocaine, money, computers and other equipment related to the drug business alleged in the affidavit. The documents listed the only resident as Sam, who was described as at least 6 feet tall and 250 to 260 pounds. Johnston's family said she lived alone.

Court officials initially refused to release the affidavits and search warrant even though state law requires that such records be made available immediately. The documents were made public Monday, nearly a week after the incident.

"There are many unanswered questions," said Pennington, who returned Sunday after being out of town for the Thanksgiving holiday when the shooting occurred.

Mayor Shirley Franklin, who has said little publicly about the shooting, said she had discussed the allegations with Pennington. Franklin said the chief has "my confidence that they will be transparent and honest and very thorough in their review. ..."

"I certainly share the concern that all of us have on the loss of life," Franklin said. "We were not expecting something like that could happen in the city of Atlanta."

Shootings By Police Spur Debate (USAT)

By Larry Copeland, Usa Today

USA Today, November 29, 2006

ATLANTA — An 88-year-old woman killed last week in a shootout with plainclothes police who burst into her home was laid to rest Tuesday amid a burgeoning national debate over police use of deadly force.

Kathryn Johnston was killed Nov. 21 when she fired at undercover narcotics agents who had obtained a "no-knock" search warrant for her home after telling a judge that a confidential informant had bought drugs there earlier in the day.

The FBI is leading a probe of the incident, in which Johnston wounded three officers, after the informant told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV that he never bought drugs at the house but that a narcotics officer had instructed him to say that he had. "I'm telling them, I never went to that house," he says in an interview in which his face was disguised.

Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington says the man, who has not been publicly identified, "told us he had no knowledge of going to that house and purchasing drugs. I don't know if he's telling the truth."

Seven narcotics investigators and a police sergeant have been placed on paid leave until the inquiry is completed, a routine procedure in such cases.

More than 200 people rallied in Johnston's northwest Atlanta neighborhood Tuesday evening to demand answers in the shooting, one of several that have put police use of deadly force under increased scrutiny.

In New York City early Saturday, Sean Bell, 23, was killed after he left a bachelor party at a strip club that was the target of an undercover police investigation. Police fired more than 50 shots at a car carrying Bell and two friends, both of whom were wounded.

NEW YORK SHOOTING: Bloomberg meets with family

The district attorney in DeKalb County, an Atlanta suburb where 12 people have been killed by police this year, says she may present evidence to a grand jury.

Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., whose district includes DeKalb County, is seeking congressional hearings on police use of deadly force nationwide, according to a letter she sent to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and incoming House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich.

"While I support police officers in their efforts to combat crime, our citizens have become alarmingly frightened ... that some, if not most, of these police involved shootings may have been preventable," wrote McKinney, who is leaving office in January after losing a re-election bid.

Charles Steele, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, an Atlanta-based civil rights organization, called "for an evaluation of adequate and proper communication efforts by police departments nationwide. These senseless deaths ... must cease immediately."

Some criminal justice experts cautioned against over-reacting to the shootings.

"Police departments have become far more scrupulous in training and accountability and are recruiting people to try to minimize the number of police-involved shootings," says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a think tank in Washington, D.C.

"There are much tighter controls on the use of force. Police departments have significantly narrowed the conditions under which police can use deadly force," he said.

He says there were 80 to 100 police-involved shooting fatalities a year in New York during the 1970s; in recent years, that has fallen to 10 to 15.

Robert J. Kane, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University in Boston who specializes in police authority and accountability, says the shootings by police stem from a more aggressive approach nationally to policing.

"They come at a time when police officers are rapidly expanding the use of police paramilitary units and highly aggressive drug enforcement units," Kane says. "In the 1990s, you had a community policing movement. Police departments were encouraged to share some crime prevention responsibility with the public. Around 1996, you had this movement toward zero-tolerance strategies. ... A lot of cities are creating police paramilitary units. They drive around and look for trouble, and they often find trouble."

In Johnston's northwest Atlanta community, a gentrifying neighborhood that has pockets of crime and drug activity, neighbors say Johnston was not involved in anything illegal.

"That lady was no drug dealer," says Vickie Harris, 33, who has lived in the neighborhood for about eight years. Police, she says, "made a mistake. They ought to just admit it."

Police Shootings And New York: Lessons Learned (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK

Call it a tale of two shootings. In each, an unarmed black man is killed in New York in a hail of bullets fired by police, fearing, rightly or wrongly, for their lives.

But the different responses of city leaders to last weekend's shooting of Sean Bell in Queens and the 1999 death of Amadou Diallo in the Bronx tell a tale of a city's evolution and its ability to learn the importance of acknowledging a community's outrage and responding to it. Such a changed response is evident not just in New York, but in other cities across the country.

Almost as soon as Mayor Michael Bloomberg heard Saturday that police fired 50 times on three possibly unarmed black men, he began reaching out to political, religious, and community leaders, assuring them a full, fair investigation would take place. By Monday morning, the mayor, police commissioner, and dozens of black leaders - many still angry - came together at City Hall.

In the immediate aftermath of the 1999 death of Mr. Diallo, a West African immigrant shot in the entry to his apartment building, then-Mayor Rudolph Giuliani defiantly defended the police. He didn't meet with local black leaders until weeks later. Thousands of protesters poured into the streets, prompting more than 1,700 arrests.

"You learn from your errors," says Douglas Muzzio, a political analyst at the School of Public Affairs at Baruch College in New York. "The reaction reflects in part the mayor's personality and the police commissioner's professional personality, but they learned from what Giuliani did, and they're not going to make the same mistakes."

New York's reaction is emblematic of changes in community/police relations across the country. From Cincinnati to Atlanta to Los Angeles, police departments have realized they need the cooperation and support of minority communities - those that usually felt the brunt of the "get tough" crime initiatives of the 1990s. In each city, fumbled political reactions to a charge of police misconduct - whether it was the 1991 beating of Rodney King in Los Angeles or the 2001 shooting of a young black man in Cincinnati - have taught lessons about the importance of reaching out, urging calm, and dealing with nothing but the facts.

"There's now a more proactive, customer-service-oriented attitude and response in the aftermath of these incidents because police departments all over the country now understand their aggressive enforcement actions are typically felt disproportionately in the minority communities, and that further strains police/community relations," says Jack Riley, acting director of the Center on Quality Policing at the RAND Corp. in Pittsburgh. "With crime rates heading back up, the last thing you want to do is alienate a constituency you need to help keep crime level."

In New York, at a press conference with community leaders this week, Mayor Bloomberg remarked several times that no one was more "disturbed" than he and Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly by last Saturday's shooting. Mr. Bell and two friends were leaving a strip joint after a bachelor party when an undercover officer, who was part of a larger operation at the club, thought he heard one of Bell's group say, "Yo, go get my gun." When the officer approached the car, an altercation erupted and police started firing. It's unclear whether the officer identified himself as a policeman or what prompted the gunfire that killed Bell and wounded two others, one critically.

"To me, it is unacceptable and inexplicable how you have 50-odd shots fired, but that's for the investigation to find out what happened," says Bloomberg. "We will tell everyone everything we know when we know, and we will not speculate."

Bloomberg also said he did not believe the shooting was racially motivated. Two of the shooting victims were black, and one was Hispanic. Two of the officers involved were black, two were white, and one was Hispanic. All five have been suspended.

"This is a much better response than the Giuliani administration [to the Diallo shooting], much more open and much more direct," says City Councilman Leroy Comrie of Queens. "A lot of people in this city are uncomfortable with the police department and its tone on the streets, but so far I'm satisfied [that] the mayor and the police commissioner have done their utmost to provide as much detail as possible."

Most political analysts are applauding the city's response so far, but some say it's unfair to compare the way Mr. Giuliani and Bloomberg handled the two shootings. Giuliani, who defeated the city's first African-American mayor, had strained relations with the minority community from the start. In reforming the city's finances, he also took on its various interest groups, including those in the black community, according to political analyst Fred Siegel, author of "The Prince of the City: Giuliani, New York and the Genius of American Life." Finally, the Diallo incident occurred at a time when the mayor's personal and marital problems had become regular public fodder.

"The Diallo affair comes at the beginning of Giuliani's personal meltdown," says Mr. Siegel. "This isn't a criticism of Bloomberg. I just don't think it's a fair comparison."

Other analysts say the city is also different as a result of 9/11 and the work Bloomberg has done in repairing relations with the black and Hispanic communities. He's worked to keep lines of communication open on a regular basis.

"You can't just have people talking to each other at a time of crisis. There has to be a foundation for communication. Otherwise, you're just managing the consequences of the crisis," says Mr. Riley of RAND.

50 Shots (WSJ)

By Joseph D. Mcnamara

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Around 4 a.m. on Saturday, Nov. 25, several New York City police officers in plain clothes fired an estimated 50 shots at a car, wounding two black men and killing a third, 23-year-old Sean Bell. Some police bullets penetrated nearby homes. Although an undercover officer had called for back-up, indicating that the three suspects had a gun, no weapon was found in the aftermath.

Inescapably, comparisons were made between Mr. Bell (who was to have been married later on Saturday) and Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant killed in a volley of 41 bullets by four NYPD plainclothes officers in February 1999. Mr. Diallo had committed no crime and was attempting to enter his own hallway when one of the undercover officers yelled, "Gun!" The four officers were acquitted in a trial held outside the city, based upon their defense that they reasonably believed their lives were in danger.

In both cases, the NYPD accurately cited statistics indicating that it had a comparatively low shooting rate, and that shootings by police were not rising. And in both instances, New York's black leaders and black communities reacted with understandable outrage that unarmed black men were killed with such a volume of gunfire. Both sides seemed to be talking past one another, instead of to each other.

After the Diallo case, I wrote that I, my father, older brother and countless other relatives had collectively served the NYPD for more than a century and a half and that none of us would have fired at Mr. Diallo. I say the same about the lethal volley that took Mr. Bell's life, based on initial reports.

Simply put, the police culture in our country has changed. An emphasis on "officer safety" and paramilitary training pervades today's policing, in contrast to the older culture, which held that cops didn't shoot until they were about to be shot or stabbed. Police in large cities formerly carried revolvers holding six .38-caliber rounds. Nowadays, police carry semi-automatic pistols with 16 high-caliber rounds, shotguns and military assault rifles, weapons once relegated to SWAT teams facing extraordinary circumstances. Concern about such firepower in densely populated areas hitting innocent citizens has given way to an attitude that the police are fighting a war against drugs and crime and must be heavily armed.

Yes, police work is dangerous, and the police see a lot of violence. On the other hand, 51 officers were slain in the line of duty last year, out of some 700,000 to 800,000 American cops. That is far fewer than the police fatalities occurring when I patrolled New York's highest crime precincts, when the total number of cops in the country was half that of today. Each of these police deaths and numerous other police injuries is a tragedy and we owe support to those who protect us. On the other hand, this isn't Iraq. The need to give our officers what they require to protect themselves and us has to be balanced against the fact that the fundamental duty of the police is to protect human life and that law officers are only justified in taking a life as a last resort.

There appear to be important differences between the killings of Mr. Diallo and Mr. Bell. Mr. Diallo was no threat to anyone. First reports are that the car occupied by Mr. Bell deliberately struck an undercover officer after he had identified himself. In addition, it is clear that the current police commissioner and mayor have established much better relations with the black community than their predecessors. Both Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Commissioner Raymond Kelly have been as critical of the current shooting as permitted under due process. Yet when all is said and done, those with official responsibility to ensure that the innocent are protected, not harmed, by the police must constantly evaluate all police training, tactics, arms and attitudes.

L.A. Officers Cleared In Child's Killing (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

The police board says toddler Suzie Peña's death in a gun battle was the fault of her father, but mistakes were made.

The LAPD officers who stormed a South L.A. auto shop last year, killing 19-month-old hostage Suzie Peña during a gun battle with her father, followed department rules and should not be punished, the Police Commission ruled Tuesday.

But the oversight panel found problems in the way the Los Angeles Police Department field command responded and managed the crisis and singled out for potential discipline two officers who fired their weapons from the periphery very early in the 2 1/2 -hour siege.

"There was a systemic breakdown at the command and leadership level," Commission President John Mack said. "This incident is nothing short of tragic. It's tragic for all of us. The officers involved, and the community at large. It is a loss for Los Angeles and will be remembered as a sad and tragic day in our history."

One SWAT officer was wounded in the gun battle with Jose Raul Peña, who held his daughter in his arm as he repeatedly fired his gun at officers at his Watts car sales business in July 2005.

The commission announcement came hours after the district attorney cleared of criminal wrongdoing the 11 police officers who fired their weapons, even as the toddler's family and community activists demanded that the panel discipline the officers involved in the confrontation.

The commission announced its finding after a nine-hour, closed-door meeting with Police Chief William J. Bratton in which the panel unanimously backed all of his recommendations on which officers acted in and out of policy.

Mack and other panelists said the SWAT standoff highlighted shortcomings in the way the LAPD handles such incidents — including communications among elite units — that must be immediately addressed.

Specifically, the commission wants to hold commanders managing the scene more accountable for the actions of officers on the ground. The panel ordered Bratton in the future to review the actions of commanders with the same degree of detail that officers' actions receive.

Other reforms proposed include modifications for the use of urban police rifles and better training for officers as well as commanders and an examination of how to better storm a building in hostage situations.

Altogether, 13 officers, three sergeants and one lieutenant were ordered to undergo additional training because of concerns about their tactics during the incident.

The commission went out of its way to clear the handful of officers who actually stormed the building at the end of the standoff. In fact, the panel said many officers involved in the case "took courageous steps to defuse a frightening situation."

They noted that Suzie's father fired 15 of his 39 rounds at the officers in the final moments of the conflict while holding his daughter in his arms.

But they also found that two officers who fired and missed Peña from the periphery of the site near the beginning of the confrontation violated department policy in their tactics and the firing of their weapons.

Suzi's mother, Lorena Lopez, said afterward that she was disappointed that the officers involved in the final confrontation were not found to have violated policy.

"I did not get justice," Lopez said, adding that she would press ahead with her lawsuit "to get justice."

Bratton acknowledged the command and control concerns and said some officers will be disciplined and receive training as a result of failing to follow department policy on tactics and the use of force.

"This was not a good day for anybody," Bratton said. "It was a tragic day."

But, he added that officers did an "outstanding job" overall, given the chaotic situation.

"I want to commend the men and women of this department who in every instance of this incident behaved courageously, marching toward danger, every one of whose interest and intent was to save the life of the hostages," Bratton said.

His use of the word "outstanding" drew a sharp rebuke from Luis Carrillo, the attorney for Lopez.

"The police could have waited before storming in like cowboys," Carrillo told the chief and commission as he and the family stormed out of the meeting. "It was not an outstanding day when a baby died at the end of the day."

Hours earlier, the Los Angeles County district attorney's office announced that it had declined to file criminal charges against the officers involved in the standoff.

A report by that office found that the officers acted in defense of their own lives when they shot and killed Peña and "inadvertently hit with rounds" and killed Suzie, who was being used as a shield.

In a 10-page letter, Deputy Dist. Atty. Renee S. Cartaya wrote that the 11 officers "acted lawfully in self-defense and in defense of others when they used deadly force against Jose Peña." Prosecutors noted that Peña was using cocaine, engaged in a series of gun battles and had become irrational and told police he was fictional gangster Tony Montana from the movie "Scarface."

Police commissioners and prosecutors were particularly affected by tapes of telephone conversations during the siege.

Peña told an officer by phone earlier, according to prosecutors, "I'm going to hell. Me and the baby will go to hell before I ever leave this baby with my wife."

A 15-month investigation was unable to determine which of the officers killed the child as they tried to rescue her from her father's arms.

Commissioners agreed with Bratton that ultimately, Jose Peña was responsible for the toddler's death.

According to the district's attorney's account, the final confrontation began about 6:20 p.m. after Peña cut off communications and appeared with a pistol in his waistband.

He was holding the child by a backdoor and refused an order to put her down.

Seeing Peña trying to draw his weapon, Officer Dennis O'Sullivan, positioned on top of an armored vehicle, fired at him, according to the report.

SWAT Officer Chester McMillion then ordered an emergency assault after seeing Peña flinch as if he had been struck.

Once inside, officers found that Peña had fled to an inner office. SWAT officers heard gunshots and saw bullets come through the wall of the office, the report said.

Deploying a flash-bang device, Officers Dan Sanchez, Eduardo Perez, William Casey and Robert Gallegos Jr. entered the office and a gun battle ensued. Sanchez was shot in the shoulder by Peña.

DOJ_NMG_0099329

Seeing Peña slump behind the desk with the baby on his lap, an officer rushed forward to grab the child only to realize Suzie had been fatally wounded. Simultaneously, prosecutors said, Peña reached for his pistol and Perez and Gallegos shot him in the head.

The toddler's family disputed the district attorney's finding that the officers acted in self-defense.

"There were plenty of police officers. The SWAT team was there," said Suzie's sister Ilsy DePaz, who was rescued from the scene by police.

"I don't see how they were acting in defense," she said. "You don't shoot a flash-bang grenade into a small office and expect for a little baby to come out alive."

Man Pleads Guilty In Shrine Desecration (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - WEST BEND, Wis.-A 21-year-old man pleaded guilty Monday to desecrating one of Wisconsin's most popular religious shrines to commemorate "Satan's birthday."

Tyler Groth pleaded guilty to felony criminal damage to religious property, and could face up to a year and a half in jail when he is sentenced Jan. 11.

Groth and his 17-year-old cousin, David J. Groth, were accused of spraying paint on statues and spray painting a devil's face at several locations in June at the Basilica of Holy Hill, National Shrine of Mary, in Erin.

It was to commemorate the date 06-06-06, and Tyler Groth told investigators the date is "Satan's birthday." In the Bible, the Book of Revelation describes triple sixes as the mark of the Antichrist.

Groth agreed to plead guilty in exchange for the dismissal of two unrelated misdemeanor graffiti charges, his attorney said.

David Groth had pleaded no contest to the same charge. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 11.

Judge Orders Hearing On Voting Districts (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, November 29, 2006

OSCEOLA COUNTY -- - A federal judge who ruled that Osceola's countywide elections for commissioners violates the U.S. Voting Rights Act on Monday ordered a hearing in the case next week.

The announcement came just days after competing proposals by the county and the U.S. Department of Justice were submitted to the court.

U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell set aside two hours for the 2 p.m. hearing Dec. 7 at the federal courthouse in Orlando, 80 N. Hughey Ave. He had ruled that the current countywide system penalizes Hispanics in a "racially polarized" county.

The Justice Department, which proposed single-member-district elections for all five commission seats, asked for the hearing with its filing Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors offered two options with slightly different district lines.

The county's attorneys proposed a plan that would have two commissioners elected at-large and five from single-member districts.

All three plans center on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside.

Both sides have disputed the other's methodology in drawing the districts to account for Osceola's exploding growth since the 2000 census.

Hispanics make up about a third of the county population, but only one has ever been elected to the commission, under single-member-district voting a decade ago.

Osceola has spent nearly $2 million in fees for attorneys and experts defending itself since the Justice Department sued last year.

Mark Pino, Henry Pierson Curtis, Christopher Sherman, Gary Taylor and Willoughby Mariano of the Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

Treasury Ordered To Make Bills Recognizable To Blind People (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-By keeping all currency bills the same size and texture, the U.S. government has denied blind people meaningful access to money, a federal judge said Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said the Treasury Department has violated the law, and he ordered the government to come up with ways for the blind to tell bills apart.

He said he wouldn't tell officials how to fix the problem, but he ordered them to begin working on it within 10 days. The American Council of the Blind has proposed several options, including printing bills of differing sizes, adding embossed dots or foil to the paper or using raised ink.

"Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations," Robertson wrote. "More than 100 of the other issuers vary their bills in size according to denomination, and every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired."

Government attorneys argued that forcing the Treasury Department to change the size of the bills or add texture would make it harder to prevent counterfeiting. Robertson was not swayed.

"The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, at least on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable," he wrote.

He said the government was violating the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability in government programs. The opinion came after a four-year legal fight.

"It's a landmark decision. I believe it will benefit millions of people," said Jeffrey A. Lovitky, attorney for plaintiffs in the lawsuit.

U.S. Currency Discriminates Against Blind, Judge Rules (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A federal judge here ruled on Tuesday that the government illegally discriminated against blind people by printing its paper currency on bills of the same size that could not be distinguished by touch.

The judge, James Robertson of Federal District Court, ordered the Treasury Department to start discussing within 30 days potential remedies, including different note sizes for different denominations and raised numerals and perforated dots on the bills.

“Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency,” Judge Robertson wrote, “only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations.”

The judge pointed out that euro notes came in bigger sizes for higher denominations and had raised numerals as well as foil patches in different shapes. Japanese notes have rough patches to help identify them by touch. Swiss francs feature intaglio printing and perforated numerals, and other countries use sequences of perforated dots.

“The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,” Judge Robertson wrote.

The Treasury Department refused to comment on the decision or on whether it would appeal the order, which came after a four-year court fight between the government and the American Council of the Blind.

The Treasury Department had argued that making bills identifiable by touch would create an undue financial burden for the government. It had estimated that the most expensive approach — printing different sizes for different denominations — would cost $178 million for new printing presses and as much as $50 million for new plates.

Judge Robertson said that cost would be small compared with the $4.2 billion that the government spent on currency production in the past 10 years.

He also rejected as “utterly unpersuasive” government pleas that new tactile features might undermine the anticounterfeiting features. He also dismissed the government’s argument that such features might undermine the greenback’s international acceptance, saying, “This contention is not only not supported but, on its face, absurd.”

Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and government affairs for the American Council of the Blind, said the decision addressed a constant problem for people with little or no eyesight.

Paper currency "is one of the biggest parts of everyday life, and we just don't have access to it," Ms. Al-Mohamed said. About 937,000 people in the United States are legally blind, and an additional 2.3 million people have "low vision" even when wearing corrective lenses.

The American Council of the Blind had argued that American paper currency was "inaccessible" to blind people and violated the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination in government programs against people with disabilities.

Judge Robertson said people with severely impaired vision were inherently vulnerable to being cheated if they had to depend on other people to distinguish among a $1 bill, a $20 bill or a $100 bill.

In 1995, he added, the National Academy of Sciences concluded that three features could be incorporated into American banknotes: distinctive sizes for each denomination; increasing the size and contrast of numerals; and varying the notes' colors to help people with limited vision.

In 1996, the government redesigned banknotes and added two features: one larger number at a slightly different height from the rest of the bill, and an infrared symbol to encourage the development of handheld currency readers for the blind.

Judge Robertson said those changes fell "well short" of what the National Academy of Sciences had recommended and were mainly intended to prevent counterfeiting.

Currency Changes Ordered To Help Blind (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the Treasury Department must change currencies -- potentially changing the size, shape or feel of each denomination -- so blind people can use them.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said that by making different denominations of bills the same size and shape, the government has violated the Rehabilitation Act and denied blind people a way to use money.

The judge did not provide a solution, but ordered Treasury to find one.

Government attorneys argued that adding texture or changing the size of bills would be costly and make it harder to prevent counterfeiting.

The American Council of the Blind, which filed the suit in 2002, proposed a number of solutions that are used in other countries.

In Britain, each denomination is a different size, said Melanie Brunson, the Washington association's executive director. In Canada, currency has a series of dots in its corners, differentiated by denomination. And other countries use different patterns of raised dots or lines.

"Our intent was to get Treasury to focus enough attention to incorporate those [ideas] or come up with something else to meet the needs of people who can't read them visually," Mrs. Brunson said.

About 937,000 Americans are legally blind, which means that their vision is no better than 20/200 when corrected.

Judge Robertson said that if other countries can print denominations that blind people can use without counterfeiting problems, then so can the United States.

The Treasury Department did not return calls for comment.

Government lawyers argued that changing the size of currency could cost up to $228 million in initial costs and $52 million annually to make currency in different sizes. The least expensive change, adding a raised numeral, would cost $45.5 million initially and $16 million annually. The government estimated it would have to spend another $70 million to $90 million in public education for any changes.

"If additional savings could be gained by incorporating the new feature into a larger redesign, such as those that took place in 1996 or 2004, the total burden of adding such a feature would be even smaller," wrote Judge Robertson, who was appointed by President Clinton in 1994.

In 1996, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing began inserting color and larger faces on bills to prevent counterfeiting.

Blind people must ask other people for assistance, fold different denominations in different ways, or keep different denominations in separate parts of wallets or purses, putting them at risk of being cheated, the American Council of the Blind argued in court.

Members of Congress have proposed legislation changing the size and shape of currency, but it has never passed, Judge Robertson wrote in his opinion. The 1996 redesign of the $20 bill included a larger font to identify the $20, which helped people with reduced vision, but did not help blind people.

The judge found that the similarities among the bills is a violation of the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination in government programs on the basis of disability.

"We believe this is a very significant step," Mrs. Brunson said. "This is the first time a judge has ruled that a failure to provide means of identifying currency is a violation of the Rehabilitation Act."

The judge ordered a status conference in about 30 days.

Eight Face Charges In Boot-camp Death (TALLDEM)

By Stephen D. Price, FLORIDA CAPITAL BUREAU

Tallahassee Democrat, November 29, 2006

'Today is a good day for me,' says Martin Lee Anderson's mother

Eleven months after 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson died, a protest march on the state Capitol and complaints that the investigation took too long, State Attorney Mark Ober on Tuesday charged seven drill instructors and a nurse with felony aggravated manslaughter of a child in the teen's death.

For Anderson's parents the charges were late but an answer to their prayers.

"Today is a good day for me," said Anderson's mother, Gina Jones, unable to control her emotions. "I'm finally getting justice for my baby."

Gov. Jeb Bush, who spoke with Anderson's parents Tuesday, said he, too, was glad the investigation had concluded.

"In spite of, admittedly, my frustrations at the delays of this, I'm pleased that (State Attorney Mark Ober) did his job well," Bush said.

Charged are Henry Dickens, Charles Enfinger, Patrick Garrett, Raymond Hauck, Charles Helms Jr., Henry McFadden Jr., Kristin Schmidt and Joseph Walsh II, according to a filing by Ober.

If convicted, the defendants could receive up to 30 years in prison.

Late Tuesday, Ober said that all seven of the drill instructors had been arrested and booked at the Bay County jail. Officials expected to arrest the nurse, Schmidt, later in the evening.

Ober's charges said in part that the defendants "did cause the death of Martin Lee Anderson by culpable negligence, without lawful justification or excuse, by neglecting Martin Lee Anderson by failure or omission to provide Martin Lee Anderson with care, supervision or services necessary to maintain his physical or mental health."

Ober's nine-month investigation cleared higher-level officials. In a letter to Bush, Ober said Guy Tunnell, former director of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement; State Attorney Steve Meadows; Bay County Sheriff Frank McKeithen and Bay County Medical Examiner Dr. Charles Siebert, who performed the first autopsy on Anderson, had acted properly in the aftermath of Anderson's death.

Anderson, who was sent to the juvenile boot camp on a probation violation, collapsed during exercises at the boot camp Jan. 5 and died early the next day at Sacred Heart Hospital in Pensacola.

In a letter to Bush, Ober explained how Anderson fell during a running exercise and drill instructors grabbed him, held him by the arms, applied pressure-point applications and covered his mouth while forcing him to inhale ammonia.

A surveillance video of the incident showed drill instructors kicking and punching Anderson.

An autopsy done by Siebert concluded Anderson died from natural causes related to sickle-cell trait.

A second autopsy done by Hillsborough County Medical Examiner Dr. Vernard Adams found that Anderson died from suffocation by drill instructors who forced ammonia tablets into his nose while covering his mouth.

Anderson's death and video of his beating captured nationwide attention and calls in the state legislature to close all boot camps.

Last spring, Bush signed the Martin Lee Anderson Act, which, among other things, would create "STAR" academies, or boot camps modeled after a program in Martin County that places more emphasis on juvenile prevention programs and follow-up counseling.

Anderson's parents have sued the Bay County Sheriff's Office; the Department of Juvenile Justice, which contracted with the sheriff's office to operate the camps; and the seven drill instructors who now have been charged in the boy's death, seeking more than $40 million in the wrongful-death suit.

The charges bring to an end an investigation many said was too long.

In April, college students staged a sit-in at the Capitol to protest the fact that no one had been charged. Thousands of protesters, including Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton, marched and rallied at the Capitol that same week, demanding arrests in Anderson's death.

Last week the state NAACP and the Black Caucus threatened to have a silent protest during the inauguration ceremony of Gov.-elect Charlie Crist if charges in Anderson's death had not been filed.

Ober said in a statement to Bush that his office had to review more than 20,000 pages of documents in the case and conducted a multitude of interviews of witnesses.

"In the pursuit of justice, we have conducted a thorough investigation and have ignored demands from those calling for a rush to judgment," the statement said.

In a meeting with Ober on Tuesday morning, Anderson's mother said the special prosecutor explained why the investigation took so long.

"I was impatient, but it was worth it," Jones said.

Ben Crump, Anderson's parents' attorney, called Ober "courageous" for filing the charges against the drill instructors and nurse. Since the investigation took so long, Crump said he and Anderson's parents began to doubt any charges would come.

"This aggravated manslaughter of a child equals, to us, humanity and justice for Martin Lee Anderson," Crump said. "Our faith was tested."

State Sen. Tony Hill, D-Jacksonville, said, "We, the members of the Black Caucus, can feel some relief knowing some justice has been brought to the family of Martin Lee Anderson."

Pam Bondi, spokesman for Ober's office, said all the defendants will be tried together and will be arraigned sometime in January.

In a press conference in front of the Leon County Courthouse on Tuesday, Ober said, referring to the charged drill instructors: "This conduct cannot and will not be tolerated in our society, and none of us are above the law."

When asked if the charges were a tough call, Ober said, "We make a lot of tough calls every day."

Anderson's parents said the months they've waited for charges in their son's death has caused many sleepless nights. On Tuesday morning, they said they felt relieved.

Anderson's father, Robert Anderson, said, "Tonight, I will get me some rest."

7 Guards, Nurse Charged In Death Of Teen At Florida Boot Camp (USAT/AP)

By Melissa Nelson, The Associated Press

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Case led to dismantling of military-style program

PENSACOLA, Fla. — Seven former guards at a juvenile boot camp were charged with aggravated manslaughter of a child Tuesday for the pummeling of a 14-year-old boy who later died. The action was caught on security videotape, and the case led to the dismantling of Florida's military-style detention system for young offenders.

Also charged was a nurse seen on the tape watching as guards repeatedly kneed and hit Martin Lee Anderson during a 30-minute scuffle on Jan. 5. Guards said the boy was uncooperative and had refused to participate in exercises.

The teen collapsed in the exercise yard at the camp in Panama City and died at a hospital the next day.

The death sparked protests at the state Capitol and led to a shake-up in Florida's criminal justice system and the resignation of Florida's top law enforcement officer.

If convicted, the former guards and the nurse could each get up to 30 years in prison. Bail was set at $25,000 apiece.

Nurse Kristin Anne Schmidt was expected to surrender Tuesday evening, said Pamela Bondi, a spokeswoman for special prosecutor Mark Ober.

Attorneys for three of the former guards — Charles Helms, Joseph Walsh and Raymond Hauck — said their clients denied any wrongdoing. Phone messages were left for lawyers representing Schmidt and two other former guards.

Anderson had been sent to the boot camp for violating probation in a theft case. Boot camps often use grueling exercise to instill discipline in juvenile delinquents.

An initial autopsy found Anderson died of complications of sickle cell trait, a usually benign blood disorder. After cries of a coverup, a second autopsy was conducted by another medical examiner, and it concluded Anderson suffocated because of the actions of guards.

Vernard Adams, the doctor who did the second autopsy, said the suffocation was caused by hands covering the boy's mouth, as well as the "forced inhalation of ammonia fumes" that caused his vocal cords to spasm, blocking his airway.

The guards said in an incident report that they used ammonia capsules five times on Anderson to gain his cooperation.

"Today is a good day for me," said Gina Jones, Anderson's mother. "I'm finally getting justice for my baby."

Benjamin Crump, lawyer for the boy's parents, who have been demanding for months that the guards be charged with murder, said the videotape leaves no doubt the guards are guilty.

"You wouldn't do this to your dog," Crump said. "Stuffing ammonia tablets up his nose, pulling his neck back, covering his mouth."

In April, college students staged a two-day protest in Gov. Jeb Bush's office. Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton joined the students for a march on the state Capitol.

Florida Department of Law Enforcement chief Guy Tunnell, who started Bay County's boot camp when he was sheriff there, resigned after he compared Jackson to Jesse James and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., to Osama bin Laden in an agency meeting. Bush signed a bill in May to replace the boot camps with programs that offer job training and counseling.

Va. Will Let Vt. Decide Visitation For Lesbian Parent (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 28 -- A Virginia appellate court sidestepped the issue of civil unions Tuesday in ruling that, because two former lesbian partners filed for their union in Vermont, that state's courts have jurisdiction in a custody battle.

The Court of Appeals of Virginia remanded the dispute between Janet Miller-Jenkins and Lisa Miller-Jenkins to a lower Virginia court and advised it to issue a new judgment recognizing Vermont's authority.

"By so holding, we do not address whether Virginia law recognizes or endorses same-sex unions entered into in another state or jurisdiction," the court wrote in its decision.

An attorney for Janet Miller-Jenkins called it a victory.

"This is exactly what we have been arguing since January of 2005 -- that the Virginia trial court had no business under either Virginia or federal law interfering with the decision of the Vermont family court," Joseph Price said.

Lisa Miller-Jenkins will continue to pursue the case, said her attorney, Erik Stanley.

The women were Virginia residents in 2000 when they traveled to Vermont to join in a civil union. Lisa Miller-Jenkins conceived a child through artificial insemination in 2001 while the couple were together, and a child, Isabella, was born the following April. They eventually moved to Vermont in August 2002.

In the fall of 2003, the women separated. After moving back to Virginia, Lisa Miller-Jenkins filed for a dissolution of their civil union, an action akin to a divorce, and sought custody of Isabella.

In June 2004, a Vermont family court granted Janet Miller-Jenkins visitation rights; that October, a Frederick County court issued a contradicting decision.

In August, the Vermont Supreme Court ruled that Vermont courts had exclusive jurisdiction in the custody battle, and on Tuesday, Virginia Appeals Judge Jere M.H. Willis Jr. agreed.

Lawyers Debate Why Blacks Lag At Major Firms (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Thanks to vigorous recruiting and pressure from corporate clients, black lawyers are well represented now among new associates at the nation's most prestigious law firms. But they remain far less likely to stay at the firms or to make partner than their white counterparts.

A recent study says grades help explain the gap. To ensure diversity among new associates, the study found, elite law firms hire minority lawyers with, on average, much lower grades than white ones. That may, the study says, set them up to fail.

The study, which was prepared by Richard H. Sander, a law professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, and was published in The North Carolina Law Review in July, has given rise to fierce and growing criticism in law review articles and in the legal press. In an opinion article in The National Law Journal this month, for instance, R. Bruce McClean, the chairman of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a major law firm, took issue with the study's "sweeping conclusions" but not its "detailed data analysis."

James E. Coleman Jr., the first black lawyer to make partner at Wilmer Cutler & Pickering, a prestigious Washington law firm now known as WilmerHale, said Professor Sander was overemphasizing grades at the expense of other qualities like writing skills, temperament and the ability to analyze complex problems.

"I don't think you can do what he is trying to do, which is to use purely objective data to explain what is happening in law firms," said Professor Coleman, who now teaches law at Duke and is a co-author of a response to Professor Sander called "Is It Really All About the Grades?"

Achieving racial diversity at all levels is an urgent issue, law firms say, but they acknowledge that gains among new associates disappear by the time new partners are elected. "We've seen stagnation and even decline when it comes to race," said Meredith Moore, the director of the New York City Bar Association's diversity office.

The new study proposes an explanation. It found that the pool of black lawyers with excellent law-school grades is so small that firms must relax their standards if they are to have new associates who resemble the pool of new lawyers.

Professor Sander found that very few blacks graduated from top-30 law schools with high grades.

Yet grades, according to many hiring partners and law students, are a significant criterion in hiring decisions, rivaled only by the prestige of the law school in question. For instance, Professor Sander found, "white law school graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.5 or higher are nearly 20 times as likely to be working for a large law firm as are white graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.0 or lower."

The story for black students appears to be different. Black students, who make up 1 to 2 percent of students with high grades (meaning a grade point average in the top half of the class) make up 8 percent of corporate law firm hires, Professor Sander found. "Blacks are far more likely to be working at large firms than are other new lawyers with similar credentials," he said.

But black lawyers, the study found, are about one-fourth as likely to make partner as white lawyers from the same entering class of associates.

Professor Coleman attributed that largely to law firms' failure to provide minority associates with mentoring, encouragement and good assignments. "It's such a high-pressure place that places so much emphasis on getting it right that a young associate easily loses confidence," he said. "But to succeed you have to take risks."

No one disputes that firms are failing to retain and promote most of the minority lawyers they hired, at salaries that can start at $135,000.

"Black and Hispanic attrition at corporate firms is devastatingly high," Professor Sander wrote, "with blacks from their first year onwards leaving firms at two to three times the rate of whites. By the time partnership decisions roll around, black and Hispanic pools at corporate firms are tiny."

Less prestigious firms are much less likely to hire minority lawyers with substantially lower grades than white lawyers, Professor Sander said in an interview.

"Black associates report experiences at small firms — in mentoring, job responsibility and contact with partners — that are generally indistinguishable from the experiences reported by white associates," Professor Sander said. Those experiences suggest that minority lawyers at small firms have a good shot at partnership, but Professor Sander said he did not have direct evidence on that point.

Critics generally concede the raw numbers. But they offer different reasons for the gap between hiring and promotion. Some point to old-fashioned racism. Others say that firms act institutionally in hiring but leave work assignments to individual partners. Those partners often provide poor training, rote assignments and little mentoring to minority lawyers.

That should be unsurprising given the credentials gap, said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, which opposes hiring preferences based on race.

"If everyone in the law firms knows you're hiring according to a double standard, you actually may end up compromising the confidence that partners and others have in the ability of people hired on the basis of preference," Mr. Clegg added. "It actually reinforces stereotypes."

The experience of white female associates provides a series of contrasts. Women at large firms have slightly better grades than men, yet they are also underrepresented in classes of new partners. But women do not report the absence of mentoring and choice assignments that minority associates do.

"Strikingly, women's self-reported work experiences — in terms of mentoring, level of responsibility and access to partners — are positive and indistinguishable from the self-reports of white men," Professor Sander said. "Consistent with this picture, white women's attrition rates as entering and midlevel associates are nearly as low as those of white men."

Associates typically work for about eight years before being considered for partnership. "As women of all races approach the seventh year of their tenure, and contemplate the compatibility of big-firm partnership with their family and quality-of-life goals," Professor Sander said, "many women pull out of the running for partners and seek out less demanding jobs."

Though many supporters of affirmative action question Professor Sander's conclusions, most academic experts say his empirical work is sound.

"He makes a good case," said Kenneth G. Dau-Schmidt, an authority on the economic analysis of legal problems at the Indiana University School of Law. "What the data tells him is that there's a mismatch going on and it's hurting black students."

In their response to the Sander study, Professor Coleman and Mitu Gulati, another law professor at Duke, wrote that the Sander paper would aggravate the problem it described.

"The harm of the Sander article," the two professors wrote, "is that it will contribute to the stereotyping that already undermines the success of black associates in elite corporate law firms."

Stephen F. Hanlon, a partner with Holland & Knight, a national law firm, said the Sander study overlooked a positive reason for high attrition rates among minority lawyers. Female and minority lawyers, he said, are often hired away from law firms by corporate law departments, and that will have an impact over time.

"We have trained a very bright generation of women and minority lawyers who have gone to our corporate clients and who now decide whether to hire us," Mr. Hanlon said.

Supporters of affirmative action acknowledge that trend, and add that high rates of minority attrition should be unsurprising given the grinding, mercenary culture of most law firms.

"Minorities, when they look at management structures and see that so few make it, they probably give up," said Veta T. Richardson, the executive director of the Minority Corporate Counsel Association.

Even Professor Sander's critics say he has started an important discussion.

"We have done our share of stone throwing," Professor Coleman and Professor Gulati wrote in their response, "but that should not take away from the fact that Professor Sander has identified a real problem that needs serious study, and that his study has added considerably to the limited body of available, public research, even though his conclusions are, at best, premature."

ANTITRUST:

Court Allows U.S. Suit Vs. Realtors To Proceed (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, MarketWatch

Market Watch, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A federal court in Chicago has allowed the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors to proceed, the department said Tuesday.

The court rejected the association's argument that last-minute changes to its policies prevented judicial scrutiny, the department said.

In denying the association's motion to dismiss the case, the court said that "NAR has failed ... to demonstrate that this case should be dismissed at the outset," according to the Justice Department.

In September 2005 the department's antitrust division filed a lawsuit charging that NAR rules limit competition from real-estate brokers who use the Internet to serve their customers. The lawsuit alleged that the association's policy threatened to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.

The Realtors association denies it discriminates against discount brokers or others who use the Internet to compete with conventional brokers.

Listings Lawsuit OK'd (BSUN/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Baltimore Sun, November 29, 2006

The National Association of Realtors lost a bid to dismiss a U.S. government antitrust lawsuit challenging its limits on access to multiple listings by consumers who use lower-cost Internet brokers.

The ruling by a federal judge in Chicago lets the Justice Department proceed to pretrial fact-finding to try to prove that the Realtors and member brokers engaged in an "ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy" to restrain competition.

U.S. District Judge Mark R. Filip rejected the Realtors' argument that the government had no case after the trade association in May 2005 changed the policy that limited online access to listings by customers of brokers who operate "virtual office Web sites."

The Realtors' "contention that the United States has failed even to plead a claim is unpersuasive," Filip wrote.

The trade association "and its members have entered into a collective action that purports to regulate how they will compete in the marketplace," the judge said.

The government's complaint, filed in September 2005, said the Realtors' rules limited competition by preventing customers of online brokers from receiving full access to multiple listings. The Realtors' policy lets traditional brokers block competitors from having full online access to multiple listings.

The Chicago-based Realtors' group changed its policy after the Justice Department said it planned to sue to challenge the rules as anticompetitive, according to Filip's opinion. The modified policy still contains features that the government claims are anticompetitive, the judge wrote.

The government has argued that the original policy had "enduring effects" in some markets and that the modified rules have "not eliminated all effects," Filip wrote.

"We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to presenting our case at trial," J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy attorney general for antitrust, said in a statement released by the Justice Department.

Steve Cook, a Washington-based spokesman for the trade association, said the ruling "was very much expected and we are confident we can win on the merits of the case."

Filip, who was appointed to the federal bench in 2004 by President Bush, announced his ruling from the bench in September and released the opinion outlining his reasons late yesterday, Cook said.

Court Issues Opinion Related To DOJ Vs. NAR Lawsuit (INMAN)

Judge explains rejection of attempt to dismiss case

U.S. District Court Judge Mark Filip, in a 29-page opinion released Monday, offered a detailed explanation on why he earlier rejected a motion by the National Association of Realtors trade group to dismiss an antitrust complaint brought by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Filip last month denied the Realtor group's motion to dismiss the lawsuit, which was filed in September 2005 and amended in October 2005. The lawsuit alleges that the trade group's policies governing the online display and sharing of property information are overly restrictive and can harm consumers and stifle innovation.

The National Association of Realtors in December filed the motion in U.S. District Court in Chicago in an attempt to toss out parts of the lawsuit that target the association's former online listings policy, known as the Virtual Office Website (VOW) policy and so-called "opt-out" provisions of its policies that allow brokers to withhold online listings from other brokers.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said there "were no surprises" in the judge's opinion. The rules of the court dictate that the judge must assume that the allegations brought by the Justice Department are true in weighing the association's motion, Janik said -- the lawsuit has not yet reached the trial phase and both sides are still gathering evidence.

"He was very careful in his wording. I didn't view anything he had sent out as significant (to the overall case)," she added. "We knew it was a long shot but we thought it was worth making. The sooner we can end this litigation, the better."

J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement, "We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to representing our case at trial. The (division) is committed to preserving competition in this vital sector of our nation's economy."

While the Realtor group announced the withdrawal of its VOW rules and the adoption of modified Internet listings rules after receiving notice that the Justice Department intended to file the lawsuit, Filip said in his opinion that Justice Department is entitled to proceed with its case against both the old policy and the modified policy, the Internet Listings Display (ILD) policy.

The Justice Department has alleged that the VOW and ILD policies are part of a "single, ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy," according to the opinion, and that the "two policies are part of a continuing conspiracy among NAR and its member brokers to restrain competition from VOW brokers." NAR has argued that there is no ongoing conspiracy because the modified policy replaced the old policy, though the Justice Department alleged that the two policies have "a common purpose driven by a common motive -- to restrain the competitive threat posed by Internet-based brokerages."

The court found that the Justice Department's allegations provided sufficient basis for both policies to be included in the lawsuit, as it has argued that "the allegedly anti-competitive effects which flowed from adoption of the initial VOW policy have had enduring effects, at least in certain markets, such that ... the modified VOW policy ... has not eliminated all the effects of the initial VOW policy."

Russ Cofano, a Seattle-based lawyer who has represented real estate industry clients and ran a real estate technology company, said he thought it was interesting to read the judge's statement that the court could choose a remedy for proven anti-competitive practices that "can go beyond the prohibition of those practices which ... were found to constitute the illegal conduct." The court also stated that the alleged "effects of the initial VOW, and the ways by which it allegedly would impair competitive forces and incentives in relevant markets, cannot be cabined from this case at the outset, as (NAR) apparently desires."

Cofano said, "The court is basically saying that relief to the United States -- in a claim like this -- is not limited only to stopping a policy. It can go well beyond that." If the Justice Department is able to prove its allegations, Cofano said that potentially opens up the door to a range of actions that the judge could take, he said. "That creates an unknown risk for NAR as to what the relief might be" if the Justice Department can prove its case, Cofano said.

He also stated that it was "strategically the right thing to do" for the Realtor association to ask the judge to dismiss aspects of the Justice Department's complaint. "I think the court has given them insight," he said. "I would presume (NAR officials) are reading this very carefully. Some of the language in the opinion certainly is instructive."

The judge's opinion states that the Realtor group's original VOW policy is relevant because "issues about the intent of the NAR in passing it will potentially help to illuminate (NAR's) intent generally as either benign or improper." The opinion also noted the potential for NAR to reinstate the original VOW as a justification for not tossing out provisions of the Justice Department complaint.

The Justice Department has alleged that members of an NAR working group for VOW policy wrote that aspects of the policy "would be 'abused beyond belief,' with traditional brokers selectively withholding listings from particular VOW-based competitors," and that the chairman of the working group "took comfort in the fact that the rule did not require brokers to disclose to clients that their listings would be withheld from some prospective purchasers as a result of the brokers' opt-out decision, thus providing brokers 'flexibility without conversation,' " court documents state.

In his opinion, Filip stated that the Justice Department has "alleged substantial concrete evidence that, if credited and true, could be understood to reflect that the new VOW policies were developed and utilized with anti-competitive animus, as well as with a recognition that the VOW policies would harm American consumers." Janik said that the association denies that there was any animus -- or willful antitrust violations -- in adopting the policies.

About 200 Realtor boards implemented the Realtor association's original VOW policy, the Justice Department has alleged. The association has advised that local boards do not adopt controversial provisions of the VOW policy and that the boards do not adopt the ILD policy.

While the modified VOW policy provides a so-called "blanket opt-out" provision that allows a broker to withhold online listings from other MLS participants provided that the broker does not display the other participants' listings, the judge's opinion states that NAR "does not meaningfully challenge" the Justice Department's facts "that the opt-out is of more detriment to a VOW broker than to a broker that does not use a Web site to deliver listings to a client, or that the opt-out undermines brokers who have a referral-based business model."

Robert D. Butters, a lawyer for Arnstein & Lehr LLP in Chicago who has represented real estate brokerages, technology companies and MLSs, said that the potential for the Justice Department to present evidence for anti-competitive intent in NAR's adoption of the original online listings policy "is particularly threatening in my view for NAR's subsequent defense of the case."

The Justice Department spent two years investigating the original VOW policy, and Butters said the evidence that the Justice Department has introduced already "could just be the tip of the iceberg."

Butters also said that the judge's opinion "didn't draw much distinction between the blanket and selective opt-out" provisions in the ILD and VOW policies. The original VOW policy approved in 2003 provided a selective opt-out provision that allowed participating brokers to pick and choose which brokers they would share their listings with, while the modified VOW policy -- also known as the ILD policy -- provided a blanket opt-out provision requiring that brokers who withhold listings from other participants cannot show those participants' listings on their own Web sites.

"The court pretty much treated the opt-out issue as a singular issue," in the opinion, Butters said.

The judge's opinion states, "Underlying (NAR's) argument is an assumption that the 'blanket' opt-out imposes higher costs on the broker deciding to opt-out, and thus it is less likely to be used than the selective opt-out," and adds that the Justice Department's allegations do not "depend upon a 'selective' or 'targeted' opt-out right."

"This judge clearly gets it," Butters said. "He understands how VOWs operate and the potential they have for making the marketing process far more efficient and consumer-friendly. He clearly comprehends that."

Supreme Court Justices Hear Weyerhaeuser Logging Case (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Supreme Court on Tuesday questioned whether forest products giant Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller competitor out of business by paying too much for logs that Weyerhaeuser allegedly didn't need.

The case focuses on the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest and pits a defunct company, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., against Weyerhaeuser and the Bush administration.

Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to Ross-Simmons stemming from a jury verdict that found the larger company had violated federal antitrust law.

DOJ_NMG_0099340

Ross-Simmons accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder sawlogs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills.

Arguments before the Supreme Court Tuesday turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty.

Companies often attack competitors by selling products at a lower price, benefiting consumers in the short term. A high legal standard must be met for a company engaging in such conduct to be found to have acted illegally. But there is no such apparent benefit in the Weyerhaeuser case. Isn't that a reason not to apply the elevated standard? asked Chief Justice John Roberts.

"We don't think so," replied Andrew Pincus, representing Weyerhaeuser. Pincus pointed out that buying at a higher price in this instance would benefit the sellers supplying logs to Weyerhaeuser.

Kannon Shanmugam, a Justice Department lawyer from the solicitor general's office, suggested that Weyerhaeuser's conduct may well have been helpful to the marketplace.

"Aggressive bidding no less than price-cutting is usually pro-competitive," Shanmugam told the justices.

Justice Antonin Scalia suggested Weyerhaeuser's conduct might make perfect sense - paying more to ensure that its mills had an adequate supply of logs.

That prompted Justice David Souter to interject that those circumstances apparently aren't present in this case. Evidence presented by Ross-Simmons, Souter said, is that the supply of logs was limited.

Supreme Court Hears Sawmill Suit (SEAPI)

By JENNIFER A. DLOUHY, HEARST NEWSPAPERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The lawyer for a now-defunct sawmill told the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday that timber giant Weyerhaeuser Co. broke federal antitrust laws by overpaying for more logs than it needed and then cutting its prices on the finished lumber used to make guitars and furniture.

The strategy drove the smaller timber processor, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., out of business at the same time it allowed Weyerhaeuser to strengthen its foothold in the Pacific Northwest alder saw-log market, said the lawyer, Michael Haglund.

"Weyerhaeuser artificially increased the log market above where it otherwise would have been," Haglund said. "We have a situation where they warehoused large -- unprecedentedly high -- volumes of lumber because they" wanted to keep it out of competitors' hands.

Ross-Simmons now wants Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser to pay nearly $80 million in damages for the business tactics, which it says were part of a ploy to monopolize the market. The Longview-based sawmill says Weyerhaeuser's tactics forced it out of business in 2001 by driving prices for saw logs higher than it could afford and by depleting the supply of the trees.

The price of alder saw logs and that of finished lumber made from the material are usually tied together. But from 1998 to 2001, Ross-Simmons argued in court filings, the price of saw logs rose even as the price of finished lumber dropped.

In its defense, Weyerhaeuser contends it was only making smart business decisions and could afford to pay more for the logs because it was more efficient at processing the wood.

The two lumber mills are feuding over the appropriate legal standard for determining when buying practices are predatory, and therefore a violation of federal antitrust laws.

A federal district court in Portland ruled in favor of Ross-Simmons and said the lumber company did not have to prove Weyerhaeuser took a financial loss to prevail. Instead, the district court found, it was enough that Ross-Simmons proved in court that Weyerhaeuser had decided to cut its profit margin on finished lumber made from alder saw logs.

Ross-Simmons won a verdict of $78 million, an award that was affirmed by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said Weyerhaeuser had intended to monopolize the alder saw-log market in the Pacific Northwest.

Weyerhaeuser appealed to the Supreme Court. The company has the backing of the Bush administration, which says aggressive buying tactics make for good business competition by ensuring that companies have access to enough raw materials to manufacture more products.

Businesses far outside the Pacific Northwest are watching the case because it will force the justices to draw the line between savvy business strategies and illegal anti-competitive behavior.

Tactics that may appear underhanded may simply be aggressive -- but legal -- business competition, said Andrew Pincus, Weyerhaeuser's lawyer.

"It's very hard to distinguish ... between hard-fought competition and anti-competitive intent," Pincus said. "Increasing the prices that are paid for inputs -- like lowering sales prices -- is a mechanism by which a firm competes. It's a result that we would expect from a buyer's ordinary competitive instincts."

Chief Justice John Roberts noted that while predatory selling can benefit consumers by lowering prices, predatory buying does not help them. Given that, Roberts asked, shouldn't predatory buying be judged by a looser standard?

Justice John Paul Stevens seemed concerned that a ruling for Weyerhaeuser would mean an end to cases in which there is clear evidence -- such as internal company memos -- that a business paid more for raw materials as part of a ploy to drive a competitor out of business.

In the absence of evidence, Justices Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg wondered how to judge what motivates a company's buying practices.

"If you're trying to decide whether people are hogging goods unnecessarily for bad purposes or (are) storing up nuts for winter for good purposes, then a very good key to that is (whether) these people expect in the long run to make money out of this," Breyer said.

The Supreme Court is expected to rule on the case by July. The case is Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons, 05-381.

Judge Bars Newspaper Consolidation (AP)

Judge Issues Restraining Order in Bay Area Newspaper Sale

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- A previously undisclosed internal memo prompted a federal judge Tuesday to temporarily block the consolidation of some of the San Francisco Chronicle's business operations with those of rival newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc.

Denver-based MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from Hearst Corp., owner of the Chronicle.

In July, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston let the deal go through, ruling against an antitrust lawsuit that claimed the deal would create a monopoly on readership and advertising in the region.

But in issuing Tuesday's restraining order, she said a memo had recently surfaced showing Hearst had an undisclosed motive for investing in the deal -- to consolidate its Bay Area advertising and distribution operations with those of the Chronicle's competitors -- a possible antitrust violation.

"Such agreements would alter the court's analysis of this case as a whole," Illston wrote, and would "increase the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anticompetitive, and illegal."

Illston said she previously "accepted defendants' representations that Hearst's involvement in the transactions was solely that of a passive equity investor."

"Though defendants offered no explanation why Hearst was willing to help finance an acquisition that would only make its competition stronger, the court did not understand that Hearst expected, or would later receive, any quid pro quo," the judge wrote.

The April 26 letter is from Hearst Senior Vice President James Asher to Joseph Lodovic, president of MediaNews.

"The Hearst Corporation and MediaNews Group, Inc. agree that they shall negotiate in good faith agreements to offer national advertising and Internet advertising sales for their San Francisco Bay area newspapers on a joint basis," it reads, "and to consolidate the San Francisco Bay area distribution networks of such newspapers."

Lodovic said Tuesday that there has been no further dialogue between the two companies about shared advertising or distribution.

"So she basically issued an order that has no immediate effect whatsoever," he said. "There is nothing planned."

Paul Luthringer, a spokesman for New York-based Hearst, said the publisher had no comment.

Illston was skeptical the two companies haven't been working together behind the scenes, saying in her ruling that "the parties have engaged in more than just an abstract agreement to negotiate at some later date."

MediaNews and Hearst last week joined forces as part of a newspaper industry consortium that will try to generate more online advertising revenue by working with Yahoo Inc., the Internet's most trafficked site. William Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive and chairman-elect of The Associated Press, played an instrumental role in forming the alliance involving more than 150 dailies in 38 states.

Illston said the "Yahoo Internet advertising deal announced recently suggests that Hearst and MediaNews have made significant progress towards cooperative deals somewhat similar to those discussed in the letter."

San Francisco real estate magnate Clint Reilly filed the antitrust lawsuit seeking to block McClatchy's sale of the Bay Area papers to MediaNews. His laywer, Joseph Alioto, said he recently discovered the memo on cooperation while scouring boxes of documents in the case.

"It's not just a smoking gun," Alioto said. "It's a picture of the bullet coming out of the nozzle."

Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition, speculated that Illston will eventually issue a permanent order blocking MediaNews and Hearst from cooperating in the ways the April 26 letter discusses.

"If that's the $64,000 question, the $65,000 question is: Does Hearst want to be in the deal with MediaNews and does MediaNews want to be in with Hearst if they are barred by the judge from cooperating in those ways?" Scheer said.

Reilly, a former San Francisco mayoral candidate, unsuccessfully sued to block the 2000 sale of the Chronicle to the Hearst Corp.

Hearst paid $660 million for the Chronicle. But to assuage antitrust concerns, it gave away its flagship San Francisco Examiner and subsidized the Examiner's new owners with $66 million over three years. The Examiner survived as a free daily tabloid.

Illston said Reilly's antitrust case will go to trial sometime in April 2007.

Sacramento-based McClatchy got the newspapers targeted in Reilly's suit as part of its $4 billion acquisition of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc.

McClatchy subsequently struck deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's former 32 daily papers for $2 billion.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Judge Restrains Advertising Deals Between Bay Area Newspaper Companies (ALAMTS)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Alameda (CA) Times-Star, November 29, 2006

A federal judge issued a temporary restraining order Tuesday to keep the Bay Area's two major newspaper companies from inking deals to consolidate their national advertising sales and distribution operations.

Evidence of talks between MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. -- the San Francisco Chronicle's owner, and a party to MediaNews' recent purchase of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times -- raises the specter of antitrust violations, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston of San Francisco wrote in Tuesday's order.

She'll hold a hearing Dec. 6 on whether her order should become a preliminary injunction, barring any such deals at least until a lawsuit challenging MediaNews' acquisitions goes to trial in April.

Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. this year bought the now-defunct Knight Ridder Corp.'s 32 newspapers for $6.5 billion. From among those, the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times were then sold for $736.8 million to Denver-based MediaNews

Group -- which also owns this newspaper -- and the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press were sold for $263.2 million to New York City-based Hearst Corp.

In a separate, simultaneous pact, Hearst agreed to give the St. Paul and Monterey papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-Bay Area assets.

San Francisco businessman, political consultant and former mayoral candidate Clint Reilly sued July 14 to halt the deal, claiming it would create a Bay Area newspaper monopoly with higher subscription and advertising rates and diminished journalistic quality, jobs and union contracts.

Illston refused his initial plea for a TRO to prevent the sale's closing, but Reilly went back to her last week with new evidence found among documents provided by the newspaper companies.

An April 26 letter from Hearst Senior Vice President James Asher to MediaNews President Jody Lodovic IV said the two companies "shall negotiate in good faith agreements to offer national advertising and Internet advertising sales for their San Francisco Bay area newspapers on a joint basis, and to consolidate the San Francisco Bay area distribution networks of such newspapers." The letter also said they would jointly seek a deal with online classified advertising companies.

Illston wrote Tuesday that this "casts serious doubt on several key findings underlying" her July ruling.

She had taken the companies at their word that Hearst's involvement was solely that of a passive equity investor, but the April 26 letter now suggests "Hearst's investment was specifically tied to an agreement by MediaNews to limit its competition with Hearst in certain ways" -- a quid pro quo for Hearst's help in MediaNews' purchase of the newspapers.

The judge wrote she's no longer sure the Chronicle is a strong competitor for MediaNews' papers: "The principal source of revenue for newspapers is advertising. The principal costs presumably include distribution and printing. The April 26 letter suggests, at the very least, an intent to limit some aspects of competition between Hearst and MediaNews in advertising and distribution."

The companies "have engaged in more than just an abstract agreement to negotiate at some later date," Illston wrote; these and other companies' recent announcement of an Internet advertising deal with Yahoo! "suggests that Hearst and MediaNews have made significant progress towards cooperative deals somewhat similar to those discussed in the letter."

If a Bay Area-wide ad buy becomes national advertisers' only option, "the agreement might well be per se illegal," she wrote. Having one geographic market's only two "competitors" in cahoots "would raise a significant risk of price manipulation." And colluding on distribution to cut costs "also may raise barriers to entry by other competitors," she added.

MediaNews President Jody Lodovic IV said Tuesday's order means little because "nothing was being planned as relates to those things outlined in the letter... Quite frankly, there has been no further discussions since that time and there's nothing imminent."

"This is not the real battle here -- the real battle is what happens at trial in April," he added.

A Hearst Corp. spokesman declined comment Tuesday.

Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, called Tuesday's order "a strong statement by the court, and we think it's the beginning." He said he expects that as Hearst and MediaNews executives give depositions in December and January, "this house of cards is going to crumble... This concealed, secret, clandestine agreement was the knot that held this whole thing together."

Restraining Order In Sale Of Bay Area Papers (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, November 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge issued an order today temporarily prohibiting the owner of The Chronicle from collaborating with the owner of the San Jose Mercury News and other Bay Area newspapers in local distribution and national advertising sales, saying the proposed agreement might be monopolistic.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston denied a request to halt further consolidation of operations at the Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times by their new owner, MediaNews Corp., while she considers the legality of the firm's purchase of the newspapers. But in a temporary restraining order that barred joint distribution and ad sales by MediaNews and Hearst Corp., Illston said newly disclosed evidence of the proposed collaboration between the companies has increased "the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anti-competitive and illegal."

The judge said she "is not convinced that an agreement between the only two competitors in a market, to share distribution networks, does not raise serious competitive questions."

The restraining order will be in effect until a Dec. 6 hearing on an injunction that would keep the ban in place until April 30. That is when a lawsuit by Clint Reilly, a real estate investor, former political consultant and onetime San Francisco mayoral candidate, is scheduled to go to trial.

Reilly is seeking to block MediaNews' purchase of the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, arguing that the deal, combined with MediaNews' financial arrangement with Hearst, would create a newspaper monopoly in the Bay Area.

Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said today's ruling could be the first step toward upsetting MediaNews' purchase.

"This agreement (on distribution and advertising) was the knot that ties the whole package together, and when this unravels, the whole package unravels," Alioto said.

"They're trying to monopolize the entire Bay Area," Alioto said of MediaNews and Hearst. They did it secretly ... and they got caught."

MediaNews President Jody Lodovic said the ruling would have little impact because the companies had no immediate plans to collaborate on advertising or distribution, and hadn't even discussed the subject since the proposal was outlined in an April 26 letter from a Hearst executive. He said the idea hadn't been discarded, but "there's no urgency to anything."

"To the extent that it makes sense to do some things like joint distribution, we will explore it," Lodovic said. But he noted that the letter, which Illston quoted in today's ruling, contained the stipulation that any arrangements between the companies would follow the law.

Hearst spokesman Paul Luthringer declined to comment on the ruling.

MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune, Hayward Daily Review, Marin Independent Journal, San Mateo County Times and other Bay Area dailies, bought the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Corp. this summer for $736.8 million. McClatchy had acquired the newspapers in March as part of its purchase of the Knight Ridder chain.

Hearst, which owns The Chronicle and 11 other newspapers, put up $263 million to acquire two other McClatchy papers, the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press, which it agreed to transfer to MediaNews. In exchange, Hearst gets a share in MediaNews papers outside the Bay Area. That share was not revealed at the time, but Illston said today it was 30 percent.

In July, Illston denied a request by Reilly to block the MediaNews purchase while she considered his antitrust suit. Reilly renewed his request for a restraining order after learning of the proposed collaboration in advertising and distribution.

The previously sealed April 26 letter, sent by Hearst senior vice president James Asher to Lodovic and signed by both men, contained an agreement to negotiate plans to consolidate the companies' Bay Area distribution networks and jointly offer national advertising and Internet ad sales.

Illston said the letter "casts serious doubt on several key findings" that were the basis for her July order refusing to block the transactions.

She cited the two companies' assertion that Hearst was merely a passive investor in MediaNews. The judge noted that Hearst had not explained why it was willing to help finance an acquisition that would strengthen its competitor, and said the April 26 letter "suggests, at the very least, that Hearst's investment was specifically tied to an agreement by MediaNews to limit its competition with Hearst in certain ways."

At the same time, she said, the letter indicates that The Chronicle may not continue to be a strong source of competition for the other Bay Area newspapers, as she assumed in her earlier ruling.

In addition, Illston said, if national advertisers who wanted to place ads in any Bay Area newspaper had the sole option of buying space in all papers owned by the two companies, the arrangement might well violate antitrust law.

Supreme Court Hearing Abstract Patents Case (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court heard oral arguments today in an abstract case involving automobile gas pedals that could apply the brakes to the recent dramatic growth in patents issued nationwide.

Frustrated justices flipped through engineering diagrams as they pondered a question at the heart of many patent disputes -- was the invention of an adjustable pedal with electronic sensors truly unique in this case, or just an "obvious" combination of existing components that anyone with a little skill in the field could have designed?

For the past two decades, critics have said the federal appeals court that handles all patent cases has made it easy to get patent protection for such "obvious" or minor innovations. Many companies have built their businesses on the patents upheld through that process.

Chief Justice John Roberts and several of his colleagues sharply criticized the lower court's test for invalidating patents on grounds that they are obvious advances. They said it was too rigid, leading to patents that fell short of real innovations.

But some of those same justices pondered how to loosen the standard without making it too vague, and what impact changing it would have on existing patents.

Justice David Souter wondered if 100,000 new patent lawsuits would be filed the morning after a court decision invalidating the current standard.

And Justice Antonin Scalia, who derided the existing obviousness test as "gobbledygook," at the same time asked, "Does it make sense to assume patents are valid that have been issued under an erroneous test for 20 years?"

The case, which pits Canadian-based automotive parts maker KSR International Co. against rival Teleflex Inc. of Pennsylvania, is the most significant of several cases the Supreme Court has taken recently involving the overburdened U.S. patent system.

That system has strained over the past two decades to keep up with a flood of patent applications from new fields, such as biotechnology and personal computing. From 1985 to 2005, annual applications have nearly tripled and the number of patents issued each year has more than doubled, to 165,485.

If the justices loosen the standard for invalidating a patent because it is simply an obvious improvement over existing products, it could cut the number of patents issued and open the door to new lawsuits, said Steve Maebius, an intellectual property attorney and partner with partner with Foley & Lardner, LLP.

"Clearly, it is a ruling that will have the potential to cut across all industry, and affect everything from computers to biotech," he said. "I think the court will have a real challenge to strike the right balance here."

Supreme Court Patent Case Comes Down To Stating ‘obvious' (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — In unusually spirited arguments Tuesday, several Supreme Court justices challenged the prevailing standard for when an invention is too closely tied to existing works to qualify for patent protection.

However, some justices also worried that changing the rules of “obviousness” would throw into doubt the validity of many existing patents.

Justice David Souter asked whether there would be “100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning” if the standard used by a lower federal court that oversees patent appeals were changed. He wondered if such a change would “produce chaos.”

Justice Antonin Scalia said that the current lower-court test for determining whether an invention is innovative or “obvious” is “gobbledygook,” but he also questioned “what happens to the presumption of validity” for patents if the justices change the standard.

The case — brought by Teleflex and KSR International, dueling manufacturers of adjustable gas pedals — touches on concerns that patents are being issued for products and processes whose differences from existing works are too small to matter.

Justice Stephen Breyer noted that some lawyers have claimed that judges on the lower federal court have "leaned too far in the direction of never seeing a patent they didn't like."

The dispute is receiving national attention because it goes to the heart of determining what is truly new — and when inventors should be entitled to the exclusive right to make and sell an item. The case's resolution could make a difference in money for research and development of a product and, ultimately, in what consumers pay for it.

After Teleflex accused KSR International of violating the patent on a Teleflex gas pedal, KSR countered that Teleflex never should have gotten a patent on its pedal because it was "obvious," based on other works.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit ruled that KSR failed to make a sufficient case for "obviousness." The court said KRS did not show that existing technology offered a "teaching, suggestion or motivation" for the new gas pedal device.

James Dabney, representing KSR, said the test for what's obvious should be whether someone in the industry would have been capable of adapting existing technology for a new result, not whether "motivation" was there.

Justices Breyer and Scalia complained that the lower court's test was difficult to apply. Chief Justice John Roberts said it "complicates the inquiry" over what's obvious.

Thomas Goldstein, representing Teleflex, argued that the teaching-and-motivation test is neither confusing nor problematic. He said it helps prevent "hindsight" from distorting assessments of whether a variation is obvious. He said the Federal Circuit looks at whether an invention "was apparent or not apparent to a person of ordinary skill at the time of the invention."

Prior Art, Teaching, Skill? It Must Be A Patent Case (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — To be eligible for a patent, an invention must be novel, useful and, according to the statute, not "obvious" to a person of "ordinary skill" in the field. While the meaning of the term "obvious" might appear to be obvious, a lively and surprisingly entertaining Supreme Court argument on Tuesday demonstrated that it is anything but.

The question was how patent examiners and judges should evaluate the obviousness of a new product that combines, albeit in a novel way, two or more existing products. Since most inventions use elements of what patent law calls "prior art," this case presents the court with what is widely viewed as its most important patent case in years.

The patent in dispute is for an adjustable gas pedal, designed to work in vehicles equipped with electronic engine controls. In the past, gas pedals that could be adjusted for the driver's comfort worked mechanically. The new version, produced by a Canadian company, the KSR International Company, under contract to General Motors, combined an adjustable pedal with an electronic sensor.

Claiming that it had already patented such a product, a rival company, Teleflex Inc., sued. KSR argued that Teleflex's patent was invalid because the combination of the two elements was obvious. A federal district judge in Detroit agreed, and dismissed the infringement suit.

But the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has jurisdiction over all patent appeals, overturned that decision. It ordered the district court to reconsider the case under a test that makes obviousness harder to prove — and therefore makes patents easier to obtain and defend. It is the validity of that test that is at issue in the case, KSR International Co. v. Teleflex Inc., No. 04-1350.

The Federal Circuit's test for obviousness is usually referred to as the teaching-suggestion-motivation test. Under the test, a patent cannot be rejected as obvious unless the party challenging it can show that at the time of the invention, there existed a "teaching, suggestion, or motivation" that would have led a person familiar with the field to put existing products together. Meeting that test often requires a jury trial, making patent litigation prolonged and expensive.

James W. Dabney, the lawyer representing KSR, told the justices that the Federal Circuit had improperly displaced "skill and ingenuity" as the benchmark for obtaining a patent and replaced it with what amounted to an "entitlement" to patent protection. But the Supreme Court itself "has rejected time and time again the notion that someone who was the first simply to take advantage of the known capability of technology was entitled to a patent," he added.

The federal Patent and Trademark Office agrees with the critique and entered the case on the side of KSR. Thomas G. Hungar, a deputy solicitor general, told the justices that "as the sole means of proving obviousness, the teaching-suggestion-motivation test is contrary to the Patent Act, irreconcilable with this court's precedents, and bad policy."

Mr. Hungar added, "It asks the wrong question and, in cases like this one, it produces the wrong answer."

But as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. pointed out, the Federal Circuit had a rationale for adding its distinctive gloss to the concept of obviousness. "They say obviousness is deceptive in hindsight," the chief justice observed to Mr. Dabney. "In hindsight, everybody says, 'I could have thought of that,' " he said, adding that in the Federal Circuit's view, "if you don't have the sort of constraint that their test imposes, it's going to be too easy to say that everything was obvious."

The chief justice's comment came early in the argument; any implication that he was sympathetic to the appeals court proved premature. When it came time for the lawyer for Teleflex, Thomas C. Goldstein, to take the podium, Chief Justice Roberts made clear his disdain for the Federal Circuit's approach.

The test "adds a layer of Federal Circuit jargon that lawyers can then bandy back and forth," he said, adding, "It seems to me that it's worse than meaningless because it complicates the inquiry rather than focusing on the statute."

When Mr. Goldstein noted that "every single major patent bar association in the country has filed on our side," the chief justice interjected: "Well, which way does that cut? That just indicates that this is profitable for the patent bar." And when Mr. Goldstein referred to experts who had testified that the Teleflex patent was not obvious, the chief justice asked: "Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious? I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

Chief Justice Roberts made the comments with a smile, and the courtroom audience responded with laughter. Mr. Goldstein, an experienced Supreme Court advocate, was unfazed at finding himself the straight man in a courtroom comedy. He kept returning to his theme, which was that the Federal Circuit's test, properly understood, served the function of focusing the inquiry.

"Invention isn't at the end when you put the two things together," Mr. Goldstein said. "Invention is finding the problem, deciding what pieces of the prior art to use, and deciding how to put them together." He warned that there would be "genuine, dramatic instability" if the court disavowed the approach the Federal Circuit has used nearly since its creation in 1982.

Congress created the centralized court for the purpose of reducing instability in the patent system. Underlying the legal arguments was the deeper question of how patent law has fared in the court's hands — whether, as Justice Stephen G. Breyer put it, "they've leaned too far in the direction of never seeing a patent they didn't like." There was, Justice Breyer said, "a huge argument going on." With that observation, Mr. Goldstein readily agreed.

Justices Slam Nation's Patent System; Federal Circuit Chief Defends 'Obviousness' Test (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 29, 2006

In surprisingly blunt terms, Supreme Court justices Tuesday made it crystal clear that they are upset with the nation's patent system, the lawyers who litigate under it and the appeals court that referees it.

During a lively -- bordering on raucous -- hour of arguments on what makes an invention so obvious that it does not deserve a patent, justice after justice piled on criticism of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's three-part "teaching-suggestion-motivation" test for determining obviousness, an issue that arises in virtually every patent application and appeal. The test has been criticized as too patent-friendly, resulting in a proliferation of junk patents that stifle competition.

"Three imponderable nouns," is how Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the test, also calling it "gobbledygook" for good measure.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. called it "Federal Circuit jargon" that is inflexible and "worse than meaningless."

DOJ_NMG_0099348

And when Justice Stephen Breyer said he had read the briefs in the case "15 times" and still could not understand the "motivation" prong of the test, Scalia chimed in, "Like Justice Breyer, I don't understand."

The implied message to the Federal Circuit seemed to be: If two of the brainier justices on the Supreme Court don't have a clue what you are talking about, a new test might be in order.

By the end of the arguments in KSR International v. Teleflex, it seemed obvious that the Federal Circuit's three-part test for obviousness will be modified, if not scrapped altogether. But what will replace it was less clear.

After the argument Tuesday, the Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, defended the test in a telephone interview, asserting, "The judges of our court are quite clear on what it is and how to apply it." He said the test goes back decades -- since before creation of the court in 1982 -- and has been applied with flexibility and common sense. "I wonder if some of the descriptions of the test I have seen lately are accurate."

Michel stressed that he did not attend Tuesday's high court arguments and was not responding to specific comments by any justice.

Under the Federal Circuit's test, anyone challenging a patent must show some evidence that there are prior teachings, suggestions, or motivations or incentives in the field that make the challenged item an obvious development rather than a patentable innovation.

Because it requires some kind of evidence, even in fast-moving technologies in which such evidence can be hard to document, the test has been attacked for making it too hard for examiners to deny a patent application and for competitors to topple existing patents. James Dabney, arguing against the test, told the Court the test makes it very difficult to challenge a patent claim, "no matter how small might be the difference between a patent claim and prior art."

Dabney, a partner in New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, represented KSR, a company that challenged Teleflex's patent for an adjustable gas pedal for cars. The Federal Circuit, using its disputed test, upheld the patent, prompting KSR's plea to the high court.

Dabney's adversary, Thomas Goldstein, who had the suddenly unenviable task of defending the circuit and its test, made a last-ditch effort that could limit the damage. He warned the justices that if they come up with a completely new test, millions of patents that were reviewed or upheld under the old standard for the past 20 years or more could be challenged in court.

"It will create genuine, dramatic instability," said Goldstein, partner in Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, who represented Teleflex. [Goldstein is a contributor to Legal Times.]

Goldstein's floodgate argument appeared to give pause to some justices. "Are there going to be 100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning?" asked Justice David Souter.

Goldstein also noted that all of the patent bar associations that filed briefs in the case were on his side, endorsing the Federal Circuit's test as a balanced and workable standard.

That brought a sharp rebuke from Roberts. "Well, which way does that cut? That just indicates this is profitable for the patent bar," he said.

At another point, Roberts also ridiculed the concept of hiring expert witnesses to testify that a certain innovation was not obvious from prior art.

"Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious?" Roberts asked aloud. "I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

After the argument, Goldstein said that if the Court does only minor tinkering with the standard, litigation might be limited, but if it adds significant new factors to the test, legal challenges to past patents could be "a huge problem."

During one of the hour's lighter moments, Breyer revealed his own aspirations as an inventor. He said that at his home -- he did not specify which one -- raccoons have been eating the mechanism on his garage-door opener that detects when a car is coming or going. He said he had the bright idea of putting the mechanism at the top of the door, rather than on the ground, to protect it from critters. "How could I get a patent for that?" Breyer asked.

High Court To Weigh Price Strategy In Weyerhaeuser Antitrust Case (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- Companies often are accused of cutting prices unfairly to drive a competitor from the market, but is raising prices for the same purpose just as unfair?

The Supreme Court questioned whether Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller rival out of business by paying too much for logs that the Federal Way, Wash., forest-products company allegedly didn't need.

Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to the now-defunct Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. stemming from a jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser violated federal antitrust law. Ross-Simmons, of Longview, Wash., accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder logs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills that use the wood in furniture and other products.

Yesterday's oral arguments before the high court turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty.

Companies often attack competitors by selling products at a lower price, benefiting consumers in the short term. A high legal standard must be met for a company engaging in such conduct to be found to have acted illegally. But there is no such apparent benefit in the Weyerhaeuser case. Chief Justice John Roberts asked whether the lack of such a benefit was a reason not to apply the elevated standard.

"We don't think so," said Andrew Pincus, who was representing Weyerhaeuser. Mr. Pincus pointed out that buying at a higher price in this instance would benefit the sellers supplying logs to Weyerhaeuser.

Ross-Simmons lawyer Michael Haglund said there is evidence in the case that Weyerhaeuser warehoused large volumes of lumber rather than processing it.

(Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons)

During arguments about a patent dispute, several justices expressed discomfort with a legal test for when an invention is too obvious to patent.

KSR International Inc. and Teleflex Inc. have been locked in a dispute over gas-pedal designs. The Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a special patent-appeals court, determined a new design for vehicle gas pedals with electronic sensors qualified for a patent despite being a combination of existing inventions.

The Supreme Court will decide whether the Federal Circuit, through tweaks to a longstanding "obviousness" test in patent law, has made it too easy to get a patent on improvements to existing technologies. The Federal Circuit set a test that the challenger of a patent must prove existing "teaching, suggestion or motivation would have led a person of ordinary skill in the art" to think of the innovation.

Obviousness is a key element in defending against allegations of patent infringement because it allows an accused manufacturer the chance to prove a claimed invention is just the obvious next step in existing technology. If obviousness can be proven, the patent is invalid, and the infringement lawsuit is over. Several justices indicated they are unhappy with the current state of this obviousness test in patent law. "It adds a layer of Federal Circuit jargon on so that attorneys can barter back and forth," said the chief justice.

In the case, Teleflex created the gas pedal design to meet requirements from Ford Motor Co. for its F-350 truck by changing the usual location of electronic sensors in modern gas-pedal systems.

James Dabney, a New York attorney who represented Ontario-based KSR, said the design-patent claim was illegally broad. Thomas Goldstein, a Washington attorney who represented of Limerick, Pa.-based Teleflex, said the Federal Circuit's legal test was meant to "be inclusive" and give protection to innovations that haven't been created from existing patents.

Studios Push Anti-piracy Rules On Apple (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles And Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Apple Computer is coming under pressure from some of Hollywood's biggest movie studios to change the operating environment of its popular iTunes platform, amid growing concern about digital piracy.

DOJ_NMG_0099350

The studios – Universal, 20th Century Fox, Paramount and Warner Bros – are in talks with Apple about making their films available for digital download on iTunes.

After months of discussion, a sticking point has emerged over the studios' demand that Apple limit the number of devices that can use a film downloaded from iTunes.

The studios want to avoid the experience of the music industry, which has yet to recover from years of illegal digital piracy. Apple must introduce a "new model" for feature film content delivery, said one studio executive involved in the talks.

With the average cost of a blockbuster film approaching $100m, movie studios had more to lose than music companies, he added. "We're very willing to do a deal but we're keen to get some concessions from Apple that will account for the differences between the value of music and television content and feature film content."

The talks between Apple and the studios come as retailers are scrambling to get to grips with digital delivery of film content. Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, is entering the nascent market, challenging Amazon and Apple with a different model that ties digital downloads to the sale of DVDs.

Customers buying the newly released DVD of Warner Bros' Superman Returns, will be able to download a digital version of the film on to a portable device, a personal computer, or both for a small extra payment.

NASD, NYSE Agree To Merge Some Oversight (WSJ)

By Randall Smith And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

IN A VICTORY for Wall Street, the two organizations that police brokerage firms unveiled, as expected, a plan to merge some of their operations -- the latest step in a deregulatory push in U.S. markets.

Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the pact, saying it would streamline Wall Street regulation and raise the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. Some investor advocates said the merger could weaken protections for individual investors by effectively removing cops from the beat. No immediate job cuts are planned, with the regulators saying any reductions would come through attrition.

The National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange plan to combine routine examinations, enforcement and rule-making for the securities industry. The plan, which must still be ratified by 5,100 current NASD members, follows a campaign waged intermittently since 2000 by Wall Street's lobbying group, recently renamed the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox hosts a press conference to discuss the new combined regulation of the NYSE and the NASD2. Cox calls today's announcement "a new beginning" and says that the greater integration of world markets requires expanded oversight.

"In ushering in these changes, we'll be improving America's capital markets and making our nation more competitive," Mr. Cox said. He said the merger would eliminate "needless and often harmful duplication" of routine brokerage regulation, while leaving the NYSE free to police its own trading.

However, Jacob Zamansky, a lawyer who represents investors in disputes with Wall Street brokers, said: "I believe the merger is not in the interest of ordinary investors and is being done to promote the interests of Wall Street." He added, "When you have competition among regulators, they all try to do a better job. Generally in monopolies the service goes down."

The regulatory relief for Wall Street comes as both NYSE Group and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. are bidding to acquire exchanges in Europe. Both exchanges must persuade non-U.S. investors and overseas issuers of securities that they won't suffer from the increase in U.S. regulation, notably the Sarbanes-Oxley law that was passed in 2002 after the collapse of Enron Corp. and other post-bubble scandals and added layers of regulation for public companies trading in the U.S.

The tentative pact appears to favor the NASD, whose chairman and chief executive officer, Mary Schapiro, 51 years old, will become CEO of the merged organization, as yet unnamed. A 23-member board will be split evenly between the NASD and the NYSE, with three members named jointly.

Richard G. Ketchum, 55, CEO of the NYSE's regulatory unit, will become nonexecutive chairman, while retaining his current post. He said 470 of the 700 NYSE regulatory employees will join the NASD staff of 2,400, with the rest continuing to police NYSE trading.

Although the NASD itself had to be bolstered after a stock-price bid-rigging scandal in the mid-1990s, since then the smaller NYSE self-regulatory effort has been viewed as the weaker of the two organizations. Indeed, in 2005, the SEC criticized the NYSE for lapses in overseeing stock trading on its own floor.

The NASD, which has faced dissent among its smaller members over the cost of regulation, is offering $35,000 per firm, or a total of $178.5 million for its 5,100 members, "in recognition of anticipated cost savings" if the merger wins the needed votes. The NASD is also cutting fees paid by smaller firms, and it estimates that 200 firms regulated as brokerages by both agencies could save tens of millions in annual compliance costs.

The NASD will also pay the NYSE itself $103 million, Ms. Schapiro said, aimed at ensuring the merger is "revenue neutral" to shareholders of NYSE Group, which went public earlier this year, based on "lost regulatory revenues" during a transition period. The NASD has assets of $2.6 billion based mainly on its past sales of stock of the Nasdaq stock trading system.

Combining the two industry self-regulators, which are overseen by the SEC, picked up steam over the past three years, after the stock market began to rebound and investor memories faded of losses they had suffered.

As they vie to acquire European trading platforms, the two main U.S. exchanges are under pressure to maintain their market share amid the growth of non-U.S. markets. But foreign regulators have criticized the U.S. system for being multilayered. Mr. Cox said the new regulator will be "more capable of working with other regulators around the world."

Over the summer, pressure on the two regulatory groups, which had clashed in the past over control, ramped up. SEC Commissioner Annette Nazareth, a former director of SEC market regulation, began working with them on a compromise. So did former NASD chief Frank Zarb. "This new organization is an idea whose time has come," Mr. Ketchum said.

In addition to the NASD member vote, needed for bylaw changes, the merger requires a public comment period and SEC approval. Officials say they expect the regulator to be up and running by mid-2007.

Some other investor advocates said they supported the move. They included Joseph Borg, president of the North American Securities Administrators Association, and Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America, with Ms. Roper saying she didn't think investors had been helped by the presence of both regulators.

Richard Herr, an analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, said the deal "takes some of the conflict out of the business model" of the NYSE, a reference to the fact that the Big Board has long sought trading business from the brokerage firms that it regulates. Mr. Herr spoke on a panel at a conference in Chicago sponsored by the Futures Industry Association.

Nasdaq, NYSE To Combine Regulators (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK — In one of the biggest changes in the regulation of the U.S. stock markets in more than 70 years, the two organizations responsible for policing the USA's major stock exchanges said Tuesday they will combine forces by the middle of 2007. Together, the combined regulatory group will oversee the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market.

The new group, which is yet to be named, will merge the NASD's 2,400 regulators and examiners with the 470 regulators at the NYSE. Currently, the NASD oversees about 5,100 brokerages, from small operations to big broker-dealers, while NYSE regulators focus on 180 major firms that dominate business on the Big Board.

Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the merger as a way to simplify a complex system.

“This could make our self-regulatory system more efficient and more robust from an investor protection standpoint,” he said. “Instead of two rulebooks, two separate regulatory staffs, and two completely different enforcement systems, we'll have a coordinated, integrated effort to keep our markets free of fraud and unfair dealing.”

Some details of the merger have yet to be worked out. Then the deal will need formal approval from the SEC. But Tuesday's announcement suggests that the merger, which has been encouraged by the firms that have been regulated by both parties, is virtually a done deal.

While the new group is officially a merger of equals, NASD Chairman and CEO Mary Schapiro will emerge as CEO of the new entity, while NYSE Regulation CEO Richard Ketchum becomes chairman. Ketchum will continue to run the NYSE's market surveillance programs, which will remain separate from the merged entity.

Joseph Borg, head of the North American Securities Administrators Association, praised the proposed merger but said state regulators retain an important role in enforcing U.S. securities laws.

"As the combined resources of the regulatory arms of the NASD and NYSE concentrate on international competitiveness and creating efficiencies in national markets, state securities regulators will continue to focus our energies on serving as the local cop on the beat protecting millions of Main Street investors, the backbone of the American economy," Borg said in a statement.

"In general, this idea is a good idea," said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, which has billions of dollars invested in the market through its pension funds. "The (SEC) is to be commended for pushing it forward."

Mack-Cali Says It Will Vie For Reckson (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

A chief competitor of Reckson Associates Realty Corp. says it is teaming with financier Carl Icahn and New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe in their $4.6 billion competing bid to acquire Reckson, a real-estate investment trust.

Mack-Cali Realty Corp. said last night it expects to be admitted as a partner with Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe. "We believe the combined partnership will be a(n) ... enhancement, given our collective strengths," Mack-Cali Chief Executive Mitchell Hersh said in an interview. Mr. Macklowe, through a spokesman, declined to comment.

Mack-Cali, of Edison, N.J., competes directly against Reckson, of Uniondale, N.Y., in the suburban markets of New York. Mack-Cali wasn't contacted as a possible suitor when Reckson put itself up for sale, in part because of two failed merger negotiations between the two companies. Mr. Hersh has said he would have wanted a chance to bid on Reckson's suburban assets. Reckson had no comment on Mr. Hersh's statement last night.

However, earlier yesterday, Reckson notified Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe -- via email to the partnership and a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission -- that their request to bring in additional investors to comb through Reckson's books wouldn't be allowed under the terms of the confidentiality agreement. "We are concerned that you are making a request to bring on additional partners so late in the process of your review," wrote Peter Quick, Reckson's lead independent director.

The developments are the latest in a series of volleys between Reckson directors and Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn, who made an unsolicited competing bid for Reckson on Nov. 16 for $49 a Reckson share. Reckson announced Aug. 3 it would be bought by SL Green Realty Corp., a New York REIT, for $4.1 billion, plus $2 billion in debt assumption, in a cash-and-stock deal equal to about $46 a share today. The pending deal has been contentious because of a secondary transaction in which an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler was to buy back about one-third of the portfolio, all in New York City suburbs, for $2.1 billion -- a value some shareholders say was too low.

Mr. Quick's email pointed out that Reckson had given the partnership until today to provide detailed financial information about their proposed bid. A shareholder meeting scheduled for yesterday has been postponed until Dec. 6 while Reckson's directors consider the Icahn/Macklowe bid.

The email said SL Green had advised Reckson that allowing Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn to bring in additional partners isn't permitted under the merger pact. A spokesman for SL Green had no comment about Mr. Hersh's announcement. Under terms of the merger agreement, if Reckson decides that a competing bid is superior, SL Green would have an opportunity to make a counteroffer. If Mr. Hersh and Mr. Macklowe succeed in acquiring Reckson, it could prove awkward for SL Green and Mr. Rechler. SL Green coveted Reckson's New York City buildings and now risks seeing those in the hands of Macklowe Properties, which competes directly in the same Grand Central Terminal corridor of Manhattan. And Mr. Rechler risks losing his suburban portfolio -- particularly in Long Island where his family first made its name in real estate -- to Mack-Cali's Mr. Hersh, a rival. However, it wasn't clear last night whether the Icahn/Macklowe partnership would separate the suburban buildings from the New York properties if their competing bid for Reckson is successful.

Separately, Mr. Macklowe disclosed that several weeks before he teamed with Mr. Icahn to make a competing bid, he explored buying the REIT on his own, according to a SEC filing.

Iberdrola Bid For Scottish Power May Energize European Sector (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson and Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Spanish power company Iberdrola SA's £11.6 billion ($22.64 billion) offer for Scottish Power PLC could jump-start a long-awaited consolidation in the European power sector, which has been hamstrung by legal and political battles.

If successful, the deal, announced yesterday, would create Europe's third-largest power company by market capitalization with a combined value of about €46 billion ($60.7 billion) and ratchet up the pressure on others in the sector to bulk up.

Power companies across Europe have been struggling to consolidate for the past year, as they seek to boost their size to take advantage of deregulation of the sector by the end of 2007. Greater scale also would give them more purchasing leverage to deal with volatile prices for raw materials such as natural gas. Iberdrola estimates it could slash its capital expenditures by about €40 million a year for the next five years after the tie-up with Scottish Power, as it uses greater muscle to get cheaper prices for natural-gas contracts and wind turbines.

Other sectors, such as telecommunications, infrastructure and banking, have already begun cross-border consolidation in Europe, but political opposition and the lack of physical interconnections between many European countries have stymied power companies' efforts.

E.On AG of Germany, which last year made a 570-pence offer for Scottish Power that was rejected, is trying to acquire Endesa SA, Spain's biggest power company. But its bid is bogged down in courts. Gaz de France SA and Suez are trying to merge to create a French giant, but the deal has run into opposition from Suez shareholders concerned that the price is too low. Enel SpA of Italy, another power company flush with cash, had been interested in Suez as well but stopped short of making a bid.

Iberdrola's bid for Scottish Power is friendly, so it should avoid many of those pitfalls. The part-cash, part-stock offer of 777 pence a share was slightly less than the market anticipated, sending shares in both down. But it was recommended by Scottish Power's board, which said that linkup will help it achieve its objectives of diversifying and increasing size without negative merger effects such as layoffs.

The offer still must pass muster with shareholders at both companies and secure regulatory clearance from authorities in the European Union, the United Kingdom and the U.S., where Scottish Power has wind-power and gas-trading operations. Pending approvals, the deal could be finalized by late April, Iberdrola said.

Iberdrola is offering 400 pence and 0.1646 share for each Scottish Power share, a 21% premium to the average share price in the three months before Scottish Power said, early this month, it was in talks with potential bidders. Iberdrola plans to issue 245 million new shares, or 21% of the new company's capital, to finance the offer.

Iberdrola Chairman Ignacio Sánchez Galán said the deal would boost earnings per share from the first year and wouldn't jeopardize Iberdrola's single-A credit ratings.

Iberdrola shares have risen about 50% in the past year thanks to strong profitability, growth prospects and constant rumors of further consolidation in Spain. The shares now trade at higher multiples than most of its peers. That makes them a powerful currency for acquisitions. Iberdrola has also been able to tap into a flood of money made available by banks. Barclays PLC, Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, and ABN Amro Holding NV provided £7.9 billion through a credit facility for the deal, and Mr. Sánchez Galán said an additional seven banks offered loan facilities of €5 billion to €15 billion each.

"Our credit may not be unlimited, but it's pretty close," he said.

Spanish companies have one additional advantage over European rivals in cross-border takeovers. Under Spanish law, goodwill accumulated on foreign operations is tax-deductible. That has allowed Spanish firms such as Telefónica SA and Ferrovial SA to outbid rivals for numerous acquisitions across Europe.

For Iberdrola, the deal would boost its position in renewable energy, especially in wind power, at a time when European utilities are hunting for ways to produce cleaner energy to comply with strict environmental legislation.

The deal would also give the Spanish firm diversification of its business, adding deregulated power markets in the U.K. and the U.S. to its traditional base in Spain and Latin America. Iberdrola would also get Scottish Power's sophisticated gas- and financial-trading operations, people close to the deal said.

2nd-Biggest Spanish Power Concern To Buy ScottishPower (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean and Heather Timmons

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

MADRID, Nov. 28 — The Spanish power company Iberdrola announced Tuesday that it had agreed to buy ScottishPower for $22.5 billion, a move that would create one of Europe's largest utilities.

The board of ScottishPower said Tuesday that it would approve the bid, which would amount to 777 pence, or about $15 a share, slightly more than half of that in cash.

Iberdrola is Spain's second-largest power company behind Endesa and one of the world's leading producers of wind power. The deal with ScottishPower would enable it to increase its wind power capacity by as much as 50 percent, analysts said, and to broaden its access not only to the British market but also to the American one, where it has been looking to expand in recent months.

The deal would also allow the company to lower costs and to diversify beyond the Spanish market, where opportunities for growth are increasingly limited.

"Together we will be able to guarantee immediate synergies and to access future economies of scale," Ignacio Galán, the chief executive of Iberdrola, said in a statement.

"The resulting group will be very well positioned for the future European energy market and will have a strong platform for growth, especially in renewable energies, a market in which it will be world leader."

There has been heavy activity recently in Spain's energy market, with E.On of Germany and Gas Natural of Spain vying for Endesa.

The activity led analysts to speculate that Iberdrola saw itself as a possible takeover target as well.

"This deal is a way for the company's directors to protect themselves from takeovers from abroad and within Spain," said Jordi Padilla, the director of equities at Atlas Capital in Madrid.

Over the longer term, Mr. Padilla said, the deal could allow Iberdrola to eventually make a move for a Spanish energy company, like Gas Natural, without having to subject itself to Spanish regulations, which would probably require it to sell assets to avert monopoly concerns.

By joining with ScottishPower, he said, "a large part of its business would be outside of Spain, so regulatory authority could lie with the European Union rather than Spain if it decides to make a move for a Spanish company."

Iberdrola's offer was slightly lower than the 800 pence (about $15.50) some analysts said they had expected. But the price still struck many as elevated.

"Iberdrola is offering what we considered a high price for ScottishPower," Citigroup said in a note released. "We estimate a slightly negative impact in our Iberdrola evaluation, although we consider that the company's medium/long-term fundamentals could improve, particularly in the wind power business."

Spanish companies, buoyed by a robust economic expansion that has lasted more than a decade, have been aggressively looking abroad for investment opportunities in recent years, particularly in Latin America and, more recently, in Britain.

Grupo Ferrovial announced the takeover of the British airport company BAA in June for $20.5 billion. Last year, Telefónica acquired the British mobile phone company O2 for $31.5 billion, and in 2004 Grupo Santander acquired the British bank Abbey National.

Iberdrola, which is based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, has operations in 28 countries and had $15.3 billion in sales last year. The combined company would be worth $84 billion, the companies said.

ScottishPower, based in Glasgow, has been considered a takeover target for more than 18 months, after a foray into the United States failed to generate the expected revenue.

The company sold its United States unit, PacifiCorp, to Berkshire Hathaway in May 2005, recording a $1.7 billion loss. ScottishPower retains some wind power and gas storage businesses in the United States, however.

E.On of Germany made an unsolicited bid for ScottishPower in September 2005 that was rebuffed several times. E.On gave up the chase after offering 570 pence a share.

Philip Bowman, chief executive of ScottishPower, said in a statement that the deal with Iberdrola avoided "the negative consequences for employees" posed by most possible mergers. "The combination of the two companies will permit ScottishPower to develop on a global scale in an increasingly competitive environment, and the conditions offered by Iberdrola represent an attractive price for our shareholders," he said.

The deal, which Iberdrola said should be completed in April, is subject to approval from European regulators and shareholders of both companies.

Jack McConnell, first minister of the regional government in Scotland, told reporters Tuesday that he expected the European Union to take a close look at the deal. "Today's announcement will be of concern to Scottish consumers and the employees of ScottishPower," he said, according to The Associated Press.

Iberdrola said it expected cost savings of about $170 million once it acquired ScottishPower, a figure that analysts at Dresdner Kleinwort called "aggressive." But they added that because of Iberdrola's "high operating standards, we give them the benefit of the doubt."

Scottish Power OK's $22.5B Takeover Bid (HC/AP)

By Robert Barr, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle/AP, November 29, 2006

LONDON — Scottish Power PLC said Tuesday it has agreed to a $22.5 billion buyout offer from Spanish company Iberdrola SA that would create one of Europe's biggest utilities in a consolidating market.

But the cash-and-stock bid was lower than some had expected, and analysts said it opened the possibility of a rival bid even though Scottish Power's price finished below the offered price on Tuesday.

A Scottish official, meanwhile, raised concerns about the deal's impact on competition.

The proposal follows others in the European utility sector, where Germany's E.On AG is trying to buy Spain's Endesa SA and Gaz de France and France's Suez are planning to combine.

Iberdrola said the deal for Scottish Power could result in cost savings of as much as $170 million a year and Chairman Ignacio Sanchez Galan said Iberdrola intends to sell assets worth more than 1 billion euros ($1.2 billion) in the year after the deal is completed.

Jack McConnell, first minister of Scotland's regional government, expressed wariness, and said he would seek assurances from the European Union that the takeover would preserve competition.

"Today's announcement will be of concern to Scottish consumers and the employees of Scottish Power," McConnell told reporters, refusing to say whether he regarded it as good or bad for Scotland.

McConnell said he would seek assurances from European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso that the EU would evaluate the takeover consistent with its competition rules.

Sanchez Galan said the planned takeover will favor future consolidation in Spain's energy sector.

By acquiring Scottish Power, Iberdrola will gain a significant percentage of non-Spanish sales and will therefore face fewer restrictions on mergers and acquisitions from Spain's stringent industry regulators, he said at a news conference.

Under European Union takeover law, mergers and acquisitions must be reviewed by EU regulators if any of the companies involved have EU sales outside their home market accounting for one-third or more of total sales.

Sanchez Galan said Iberdrola's acquisition of significant European interests outside its home market will therefore pave the way for any potential Spanish deal "from both a legal and regulatory standpoint" by giving the EU the final say on the conditions for such a deal.

Iberdrola offered 400 pence ($7.75) in cash and 0.1646 new Iberdrola shares for every Scottish Power share, the company said in a statement. That meant the offer was equivalent to 777 pence ($15.06) per share.

"The combination of part cash and part Iberdrola shares just convolutes the offer somewhat," said Martin Slaney, an analyst at GFT Global Markets.

He said speculation had been the bid would be as much as 12 billion pounds, or 800 pence a share.

In trading on the London Stock Exchange, Scottish Power shares fell 0.8 percent to close at 740 pence ($14.34).

The takeover is to be completed by April, subject to regulatory and shareholder approval, and Iberdrola is planning to issue 245 million new shares to finance the deal, director for corporate development Jose Luis del Valle told analysts on a conference call.

Sanchez Galan reiterated Iberdrola's target of paying a dividend of 1.50 euros per share ($1.97) in 2009.

Analyst Andrew Moulder of New York-based Creditsights commented that it was "hard to see a compelling rationale for the tie-up." The key to the deal, he said, is the development of the renewables business.

Iberdrola said the combined company would be a leading producer of renewable energy, with installed capacity of 5,707 megawatts of wind generation and 333 megawatts of hydroelectric power.

Global Insight analyst Matthew Hall, however, said the agreement would likely bring several benefits such as geographic diversification, greater economies of scale and operational synergies.

"With the companies largely residing in separate markets they seem well placed to keep job losses to a minimum, and regulatory concerns over market dominance are also likely to be reduced," he wrote.

Iberdrola, based in Bilbao, has business operations in gas and electricity in 28 countries. In 2005 Iberdrola reported revenue of 11.738 billion euros ($15.4 billion) and operating profit of 2.26 billion euros ($2.97 billion).

Scottish Power supplies gas and electric services to more than 5.2 million homes and businesses in the United Kingdom, and operates electricity generation and gas storage facilities in Britain, the U.S. and western Canada.

In March, Scottish Power completed the sale of its U.S. unit, PacifiCorp, to Warren Buffet's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. for $5.1 billion in cash. Berkshire Hathaway also assumed $4.3 billion in debt.

Scottish Power reported earlier this month that its net profit dropped 21 percent to 180.8 million pounds ($345.1 million) in the first half while revenue rose 23 percent.

Scottish Power Backs Iberdrola Bid (FT)

By Toby Shelley and Mark Mulligan

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Iberdrola of Spain on Tuesday unveiled an agreed £11.6bn (€17.2bn, $22.5bn) takeover bid for Scottish Power which would create Europe's third-biggest integrated power utility.

The Spanish company, which has been in talks with the UK group for at least a month, said it had won a recommendation from the board of Scottish Power for its terms, finalised during intense negotiations at the weekend.

Under the terms announced on Tuesday, investors will receive 777p a share, with 53 per cent paid in cash and the remainder as 0.1646 of a share in the combined group.

There will also be a special 12p dividend for Scottish Power shareholders. New Iberdrola shares to the value of 21.4 per cent of the issued share capital of the combined group will be issued.

In early London trading, Scottish Power shares were flat at 746p on disappointment that the offer was not all cash. Iberdrola shares were down 1.5 per cent at €32.27 in Madrid.

The offer price is below the 800p that had been mooted in recent days, but early analyst reaction was that it was a good price for Scottish Power shareholders. One said it represented a premium of 40 per cent on his bank's calculation of the worth of the sum of the part of the group.

Peter Atherton, analyst at Citigroup, said it was very unlikely that a rival bidder could stretch the valuation as far as Iberdrola. The Spanish company benefits from an ability to write off goodwill against tax, which is reckoned to be worth 50p a share to its offer.

Mr Atherton said the only alternative would be a buyer breaking up Scottish Power, which is vertically integrated – but that would involve regulatory hurdles and might provoke opposition in Scotland.

The acquisition, which requires regulatory and shareholder approval, is expected to complete in April and to be earnings-enhancing from the start, according to Iberdola, which is one of the world's biggest producers of renewable energy.

Operating cost savings before tax of £88m a year are forecast, along with annual capital expenditure savings of £30m. However, one analyst said that most of the £88m appeared to come from group level overheads rather than synergies.

Ignacio Galán, Iberdrola chairman, said: "Together we will be able to guarantee immediate synergies and secure economies of scale in the medium and long term."

The combination would create Europe's third largest utility – behind EdF of France and Germany's Eon – with an enterprise value of more than £43bn. But Iberdrola's successful search for a foreign tie-up, coupled with Eon's aggressive €37bn bid for Endesa, Spain's largest utility, comes as a blow for the Spanish government, which has attempted to foster the creation of national champions.

Just over a year ago Madrid backed a bid by Gas Natural, the gas supplier, for Endesa under which Iberdrola would have been offered up to €9bn in surplus assets.

Iberdrola is being advised by ABN Amro, while Morgan Stanley is acting for Scottish Power.

Power Merger Surge May Blow A Fuse (FT)

By Ed Crooks

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Iberdrola surprised no one in launching a bid for Scottish Power. But the question many were asking was whether it would be the last of its kind for some time.

A wave of mergers has swept through the European energy sector, and more consolidation has been widely expected.

But with two of the biggest potential deals bogged down in legal and political quagmires, and this latest one viewed by the markets with a jaundiced eye, it seems enthusiasm is fading.

The argument for mergers between European utilities, expounded most eloquently by Wulf Bernotat, chief executive of Eon, is that in the future a small number of big operators will dominate the market, and the smaller ones will fall by the wayside.

The European Union's energy market is being shaped by two forces - the pressure coming from the European Commission for more liberalisation and integration of national markets, to create a truly competitive EU energy market, and the intensifying competition between countries for scarce energy resources.

Only what Mr Bernotat describes as the "pan-European energy majors" will be able to cut their costs enough, by running centralised systems serving big customer bases, to compete in this single European market. And as the EU becomes increasingly dependent on Russia for its gas supplies, only those biggest companies will be able to stand up to Gaz-prom, Russia's monopoly.

Many analysts view those arguments as a rationalisation of decisions made for other reasons. European utilities have been awash with cash and have few opportunities to use it, so they are looking at acquisitions. But it is an argument that several companies have made, and it is one of the reasons Iberdrola cites for buying Scottish Power. The problem with the strategy is in its execution. Eon's bid for Endesa has faced determined government opposition and a series of court battles, and Eon has been forced to raise its offer significantly.

The proposed merger of the state-controlled Gaz de France with Suez, the private French utility, has been tied up in court and is the subject of ferocious controversy. Iberdrola does not look likely to face any such serious regulatory or legal obstacles in winning Scottish Power. But it has faced an unenthusiastic response from investors. Its shares have been falling since the talks with Scottish Power were revealed, and yesterday they lost another 2 per cent.

Iberdrola argues that the agreement will enhance earnings from the start because of cost savings and the tax break given to Spanish companies for writing off acquisition goodwill.

But several analysts suggested that even at 777p a share, lower than the 800p originally suggested, the price for Scottish Power looked very full.

High valuations are common across the European utilities sector.

So for companies considering launching a bid, the calculation is this: do they want to let themselves in for a long and painful struggle, at the end of which the rewards could be meagre?

Graham Weale, director of European consulting at Global Insight, suspects not. "These deals are extremely hard work, and whether any acquirer would be doing the right thing in buying an overpriced company is open to question," he says.

But for as long as utilities' profits remain high and money is cheap, there is always a chance that someone will make a move.

As one analyst puts it: "Are there more people out there who are ambitious fools? Probably yes."

The remaining two independent energy suppliers, Centrica and Scottish and Southern Energy, look more tempting than most because the UK market has been relatively accessible. But Peter Atherton of Citigroup says: "Both would extract very substantial premiums and just to get a deal done, RWE or EdF, for example, might not be prepared to go that far."

MORE 3rd UPDATE: Iberdrola To Buy Scottish Power For GBP11.6B (DJ)

By Alex MacDonald

Dow Jones, November 28, 2006

LONDON (Dow Jones)--Spanish utility Iberdrola SA (IBE.MC) Tuesday agreed to buy U.K. utility Scottish Power PLC (SPI) in a combination of cash and shares that values the Scottish utility at GBP11.6 billion.

Iberdrola, Spain's second-largest utility by market capitalization, said its offer represents the equivalent of 777 pence a share to Scottish Power shareholders.

The Iberdrola proposal offers 400 pence in cash and 0.1646 of a new Iberdrola share for every Scottish Power share. It will also offer a special dividend of 12 pence a share. The cash component of the deal, including the special dividend, accounts for about 53% of the deal's value, or GBP6.1 billion.

Scottish Power, the U.K.'s fifth-largest energy supplier by number of customers, said it has agreed to the offer. The board of directors will recommend the cash and shares tie-up to shareholders in an extraordinary meeting at a later date.

The deal will need approval from regulators including the European Commission, the U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and U.S. state regulatory commissions or authorities, Iberdrola said.

The combined company would make Iberdrola the third-largest European utility by market capitalization behind Electricite de France (1024251.FR) and E.ON AG (EON) of Germany.

E.ON has bid for Spanish utility Endesa SA (ELE) in a planned deal that would create Europe's largest energy utility.

The planned Iberdrola takeover of Scottish Power would boost the combined company's annual revenues to GBP13.5 billion on a pro forma basis and give the company a strong presence in Spain, the U.K., the U.S. and other countries as well, Iberdrola said.

"The proposed integration of Scottish Power with Iberdrola is fully in line with our respective strategies ... it will create value for both our companies," said Ignacio Galan, chairman and chief executive of Iberdrola. "The new group will be well positioned (strong growth) ... particularly in renewable energy, a sector in which it will be a world leader. All of this will be positive for all our stakeholders."

Iberdrola expects to achieve GBP88 million a year in cost savings over the next five years by reducing corporate head count, combining wholesale natural gas purchases and implementing best practices, a person familiar with the matter said.

The company said it expects to save another GBP30 million from its combined capital expenditure program.

The combined company would have an aggregate installed generation capacity on a pro forma basis of 36,603 megawatts and one of the world's largest portfolios of wind farms - about 5,707 megawatts of installed wind generation capacity.

Iberdrola said it would have to issue shares equivalent to 21.4% of the combined company's issued share capital.

Andrew Moulder of independent credit and equity research company Credit Sights said Iberdrola's bid for Scottish Power looks expensive. "It's hard to see a compelling rationale for the tie-up," he said, adding that the synergies are likely to be small.

Moulder said the deal rationale would hinge "on what they do with the renewables business" and added that Scottish Power shareholders may be slightly dismayed that the 777-pence-a-share offer wasn't closer to 800 pence.

As of 1031 GMT, Scottish Power's shares were down 2 pence, or 0.27%, at 744 pence.

The cash and dividends component of the bid will be financed through a credit facility of GBP7.96 billion that Iberdrola has raised from ABN Amro Holdings NV (ABN), Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC (RBS.LN) and Barclays Capital, a division of Barclays PLC (BCS). About GBP6.1 billion will be used to fund the cash part of the bid while the remainder will be used to refinance Scottish Power's debt.

Philip Bowman, CEO of Scottish Power, welcomed the deal as a way to diversify the Glasgow-based utility's business at a time when increased mergers and acquisitions have led to a "massive change within the European utilities landscape."

"Scottish Power needs to expand its geographical presence, diversify operating risks, achieve greater economies of scale and have the financial strength to invest in substantially larger infrastructure projects over coming years," Bowman said. "This transaction achieves these objectives without the adverse social consequences for employees."

ABN AMRO advised Iberdrola on the deal, while Morgan Stanley (MS) advised Scottish Power on the deal.

Novartis, Focused On Medicine, May Shed Gerber (WSJ)

Nestlé Weighs Buying Unit It Has Long Sought as Part Of Deal Already on the Table

Novartis AG may be prepared to sell Gerber Products Co., one of the world's largest and best-known makers of baby food, and could have a willing buyer in Nestlé SA.

Novartis, a Swiss pharmaceutical concern, already is in negotiations with Nestlé, also of Switzerland, to sell a medical-nutrition business. Nestlé executives are toying with the idea of trying to make the acquisition of Gerber part of the same deal, according to people familiar with the matter.

Novartis Chief Executive Daniel Vasella said in an interview yesterday that the company "probably would act opportunistically" if an offer for Gerber emerged, although he added that there was no auction for Gerber under way.

Reporter Dennis Berman2 has more on the potential pair-up.

Gerber, of Fremont, Mich., and Novartis's medical-nutrition business together would fetch between $4 billion and $5 billion, estimate people familiar with the matter. They figure Gerber alone would be valued at more than $3 billion.

Nestlé has been hungry for Gerber for more than a decade. Even though the market for infant purées and other mushy concoctions has been relatively slow growing, the profit margin for baby food is among the highest in the prepared-food industry, at 24% in the U.S., compared with 16% for all packaged food, according to Morgan Stanley.

If Novartis decides to part with Gerber, Nestlé may have to compete with others for the business. Numico NV of the Netherlands, the maker of Nutrica baby food and other brands, is also likely to be interested, as would private-equity firms, people close to those firms say.

Dr. Vasella said Gerber is growing and profitable but has been challenged by other baby-food brands undercutting its prices. And, he said, Novartis is trying to focus on medicines and vaccines. Dr. Vasella said nutrition, including Gerber, was a "more tangential" business for the company, although he also said that didn't mean the nutrition business necessarily had to be sold.

Gerber is part of Novartis's consumer-health division, which also includes over-the-counter medicines, animal-health products, medical nutrition and Ciba-brand contact lenses. The consumer-health unit had total sales of $7.3 billion last year, representing about 23% of Novartis's sales of $32.2 billion. The prescription-drug unit had sales of $20.3 billion last year.

Nestlé first tried to acquire Gerber in 1994, but lost to Sandoz AG, which later merged with Ciba-Geigy to form Novartis. Since then, Novartis has taken steps to broaden Gerber's business beyond jarred foods. In 2000, Gerber began selling a line of powders, oils and other toiletries for children, and in 2002 it launched microwavable meals for older toddlers. It also has a life-insurance unit. But the baby-food business has never been a good fit for a parent company that mainly sells medications.

Nestlé is the world's largest manufacturer of infant nutritional products, largely through its leading positions in fast-growing developing countries such as Brazil and China, as well as some European countries such as Spain. However, in the U.S., the world's largest infant-nutrition market, it has a small No. 3 position in infant formula, behind the two dominant players, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Abbott Laboratories.

Nestlé has no presence in baby food in the U.S., where Novartis, thanks to Gerber, is dominant with a 79% market share, according to Morgan Stanley.

Infant nutrition is one of the best businesses in the food industry because it has strong customer loyalty and limited competition from private labels. Once parents find a formula or food for their babies that they like and trust, they tend to stick to it and are willing to pay higher prices. As a result, it is difficult for new companies to break into the business without buying an established brand.

That could make Gerber an attractive asset for Nestlé Chief Executive Peter Brabeck, who has steadily rearranged Nestlé's food portfolio in the past 10 years, shedding underperforming businesses and making major acquisitions in pet food, ice cream and diet products. Infant nutrition remains one of the last major gaps in Nestlé's portfolio, particularly in the U.S.

In the past several years, Mr. Brabeck has made Nestlé's nutrition business, from sports nutrition to clinical nutrition, a major priority, betting that growth and profits will come from health-related areas.

In 2005, Nestlé's sales from nutrition products amounted to 5.2 billion Swiss francs ($4.3 billion), half of that in infant formula and a third of it from baby food. Along with the Nestlé brand, it also owns the Neslac, Nan and Cerelac brands. Nestlé has a goal of raising annual growth in sales of nutrition products to about 10% in the long term from 6.1% achieved in the first nine months of this year. The company wants to raise the operating-profit margin in the division to 20% from around 17% now.

Novartis has also been realigning its business. The company is pursuing three main areas: inventing new prescription medicines; vaccines; and selling low-cost generic drugs and over-the-counter medicines.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices To Decide Merits Of Global Warming Petition (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — The Supreme Court will hear oral arguments on Wednesday on the questions of whether the federal government, particularly the Environmental Protection Agency, is authorized and obligated to take action to alleviate global warming.

Massachusetts, which has been joined by 11 other states, 3 cities and 13 environmental groups, will argue that the federal agency has shirked its legal responsibility to protect the public and ignored the requirements of the Clean Air Act.

Federal lawyers, in tandem with those of the auto industry, are arguing that existing law is inadequate to support far-reaching regulation, and that Congress, or the foreign policy arena, or both, are the appropriate venues to produce new global warming policies.

Calling the case "the most pressing environmental case in decades," Massachusetts's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, said, "The most indisputable fact in this case is that our climate is changing and that change is being caused by dangerous greenhouse-gas emissions."

He added, "The federal government's willing suspension of belief when it comes to global climate change has left it to the states to stand up and force action."

But, lawyers on both sides of the issue agree, the justices' answers to a more basic question — whether the plaintiffs have a right to bring the case — may have the greatest ramifications.

In deciding that issue, known legally as a question of standing, the justices may determine whether Massachusetts and its fellow petitioners have made a good enough case that the atmosphere and oceans are warming at a dangerous rate, fueled in part by human actions like burning fossil fuels, and that the petitioners have been harmed in the process.

Second, the court may decide whether any person or state injured by a worldwide phenomenon may seek legal redress even though it would only partly alleviate any damage.

The question of standing was not decided by the appeals court. That panel rejected Massachusetts's claim that the federal environmental agency was obligated to regulate the emission of heat-trapping chemicals from the tailpipes of new passenger vehicles. One judge said the harm the state had suffered was too generalized to give it standing. A second said the potential loss of coastal land was enough to give it automatic standing, and the third judge did not address the issue.

The case originally stemmed from a 1999 application by 19 environmental groups asking the E.P.A. to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions in new passenger vehicles.

"I think by far the issue that could have the most far-ranging impact is the standing issue," said Jeffrey Holmstead, who until recently was assistant administrator for air and radiation at the E.P.A. "Just because if the court determines that these petitioners don't have standing, what that means is the federal courts really won't be available for people who want to bring lawsuits related to climate change."

Mr. Holmstead, who is a partner at Bracewell & Giuliani, a lobbying firm, added, "From my perspective, I think that's not a bad thing because I don't think the courts are equipped to deal with issues like this."

Environmental groups are also concentrating heavily on the question of the agency's authority, under the Clean Air Act, to regulate carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases as air pollutants.

Paul D. Clement, the solicitor general, opposes this, saying in his brief not only that Massachusetts and the other petitioners lack standing, but also that the action they seek would have little impact on global climate change. The United States transportation sector, which is mostly made up of passenger vehicles, accounted for about 7 percent of worldwide fossil-fuel emissions in the 1990s.

E.P.A. action, he argued, "would therefore result in, at most, a tiny percentage reduction in worldwide greenhouse-gas emissions."

For Mr. Reilly, that is beside the point. He argues in the Massachusetts brief that under the Clean Air Act, the federal agency "is free to propose a comprehensive solution to the problem of climate change if it wishes to do so, but it is not free to reject the approach Congress explicitly set forth."

The question of the agency's authority to regulate carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases as pollutants "is the environmentalists' big issue," said Richard J. Lazarus, a law professor at Georgetown University. For the government, he added, a third issue, whether the agency is not just permitted to regulate greenhouse gases but is obliged to do so, may loom largest.

Supreme Court To Hear Case On Global Warming (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will take up its first-ever case on global warming today as it hears arguments from states and environmentalists seeking federal regulation of motor-vehicle emissions.

The Environmental Protection Agency contends that the problem of carbon dioxide emissions and other so-called greenhouse gases is too big and falls beyond its statutory mandate.

The court's work on the case will focus on the scope of the federal Clean Air Act rather than the debate over emissions' impact on the climate. However, the justices' ruling could shape the U.S. government's role in a pressing issue of the day and ultimately affect whether automakers will be required to build cleaner-running cars and trucks.

As the Bush administration has resisted forcing industries to control the greenhouse gases that the National Academy of Sciences and numerous scientific groups say cause global warming, California and 10 other states have made plans to enforce their own regulations for tailpipe emissions.

The case could have ramifications for those states because the authority to regulate emissions, even on the state level, derives from the Clean Air Act.

The case's significance is reflected in the more than 20 "friend of the court" briefs filed from a range of industry groups, scientists, and conservation and recreation interests. Rising temperatures have been linked to numerous environmental problems, including glacier thaw in Alaska, reduced water supply in the Great Lakes and lost coastal land in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts, along with 11 other states, three cities and several environmental groups, brought the case in an effort to force the administration to regulate emissions.

The dispute revolves around a part of the Clean Air Act that requires regulation of "any air pollutant" from vehicles that "may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The act defines "welfare" to include effects on climate and weather.

The EPA says the provision does not cover greenhouse gases and says that even if it did, the agency has the option to not exercise its authority based on policy considerations.

The states say the Clean Air Act plainly authorizes regulation of greenhouse gases and that if the EPA were to step in, it could address "sources responsible for some 60% of this country's carbon dioxide emissions — 23% from vehicles and the rest from the power plants left unregulated" by the EPA.

"We simply want the justices to tell EPA to get it right on the law," says Lisa Heinzerling, a Georgetown University professor assisting the Massachusetts attorney general.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement says in a brief on behalf of the EPA that the agency lacks the authority to take on global climate change, given the "extraordinary economic and political ramifications" of the issue. He contends the states lack legal standing to press the case because they have not shown they will be harmed by the EPA's decision to not regulate emissions in this country, "which involves only a tiny fraction of global greenhouse gas emissions."

The Sierra Club and other environmentalist groups hope the case increases pressure on the White House and Congress to act on climate change.

It's Not Up To The EPA (USAT)

By Jonathan Adler

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Several states and environmentalist groups are asking the Supreme Court to force the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to impose nationwide regulations on greenhouse gases, the most ubiquitous byproducts of modern industrial society.

The EPA only has the authority it has been delegated by Congress, and — as of yet — Congress has never given the EPA regulatory authority over greenhouse gases. Congress has not been silent on the matter of global warming, however. Since 1978, it has repeatedly addressed global climate concerns without once giving any indication that it sought to authorize federal regulation.

To the contrary, Congress has rejected specific regulatory proposals, endorsing non-regulatory measures in their stead. The Bush administration has also been reticent, but it should not be criticized for failing to exert regulatory authority it does not have. If current climate policies are inadequate and unwise, the place to seek redress is back in Congress, not the courts.

The petitioners argue that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new-vehicle tailpipes — and a superficial reading of the statutory text could suggest as much. Yet it is clear to all involved that the relevant statutory provisions were enacted to address local and regional pollution problems — such as soot, smog and acid rain — not global concerns such as climate change. If global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for our elected representatives to make.

This case also presents the important legal question of whether states and environmentalist groups have “standing” to bring their complaint to federal courts in the first place. Standing requires that a plaintiff show actual or imminent concrete injury.

This is easy to do when pollution harms a specific property or environmental resource, but it's much more difficult in the context of nationwide emissions anticipated to have global effects over many decades. The fact that climate change is a global concern is yet one more reason to leave the question to elected legislators and treaty negotiators.

Global warming is a real concern, but global warming policy ultimately belongs to the political branches, not the judiciary.

Greenhouse Courts (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin And Lee A. Casey Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Like it or not, the courts play a central role in the modern administrative state. When Congress began to delegate rulemaking powers to federal agencies in the 1930s and 1940s, it subjected their activities to numerous procedural safeguards, compliance with which, in the end, is adjudicated in court. This does not mean, however, that courts should always play the leading role. The Supreme Court is now considering two environmental law cases that superbly illustrate the circumstances in which judges should overturn unlawful administrative actions, and when they should affirm sensible ones.

The first, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy, is one of the many enforcement actions the EPA has brought, mostly against electric utilities, under a relatively obscure part of the Clean Air Act known as "New Source Review." NSR is a preconstruction permitting program that requires installation of advanced pollution control equipment. For 30 years, the EPA and the states controlled existing air pollution through a variety of other programs to comply with health-based standards. NSR was applied only when an industrial facility was built from scratch, adding new air pollution, or altered so fundamentally that its emitting capacity was increased.

Unfortunately, beginning in the late 1990s, the EPA asserted that NSR was necessary whenever plants changed or upgraded their equipment, even if there was no increase in their underlying emission capacity. Remarkably, the EPA also claimed that this was its position all along and that, as a result, electric utilities owed billions of dollars in penalties. This dramatic about-face was particularly shameful because the EPA knew about the industry's non-NSR-triggering repair and replacement practices for decades, never objected to them, and even confirmed to the states and the industry that their approach was correct.

Not surprisingly, the federal appeals court in Virginia concluded last year that the EPA's new interpretation was not only inconsistent with its regulations, but was unsupportable by the Clean Air Act's language. The case was then appealed to the Supreme Court, where government lawyers had the temerity to claim that, even if the EPA changed the rules of the game, no court can now consider the industry's arguments. Perversely, the government based this claim on a part of the act designed to ensure that citizens and industry are able to challenge meaningfully unlawful EPA actions.

The Duke Energy case shows the administrative state at its most abusive, and cries out for judicial intervention. The EPA can revise its NSR rules, but only in compliance with the statutory text, prospectively, and though the statutorily required "notice and comment" administrative process. It cannot change the rules midstream and then claim that companies have broken laws of which they were never properly informed. The correct judicial response here is to reverse EPA's actions, and to end the enforcement cases.

By contrast, in Massachusetts v. EPA -- being argued today before the Supreme Court -- the court should uphold the agency's decision not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from all of the new cars and light trucks sold in the U.S. The EPA refused to impose such rules, as a means of addressing global warming fears, because it believed that Congress did not mean to treat carbon dioxide, otherwise harmless to people, as a "pollutant" under the Clean Air Act. In addition, the EPA noted that there were still many scientific uncertainties about global warming, and that any solution must be global, involving developing as well as developed countries. The D.C. federal appeals court upheld this decision and the Supreme Court is now reviewing the case.

Here, the justices should dismiss the matter because the complainants -- states and environmental activists -- cannot meet the constitutionally required "standing" to maintain a lawsuit. The Constitution requires federal litigants to meet three elements before they have standing: (1) an individualized injury for which the law provides redress; (2) proof that the injury was actually caused by the challenged action -- here, the EPA's decision not to undertake a rulemaking; and (3) proof that the injury is likely to be redressed by the court order sought. The complainants in this and in other "global warming" cases have not and cannot meet these requirements.

First, their "injury," assuming it exists at all, is a series of actions (or inaction) that arguably impacts the earth's climate. This is not an individualized injury to some recognized legal interest. If manmade warming is happening, it affects every human being on the planet and is not "individualized." Second, proving that any particular government, corporate or individual action has contributed to global warming is also impossible. The earth has been warming since the end of the "little ice age" began to end around 1750, and humans have been pumping carbon dioxide into the atmosphere since the discovery of fire. Although scientists speculate that the increased use of fossil fuels is responsible for the warming trend, they cannot say how much carbon in the atmosphere is too much, or when that point was reached -- if it has been -- or whether the making of a rule regarding future regulation of a segment of the U.S. motor vehicle fleet can have any discernable impact on global climate at all.

Third, and most important, the complainants cannot show how a judicial decision requiring EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions would actually remedy the problem. They can only speculate that, if the U.S. begins to reduce at some future date carbon emissions from some motor vehicles, the rest of the world will follow suit not only for those types of vehicles but all other possible sources of emissions. But other countries may not. Most industrialized nations that have already promised, by the Kyoto Protocol, to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions are not meeting the agreed targets. Meanwhile, India and China refuse even to consider accepting binding emission reduction targets.

Technological advances will some day permit substantial greenhouse gas reductions and economic expansion at the same time. Indeed, the U.S. is the world's leader in the development and commercialization of revolutionary zero-emission manufacturing, power generation and automotive technologies. In the meantime, if economic growth is to be sacrificed because of global warming fears, the decision should be taken by Congress and the president, the people's elected representatives, and not by the courts.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey served in the departments of justice and energy under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. They have filed amicus briefs in both cases discussed here.

The End Of Ingenuity (NYT)

By Thomas Homer-Dixon

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

MAYBE Malthus was on to something, after all.

First, some background: Twenty-six years ago, in one of the most famous wagers in the history of science, Paul Ehrlich, John Harte and John P. Holdren bet Julian Simon that the prices of five key metals would rise in the next decade. Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues, all environmental scientists, believed that humankind's growing population and appetite for natural resources would eventually drive the metals' costs up. Simon, a professor of business administration, thought that human innovation would drive costs down.

Ten years later, Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues sent Simon a check for $576.07 — an amount representing the decline in the metals' prices after accounting for inflation. To many, the bet's outcome refuted Malthusian arguments that human population growth and resource consumption — and economic growth more generally — would run headlong into the limits of a finite planet. Human inventiveness, stimulated by modern markets, would always trump scarcity.

Indeed, the 1990s seemed to confirm this wisdom. Energy and commodity prices collapsed; ideas (not physical capital or material resources) were the new source of wealth, and local air and water got cleaner — at least in rich countries.

But today, it seems, Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues may have the last (grim) laugh. The debate about limits to growth is coming back with a vengeance. The world's supply of cheap energy is tightening, and humankind's enormous output of greenhouse gases is disrupting the earth's climate. Together, these two constraints could eventually hobble global economic growth and cap the size of the global economy.

The most important resource to consider in this situation is energy, because it is our economy's "master resource" — the one ingredient essential for every economic activity. Sure, the price of a barrel of oil has dropped sharply from its peak of $78 last summer, but that's probably just a fluctuation in a longer upward trend in the cost of oil — and of energy more generally. In any case, the day-to-day price of oil isn't a particularly good indicator of changes in energy's underlying cost, because it's influenced by everything from Middle East politics to fears of hurricanes.

A better measure of the cost of oil, or any energy source, is the amount of energy required to produce it. Just as we evaluate a financial investment by comparing the size of the return with the size of the original expenditure, we can evaluate any project that generates energy by dividing the amount of energy the project produces by the amount it consumes.

Economists and physicists call this quantity the "energy return on investment" or E.R.O.I. For a modern coal mine, for instance, we divide the useful energy in the coal that the mine produces by the total of all the energy needed to dig the coal from the ground and prepare it for burning — including the energy in the diesel fuel that powers the jackhammers, shovels and off-road dump trucks, the energy in the electricity that runs the machines that crush and sort the coal, as well as all the energy needed to build and maintain these machines.

As the average E.R.O.I. of an economy's energy sources drops toward 1 to 1, an ever-larger fraction of the economy's wealth must go to finding and producing energy. This means less wealth is left over for everything else that needs to be done, from building houses to moving around information to educating children. The energy return on investment for conventional oil, which provides about 40 percent of the world's commercial energy and more than 95 percent of America's transportation energy, has been falling for decades. The trend is most advanced in United States production, where petroleum resources have been exploited the longest and drillers have been forced to look for ever-smaller and ever-deeper pools of oil.

Cutler Cleveland, an energy scientist at Boston University who helped developed the concept of E.R.O.I. two decades ago, calculates that from the early 1970s to today the return on investment of oil and natural gas extraction in the United States fell from about 25 to 1 to about 15 to 1.

This basic trend can be seen around the globe with many energy sources. We've most likely already found and tapped the biggest, most accessible and highest-E.R.O.I. oil and gas fields, just as we've already exploited the best rivers for hydropower. Now, as we're extracting new oil and gas in more extreme environments — in deep water far offshore, for example — and as we're turning to energy alternatives like nuclear power and converting tar sands to gasoline, we're spending steadily more energy to get energy.

For example, the tar sands of Alberta, likely to be a prime energy source for the United States in the future, have an E.R.O.I. of around 4 to 1, because a huge amount of energy (mainly from natural gas) is needed to convert the sands' raw bitumen into useable oil.

Having to search farther and longer for our resources isn't the only new hurdle we face. Climate change could also constrain growth. A steady stream of evidence now indicates that the planet is warming quickly and that the economic impact on agriculture, our built environment, ecosystems and human health could, in time, be very large. For instance, a report prepared for the British government by Sir Nicholas Stern, a former chief economist of the World Bank, calculated that without restraints on greenhouse gas emissions, by 2100 the annual worldwide costs of damage from climate change could reach 20 percent of global economic output.

Humankind's energy and climate problems are intimately connected. Petroleum's falling energy return on investment will encourage many economies to burn more coal (which in many parts of the world still has a relatively good E.R.O.I.), but coal emits far more greenhouse-inducing carbon dioxide for every unit of useful energy obtained than other energy sources. Also, many potential solutions to climate change — like moving water to newly arid regions or building dikes and relocating communities along vulnerable coastlines — will require huge amounts of energy.

Without a doubt, mankind can find ways to push back these constraints on global growth with market-driven innovation on energy supply, efficient use of energy and pollution cleanup. But we probably can't push them back indefinitely, because our species' capacity to innovate, and to deliver the fruits of that innovation when and where they're needed, isn't infinite.

Sometimes even the best scientific minds can't crack a technical problem quickly (take, for instance, the painfully slow evolution of battery technology in recent decades), sometimes market prices give entrepreneurs poor price signals (gasoline today is still far too cheap to encourage quick innovation in fuel-efficient vehicles) and, most important, sometimes there just isn't the political will to back the institutional and technological changes needed.

We can see glaring examples of such failures of innovation even in the United States — home to the world's most dynamic economy. Despite decades of increasingly dire warnings about the risks of dependence on foreign energy, the country now imports two-thirds of its oil; and during the last 20 years, despite increasingly clear scientific evidence regarding the dangers of climate change, the country's output of carbon dioxide has increased by a fifth.

As the price of energy rises and as the planet gets hotter, we need significantly higher investment in innovation throughout society, from governments and corporations to universities. Perhaps the most urgent step, if humankind is going to return to coal as its major energy source, is to figure out ways of safely disposing of coal's harmful carbon dioxide — probably underground.

But in the larger sense, we really need to start thinking hard about how our societies — especially those that are already very rich — can maintain their social and political stability, and satisfy the aspirations of their citizens, when we can no longer count on endless economic growth.

U.S. Opens Web Site On Crime For Tribes (TULSAW)

By World Washington Bureau

Tulsa World, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday the launch of a Web site that will focus on crime in Indian Country.

"I am honored to deliver the promise that I made to provide a one-stop-shop that will enhance the prevention of and response to crime and the administration of justice in Indian Country," said Regina B. Schofield, assistant attorney general for the Office of Justice Programs.

"This will serve as a medium for talking about promising practices across the nation. Crime knows no boundaries, and the Tribal Justice and Safety Web site is another way we are using technology to prevent crime and violence from taking root in our communities."

The site's address is www.usdoj.gov/tribaljusticeandsafety.

It is designed to serve as a single source of information about law enforcement for tribes, including crime statistics and other public safety issues, as well as a source for tribes on how the Justice Department can help them in fighting crime.

Last year, Schofield launched the Justice Programs Council on Native American Affairs.

Gun Lake Casino Project Faces Further Delays (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - A southwest Michigan casino project by the Gun Lake tribe faces another delay after the government pushed back its timetable for taking land into trust for the project.

The Justice Department said in a court filing last week that the government does not plan to take 146 acres in Wayland Township into trust for the casino before March 5, 2007.

The Interior Department was originally set to take the land into trust Jan. 5, clearing the way for the Gun Lake tribe to begin construction.

The delay was noted Tuesday by Station Casinos Inc. in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Las Vegas-based company said it planned to "continue contributing significant financial support to this project, even though there can be no assurances when or if the necessary approvals will be obtained."

Michigan Gambling Opposition, an anti-casino group, sued in 2005 to block the government from taking the land into trust. U.S. District Judge John Penn in Washington is scheduled to consider government and tribal motions for dismissal on Wednesday.

James Nye, a Gun Lake spokesman, said the new March 5 deadline will "provide the judge with more time to consider making a ruling on the merits of the case, so we see this as significant progress toward the tribe obtaining trust land for the construction of its casino."

John Helmholdt, a spokesman for Michigan Gambling Opposition, said the group will likely file an appeal if the judge dismisses the lawsuit. If the judge denies the motion for dismissal, the group would likely seek a preliminary injunction to block the land from being taken into trust.

Native American? The Tribe Says No (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Native American tribes are facing allegations of greed and racism as they purge members from their rolls and deny the applications of others.

The expulsions have sent tremors through Indian country. Thousands of Native Americans have lost their cultural identities and access to tribal benefits, such as medical care, housing and education. Certain gaming tribes divide casino profits among members, in some cases thousands of dollars a month per person. Those expelled lose their cut.

Tribal officials say they're protecting legitimate members by making sure everyone in the tribe is qualified.

As sovereign nations, tribes have the final say in who can — and cannot — join. Each tribe determines what degree of Indian blood is necessary for membership, a requirement that varies among the 561 federally recognized tribes.

In California, at least 2,000 Native Americans have been taken off the rolls of their tribes since 1999, says Laura Wass, executive director of the Many Lightnings American Indian Legacy Center, an education and advocacy group in Fresno. Disenrollments have surged with the rise of Indian casinos, she says.

Thousands of Native Americans elsewhere have lost, or may lose, their tribal status. An upcoming vote at the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma could deny citizenship to more than 1,000 of the tribe's 260,000 members.

Mary Chapman of Fresno was disenrolled from the Picayune Rancheria of the Chukchansi Indians last month, along with 20 members of her family. About 250 members of the tribe have been disenrolled this year, Wass says, and about 400 others have received letters questioning their status.

The 1,200-member tribe, which opened a casino in Coarsegold, Calif., in 2003, expelled Chapman because she didn't meet the eligibility criteria in the tribe's constitution, a complex set of categories based on ancestry, according to a disenrollment letter sent to her by the tribe.

Mark Levitan, attorney for the tribe, wouldn't discuss numbers. There is a moratorium on enrollment until the tribe completes an audit of every member's eligibility, he says, and tribal leaders “are a government that's responsible for following their own laws.”

Chapman, 69, says she traces her Chukchansi lineage to her great-great-grandmother. She blames the tribe's move on casino-related greed, which Levitan disputes.

He says the tribe does not yet distribute casino profits to members and has to show it is meeting the needs of the tribe before it can do so.

She feels helpless, she says, because there's nothing she can do: “There's no way to fight it.”

State and federal courts do not have jurisdiction over Native American membership disputes, says Kevin Gover, law professor at Arizona State University and former assistant secretary of the Interior for Indian affairs.

“Congress has not given individual Indians the right to sue their tribes,” he says.

Gover does not believe disenrollments are up because of gaming but says casino profits raise the stakes. He thinks expulsions are most often related to feuding families that form political factions.

“The majority family will throw the others out,” he says. “It's clannish and unworthy of institutions that claim to be nations.”

Yvette Champlain told The Providence Journal that she and dozens of her relatives were kicked out of the Narragansett Indian Tribe in Rhode Island this year because she questioned how the tribe spent $1 million it received from Harrah's Entertainment, which had been planning a casino with the tribe. “They don't want real accountability,” she told the newspaper.

The casino plan was rejected by Rhode Island voters this month.

Tribal councilman Randy Noka declined to discuss the specifics of Champlain's case but says her allegations are false.

Members must be able to document that they're descendants of Narragansetts listed on a tribal roll from the 1880s, Noka says. The tribe has about 2,500 people enrolled.

“It has nothing to do with personalities or politics,” he says. “Tribes have a responsibility to look out for their members. No one would expect to recognize someone that isn't a member of their family as a family member.

“You don't want anybody who may be looking to benefit from opportunities, who don't deserve them, to take away from someone who truly is a member,” Noka says.

“If someone does have a definite interest in trying to prove themselves to be a member, and can prove it, they deserve every benefit other tribal members receive.”

At the Cherokee Nation, a membership dispute centers on the Cherokee Freedmen, who are descendants of former slaves owned by Cherokees or, in some cases, descendants of free blacks who lived with the Cherokees. After the Civil War, the Cherokees, who had sided with the Confederacy, signed a treaty with the American government granting freedmen and their descendants tribal citizenship.

The tribe, which ratified a new constitution in 1976, has denied freedmen citizenship for much of the past three decades.

The tribe's highest court ruled in March that freedmen could obtain citizenship. Since then, more than 1,500 have enrolled, tribe spokesman Mike Miller says.

The dispute didn't end there. After Cherokee citizens circulated a referendum petition, Chief Chad Smith called a special election for February 2007 to consider changing the constitution. The proposed amendment would limit citizenship to those of Indian ancestry, based on membership rolls from the early 20th century. Those whose ancestors were freedmen would not be eligible.

Marilyn Vann's membership hangs in the balance.

“I've always considered myself a Cherokee Native American with African blood,” says Vann, who says she is Cherokee, Chickasaw and black, and that being listed as a freedman means her Indian ancestry is ignored.

Vann, a petroleum engineer in Oklahoma City, says she was shocked when her citizenship application was rejected in 2001. She reapplied after the court's ruling in March and is now a citizen.

She wanted to join so she could vote and “have a voice in the affairs of the tribe,” she says. “I did not come to my tribe to get something.”

The Cherokees do not pay gaming profits to members. The money funds the government, social services and job creation.

Vann believes the tribe fears the freedmen's voting power. Littlefield's assessment is more blunt: “It's racism.”

Some recently disenrolled members of the Pechanga Band of Luiseño Indians in California cite greed.

John Gomez Jr., 38, helped found the American Indian Rights and Resources Organization last year to address civil rights issues. Gomez and about 130 adults in his family were disenrolled from the tribe in 2004. Another family of about 90 adults was kicked out earlier this year.

“Both were large families that opposed the leadership,” he says.

The Pechanga Indians run a lucrative casino in Temecula, Calif., and split the profits among tribe members. Each member of Gomez's family used to get about $15,000 a month, he says. Once they were disenrolled, the payments stopped and the money went to remaining tribe members.

In an e-mailed statement, Pechanga Chairman Mark Macarro says courts have consistently upheld tribes' sole responsibility for determining their citizenship. He noted that a state court this month dismissed a suit brought by disenrolled members. His tribe has 1,370 members.

The allegation of casino-related greed "is ridiculous, irresponsible and simply distorts the facts," he says. "This is about determining who is a rightful citizen and who was enrolled under false pretenses."

Michael Madariaga lost his membership this year.

The tribe had hired John Johnson, curator of anthropology at the Santa Barbara Museum of Natural History, to trace the family's lineage.

Johnson determined that Madariaga's family can be traced to one of the original members of the tribe. "They did disregard my findings," Johnson says.

Madariaga, 43, and his family lost access to tribal benefits, including the monthly casino payout and meals for the elderly, he says. He lost his job at the casino. The children had to leave the reservation school.

Madariaga's 89-year-old grandfather, Lawrence, has prostate cancer. After his health insurance was cut off, he didn't take his medications for a few months, Madariaga says. Now, he's dipping into his retirement to pay for them.

Madariaga describes his grandfather as an integral member of the tribe who helped upgrade the water system and bring electricity and phones to tribe members. "He designed and helped build the health clinic," he says of his grandfather.

Madariaga says disenrollment "took a lot out of" his grandfather and grandmother, Sophia, 86.

"The anger, the stress, that's not good at their age and for their health," he says. "When they were cut off from the health benefits, they were very stressed."

But the hardest part hasn't been losing benefits and casino payouts, Madariaga says.

"What matters is taking away our heritage," he says.

"It's like taking your family and wiping them out of history."

FBI Appoints Veteran For Criminal Division (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

A veteran FBI supervisor who oversaw the investigation into the high-profile, unsolved death of a federal prosecutor in Baltimore was appointed yesterday to lead the criminal division of the bureau's Washington field office.

As head of the division, Jennifer Smith Love will direct all FBI investigations in Washington and Northern Virginia focused on violent, financial and organized crime; public corruption; civil rights violations; computer crimes; and drug-related offenses.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III yesterday announced the appointment of Mrs. Love, who had been chief of the FBI's communication-exploitation section, where she led FBI efforts to disrupt the ability of terrorists to communicate with one another.

Mrs. Love was the acting special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore field office and oversaw the bureau's investigation into the high-profile death of Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Luna, whose body was found Dec. 4, 2003, in a ditch in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Luna, 38, drowned after being stabbed 36 times with his own penknife and left facedown in a creek near Brecknock Township, Pa. Nearly three years later, the death has raised more questions than answers.

In May, during hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, questioned Mrs. Love's role in the Luna investigation, saying she and two other agents were "the subject of allegations" that they had conducted an unauthorized search of another agent's laptop computer.

Mr. Grassley said Mrs. Love's conduct was the subject of a later FBI investigation and a review by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. The FBI probe cleared Mrs. Love of any wrongdoing. The inspector general's review found "credible evidence" of wrongdoing to conclude the case should have been sent through the FBI's formal disciplinary process, rather than handled as a job-performance issue.

After serving as a new agent in New Orleans in January 1987, Mrs. Love went on to work in the Chicago field office and as the Baton Rouge resident agent, where she investigated white-collar crime, violent crimes and civil rights matters. As a street agent in all three offices, she was the case agent on numerous public corruption investigations that led to the successful convictions of numerous prominent public officials and police officers.

In 1997, she was appointed supervisory special agent in the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility at bureau headquarters in Washington, where she conducted investigations into accusations of employee misconduct. Two years later, she was appointed supervisory special agent in the Philadelphia field office where she led a white-collar crime and computer-intrusions squad.

During her tenure in Philadelphia, she oversaw the division's first undercover operation focusing on check-fraud rings.

In December 2002, she was named assistant special agent in charge of the Baltimore field office, where she initially headed the office's white-collar crimes, civil rights, administrative and surveillance programs, along with the Annapolis and Wilmington, Del., resident agencies. She concluded her assignment in Baltimore by being responsible for all of the FBI's criminal violations in the states of Maryland and Delaware.

In January 2005, Mrs. Love was promoted to section chief in the Counterterrorism Division at FBI headquarters, where she oversaw a multimillion-dollar budget, employee and information-security matters, training and continuing-education initiatives, and human-intelligence validation.

Mrs. Love is a 1983 graduate of Jackson State University in Jackson, Miss., where she received a bachelor's degree in accounting. Prior to joining the FBI, she worked as a cost accountant at McDonnell Douglas Corp. in St Louis and as a financial analyst in the FBI's St. Louis division.

Former FBI Secretary Admits Guilt (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

HONOLULU (AP) _ A former clerk-secretary on the F-B-I's organized crime-drug squad pleaded guilty today to getting information without authorization from a computer the bureau's Honolulu office.

The F-B-I's investigation of Charmaine Moniz led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people.

In addition to Moniz, the defendants include her husband, Eric, five Honolulu police officers and a Honolulu Liquor Commission inspector.

The F-B-I has said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004.

In court, Moniz said she got the information to warn her husband to stay away from certain people.

Moniz is to be sentenced April ninth. She faces up to five years in prison and a 250-thousand-dollar fine.

Witness Tells Of Role In Gang, And Killings (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

In walked the first member of the Stapleton Crew, described by prosecutors as a band of outlaws who shot, robbed and pummeled their way to power among the gun and drug rings of Staten Island.

He was 20 years old, 6 feet 3 inches tall and 320 pounds, and for court he had squeezed all that into a blue blazer with golden buttons.

His real name is Jessie Jacobus, but he gave his street handle as J-Dot, which he said was short for J-Doing Other Things.

The thing Mr. Jacobus was summoned to do yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn, in violation of what he called his principles, was to testify about the murder of two undercover detectives in March 2003.

Another member, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty if he is convicted of pulling the trigger to advance the activities of the crew, which prosecutors describe in legal parlance as a racketeer-influenced corrupt organization.

Mr. Jacobus has pleaded guilty to murder and admitted being the fourth man in the car when the detectives were shot; he is cooperating with prosecutors in exchange for a letter to his sentencing judge.

Federal prosecutors obtained the racketeering indictment and took over the case after the state death penalty was effectively halted in 2004. They said the two men had not seen each other since they were arrested three and a half years ago.

Mr. Jacobus walked across the courtroom with his back to Mr. Wilson. He turned at the witness stand, and the two seemed to lock eyes. Then he sat and promised to tell the truth about his role in the crew.

"I was supposed to be the strong-arm," he said.

Mr. Jacobus was 17 in 2003, a 10th-grade remedial school dropout, the son of a drug addict who moved up and down the East Coast. He started committing crimes at 14, though no one in the gang would let him hold a gun during robberies or revenge trips against a rival New Brighton gang.

As the strong-arm, Mr. Jacobus was relegated to rifling victims' pockets for money and contraband. It was also his job to probe their body cavities for hidden rocks of cocaine and extract them.

"Basically on the come-up, basically," Mr. Jacobus said. "I was making my way up."

He described a series of minor, violent assignments he had accepted to increase his status. Under questioning from an assistant United States attorney, Jack Smith, Mr. Jacobus said crew members acted as a team.

"A team was like, you know, um, basically like a basketball team, everybody plays a part," he said. "Some people sold drugs, some people robbed, you understand what I'm saying."

Photographs of the crew showed no women and no girls, just young men and boys in oversize athletic clothing smiling and contorting their fingers into gun shapes and gang signs. In one picture, they posed arm in arm before a refrigerator case at a bodega. Another was a souvenir of a trip to a Six Flags theme park.

Mr. Jacobus displayed vague knowledge of the drug-dealing operations, but he described robbing street-level marijuana and cocaine dealers. He said he had agreed to help Mr. Wilson rob a retail clothing store two blocks from the Stapleton Houses project where they lived.

The plan was to enter the store at midday, display a gun, take all the clothes and drive off in a rented van. His job would have been to gather the clothes, but the plan was eventually dismissed as foolhardy.

On March 10, 2003, Mr. Jacobus said, he agreed to help rob a man during a staged gun sale. The man who arrived was an undercover detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, accompanied by Detective Rodney J. Andrews, 34, whom he identified as his brother-in-law. Mr. Jacobus said he and Mr. Wilson got in the back seat of the detectives' car.

As prosecutors played a surveillance recording of that drive, relatives of the slain detectives sobbed and wailed, prompting Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis to clear the courtroom. He did not grant a defense motion for a mistrial.

As the tape resumed, Mr. Jacobus translated street slang for the jury ("burner" means gun, "hot" means under surveillance, "Shaolin" means Staten Island, even sitting around has several euphemisms) and filled in gaps in the recording.

He said Detective Andrews bought a pack of Newports and offered the cigarettes around. Detective Nemorin drove some more, then Mr. Wilson shot both detectives dead, starting with the passenger.

"Did the driver say anything?" the prosecutor asked.

"He was pleading for his life," Mr. Jacobus said.

They hid the gun in an apartment and returned to search the car. They did not find the $1,200 Detective Nemorin was carrying, but they did find a gun under the seat. Mr. Jacobus said Mr. Wilson told him, "They was going to get us before we got them."

On cross-examination, Mr. Jacobus said he had lied to the police after his arrest but told the truth since signing the cooperation agreement.

A defense lawyer, Ephraim Savitt, asked about the gang's name.

"When you were out on the street, before you were arrested, did you ever hear of the term Stapleton Crew?" Mr. Savitt said.

Mr. Jacobus said, "No, sir."

Afghan Police Aiding Drug Traffickers, U.N. Study Says (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Afghanistan's criminal underworld has compromised key government officials who protect drug traffickers, allowing a flourishing opium trade that will not be stamped out for a generation, an ominous U.N. report released Tuesday said.

The fight against opium production has so far achieved only limited success, mostly because of corruption, the joint report from the World Bank and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime said.

The findings show a "probability of high-level (government) involvement" in drugs, said Doris Buddenberg, the UNODC's Afghanistan representative and co-editor of the report.

The report in particular presented a strong indictment of the Interior Ministry, which runs the country's police, and said Afghanistan's criminal underworld could not operate without the support of the political "upperworld."

"The majority of police chiefs are involved," one senior police officer told the report's authors on condition of anonymity. "If you are not, you will be threatened to be killed and replaced."

Without naming officials, the report said it was possible that powerful interests in the Interior Ministry are appointing district police chiefs "to both protect and promote criminal interests."

The result is a "complex pyramid of protection and patronage, effectively providing state protection to criminal trafficking activities."

The spokesman for the counter-narcotics ministry said there is no evidence that high-ranking officials are involved in Afghanistan's drug trade.

"If there is evidence we welcome the evidence and the arrest will be on the spot," Zalmai Afzali said.

Poppy cultivation and the heroin it produces has become a major problem in Afghanistan, providing funds for the Taliban insurgency that has caused the deaths of more than 3,700 people this year.

Opium production in Afghanistan rose 49% this year to 6,100 metric tons. The harvest provided more than 90% of the world's opium supply and was worth more than $3.1 billion.

Gen. Khodaidad, Afghanistan's deputy minister for counter-narcotics, told The Associated Press that next year's harvest will be as large as this year's in several key southern provinces where Taliban militants have a heavy presence. A U.S. official has also told the AP he expects next year's yield to be about the same.

The 210-page report, titled "Afghanistan's Drug Industry," is the first comprehensive assessment of the country's drug production, from poppy-growing farmers to international drug traffickers.

Barnett Rubin, director of studies and senior fellow at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, said his research has led to many of the same conclusions as the report's.

"There are many cases where honest prosecutors or police chiefs try to do something about corruption, and they say they receive phone calls from very high officials in Kabul saying to leave the people alone," said Mr. Rubin, an expert on Afghanistan.

Like the report, Mr. Rubin said he could not name names. "Getting indictable evidence is very, very difficult," he said. "I'm not mentioning any individual's name to you because I don't want to be sued or bumped off."

Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary said the ministry has reformed its process for selecting police chiefs.

"At the moment we don't have any problems with our police chiefs," he said. "If the government is saying that poppy cultivation is prohibited, so they are obliged to implement the orders of the government."

Instead of sustained declines in cultivation, successful efforts to reduce poppy growing in one province often leads to increases elsewhere, the report found.

"History teaches us that it will take a generation to render Afghanistan opium-free," said Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of UNODC. "Those driving the drug industry must be brought to justice and officials who support it sacked."

Poppies take up less than 4% of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, and most districts do not grow opium, the report said. But the $3.1 billion export value of last year's crop accounted for around one-third of total economic activity in the country, and about 13% of Afghans are involved in the trade.

The report says there is also a need to curtail demand. The major consumers of Afghanistan's opium are Iran, Pakistan, the U.K., Italy, Spain and Germany, Ms. Buddenberg said.

Mr. Rubin said the report shows the international community's approach to the drug fight here is wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0099373

"It should focus its efforts to remove big drug money from the political process," he said. "But instead what we have done is put big drug traffickers in positions of power, failed to take or support strong actions against them while we attack the livelihoods of small farmers and laborers through eradication, and they then turn to the Taliban or warlords for protection."

Agencies End Turf War Over Danvers Blast Probe (BOS)

The Boston Globe, November 29, 2006

Federal and state agencies announced today that they will cooperate in the investigation into last week's chemical plant explosion in Danvers.

Town and state fire officials had questioned the jurisdiction of the US Chemical Safety Board, a federal agency that investigates such incidents. A turf war erupted Saturday when investigators from the board were denied access to the blast site.

In a joint statement this afternoon, federal and state officials and Chemical Safety Board investigators are on the site today of the plant, which was shared by CAI Inc. and Arnel Co. Inc. Investigators from the State Fire Marshal's office, the Massachusetts Department of Fire Services, the Danvers Fire Department, and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives are also involved.

"All parties have agreed to cooperate in executing their different missions," said the statement, issued after a meeting of all the agencies this morning. "The CSB and ATF will coordinate to ensure the integrity of the ongoing civil and criminal investigations during the access to the site."

Man Who Impersonated Federal Agent Gets 10-year Sentence (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

ATLANTA - A man who impersonated a federal agent during an armed robbery was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in prison on charges of carrying an unregistered sawed-off shotgun and a homemade firearm silencer.

Prosecutors say Garfield Royes, 37 already had three felony armed robbery convictions on his record when he posed as an agent from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives during another armed home invasion.

"Today's sentencing of Mr. Royes validates that his only career is being an authentic career criminal," said Vanessa L. McLemore, an ATF special agent.

Royes donned a tank-top adorned with the letters "ATF" in 2003 while robbing a group of suspected drug dealers, said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias.

He was arrested in June 2003 while attempting to flee from police officers trying to search his home, prosecutors said. Police later said they found a 12-gauge sawed-off shotgun, a homemade silencer and ammunition at his home - items that Royes is banned from owning.

Royes, of Woodstock, must also serve three years of supervised release following his sentence.

Mathison Returned To U.S. (SCJ)

By Nick Hytrek And Alicia Ebaugh, Journal staff writers

Sioux City (IA) Journal, November 29, 2006

It was a day later than expected, but Ryan Mathison is back on U.S. soil.

Around 6 p.m. Tuesday, Mathison and his girlfriend Janelle Rodriguez were walked halfway across a bridge into El Paso, Texas, by Mexican officials, where they were met by U.S. Marshals, said El Paso Supervisory Deputy U.S. Marshal Jerry Payan.

"They are sitting in the El Paso County Jail awaiting extradition to Iowa," Payan said.

The pair were expelled from Mexico as "undesirables," Payan said, a faster and simpler procedure than extradition, a formal process that requires requests for extradition warrants that can take months. In expulsion, the Mexican government basically says the person in custody is not welcome. The person in custody also agrees to leave.

"This is basically they want to leave, and Mexico wants them to leave, and they escort them to the border," said Duane Walhof, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals Service Sioux City bureau.

"It could be two days to two weeks before they are returned to Sioux City, depending on how fast the paperwork is processed," Payan said.

On Monday, federal officials in Sioux City announced that Mathison and Rodriguez had been located and arrested in Juarez, Mexico, Sunday afternoon. At a press conference, authorities said they expected the two to be turned over to the Marshals Service by Monday afternoon at the U.S. border at El Paso, Texas, just across the Rio Grande River from Juarez.

Mexican officials did not meet with them as expected that day.

"We were there ready to take (Mathison and Rodriguez), and they wouldn't release them," Walhof said.

The Sunday arrest ended a two-week search for Mathison, who, while on pretrial release, skipped town during his trial on charges that he oversaw a drug ring that transported hundreds of pounds of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico to Sioux City. The jury later found him guilty. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years in prison, a sentence that could be enhanced because he discarded his electronic monitoring device and left town. A sentencing date has not been set.

Mathison and Rodriguez were located in a Juarez hotel across the street from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office. Mathison, 38, of Sioux City, was wanted for violating terms of his pretrial release.

Rodriguez, 20, North Sioux City, who left town with Mathison, was arrested on a material witness warrant.

Citing a Marshals Service policy not to comment on details of investigations, Walhof declined Tuesday to elaborate on the investigation or Sunday's tip that led to Mathison's capture.

Readers posting comments on the Journal's Web site at www.siouxcityjournal.com Tuesday gave their own theories on how the case was cracked. Walhof declined to say if those statements were accurate.

"I've read that same speculation," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Consulates In U.S. Hit The Road To Help Far-Flung Paisanos (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

KODIAK, Alaska -- On his latest trip to Alaska, Salvadoran consular official Luis Roberto Castellanos saw bear cubs, a killer whale and 200 natives of El Salvador who might lose their jobs in canneries here unless they solve their immigration problems.

A growing number of Mexicans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans and Dominicans are working in the remote reaches of Alaska, frequently illegally, and cut off from the bulk of Latino immigrants in the U.S. They turn for help to "mobile consulates" -- collections of diplomats from their home countries who fly from barrio to barrio around the country.

These Latino circuit riders are experts in immigration law and lobbying. They press schools to offer bilingual instruction and persuade banks to accept foreign ID cards, called matrículas, in lieu of Social Security cards, so immigrants can open checking accounts. They also counsel migrant workers on the intricacies of U.S. immigration laws, including an array of regulatory loopholes that Central Americans might be able to use to stay in the U.S. even if they entered illegally. (Two legal grounds for staying: earthquake damage in home countries and fear of torture back home.)

The mobile consulates are doing their best to help those who make it to the U.S. to stay here. "Getting over the border is expensive, but it's not difficult," said Orlando Castillo, a Salvadoran cannery worker who made his way to America illegally by crossing through Mexico. "But finding a way to stay? That's hard."

Latin American nations have a big incentive to keep migrants working in the U.S. They send their families at home about $50 billion a year, according to the Inter-American Development Bank. For El Salvador, Haiti and Nicaragua, such remittances are their largest source of hard currency. So far this year, Latin American nations have sent five mobile missions to Alaska -- two from Mexico's Seattle consulate, and one each from California consulates of Guatemala, the Dominican Republic and El Salvador. Other countries that have mobile consulates around the U.S. include Nicaragua, Brazil, Perú and Colombia.

The Mexican team that swept into Anchorage at the end of September was a model of efficiency. Taking over the offices of Local 878 of the Unite/HERE restaurant and hotel workers union, the group moved about 50 applicants through a kind of assembly line. The diplomats proofread applications, verified identification and processed passports and matrícula cards by using a digital camera linked via laptop to a fingerprint scanner. New passports cost $84, matrículas $27.

While they were waiting, the Mexican migrants could thumb through brochures left by bank marketers touting low-cost money transfers to Latin America. Wells Fargo's Anchorage office has a deal with Mexico's Seattle consulate that lets it distribute materials on remitting cash every time a mobile team visits. Western Union has similar arrangements with mobile consulates visiting other cities.

Sometimes the mobile consulates attract anti-immigration ire. In February, 100 members of the Colorado Alliance for Immigration Reform picketed a Colorado Springs public library when Denver's Mexican consul came to distribute matrículas. "Meddling Mexican Consulate Officials Issuing Mickey Mouse Matrícula Cards to Foreigners" was how the protesters described the visit on the group's Web page. This past summer, a group called Oregonians for Immigration Reform demonstrated against mobile consulates in Independence and Portland, Ore. To try to limit controversy, many mobile consulates no longer hold sessions in schools or other government buildings.

With 1.5 million Salvadorans living in the U.S., El Salvador's 15 permanent consulates frequently send diplomats on the road to meet far-flung paisanos. According to San Francisco vice consul Ana María Canizalez, El Salvador's Miami consulate pioneered the use of mobile units, starting in the late 1990s. Her office started sending teams out of town just a few times a year, she recalls. "Now it feels like we're on the road every week."

It's not what the 53-year-old expected to be doing when she left her job working for El Salvador's public health ministry in 1982 to take a plum diplomatic post in San Francisco. Taking three children and a husband -- now an employee of the U.S. Postal Service -- she has seen the Bay Area's Salvadoran population swell to 50,000, including her own U.S.-born grandchildren. Across 12 states covered by her consulate, she estimates, more than a quarter million Salvadorans have settled in.

Over the years, Mrs. Canizalez has assisted hotel workers in Reno, Nev., fig-grove workers in Mendota, Calif., fruit pickers in Wenatchee, Wash., and potato harvesters in Nampa, Idaho. People are grateful for the attention paid to remote communities, she says. Dollars and cents count as much as solidarity. "Imagine if they had to pay $1,000 each to come to San Francisco," she explains. "That's hundreds of dollars saved by us coming here. A lot of that money goes home."

A trip to Alaska is especially grueling. After she participated in two marathon sessions in Seattle in August, she left with two consulate staffers for Alaska. Their prop plane didn't arrive at Kodiak Island until midnight. Over cups of tea, the diplomats laid out plans for the following day's meeting, finally getting to sleep around 2 a.m.

About a third of the 600 Salvadorans who live in Kodiak came to visit the traveling band, which set up shop in a Pentecostal church. There, Salvadoran women prepared traditional snacks to sell of fried yucca and pork cracklings.

The island, known for its evergreen rain forests and unique species of brown bear, has long been a haven for immigrants who work at salmon and halibut-processing plants. About 60% of the 6,000 residents of Kodiak were born abroad or are children of immigrants. "In the 1970s, it was Filipinos, in the 1980s it was Mexicans, now it's Central Americans," says Tony Olazabal, a Peruvian native who is production manager for Ocean Beauty Seafoods, a local cannery.

The first Latinos arrived in 1964, when foreign construction workers were sought to rebuild Kodiak after an earthquake and tsunami destroyed the island's harbor city. Today, while most of the Salvadorans who live on the island qualify for permanent legal residency and have green cards, they need help in updating passports, or registering children born in Alaska. The children are dual citizens under Salvadoran law.

Mr. Castillo, the cannery worker, told the diplomats that he entered the U.S. illegally. He first crossed the Texas-Mexico border in 1993, he said, then sneaked across again last year into Arizona, the second time paying a coyote $5,000 to guide him past border patrol agents. To qualify for a temporary work permit, he filed a petition for asylum, claiming he can't go home because criminal gangs have threatened his life.

He said he wants to stay for the money. The 48-year-old laborer earns $8 an hour hauling slabs of fresh halibut across slippery floors at Ocean Beauty. In the summer he can pocket $650 a week by working 16-hour days -- at least 10 times what he could earn at home. Each month, he said, he sends $300 home to support a family of six in La Trinidad, Cabañas.

The visiting diplomats advised Mr. Castillo that it would be hard to prove that he fears for his life since he has visited El Salvador since entering the U.S. Maybe he could qualify for Temporary Protected Status.

TPS started as a humanitarian program to allow Central Americans who fled civil wars at home in the 1980s to stay in the U.S. temporarily. TPS was extended in 2001 after earthquakes ravaged the region and again this year, many immigrant specialists believe, as a kind of thank-you to El Salvador for having sent 400 soldiers to Iraq. Now El Salvador is lobbying Congress to give all TPS holders, including the 225,000 from El Salvador, green cards entitling them to work and reside permanently in the U.S.

Barely able to write his name, Mr. Castillo labored painfully over each line in the Department of Homeland Security TPS form as Mrs. Canizalez watched, silently mouthing words of encouragement. Then she handed Mr. Castillo a stamped envelope, addressed to the federal office that processes the forms. She helped 50 other Salvadorans in Kodiak apply for TPS, too. The applicants won't know for several weeks whether they qualify, or what to try next if they don't.

Mr. Castillo hasn't heard yet, but he has a Plan B. He said he might join his son, who works in a meat-processing plant near Lexington, Neb., and switch from filleting fish to slicing beef. The son might marry an American girl one day, the cannery worker said, making him eligible to sponsor his father for legal permanent residency. "That would work best for me," the cannery worker said. "With God's help, something will work out."

TAX:

Democrat Calls For Outdated Tax To Be Axed (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

The new Democrat-controlled Congress should abolish an outdated tax that could condemn up to 23m Americans to pay a total $1,000bn next year, according to the incoming head of a powerful congressional committee.

Charles Rangel, the New York Democratic congressman who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing ways and means committee in the House of Representatives, said scrapping the alternative minimum tax (AMT) was a top priority.

Mr Rangel's position, presented at a meeting with New York business leaders on Tuesday, is more radical than other senior Democrats, including the incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who have talked about extending a one-year relief from AMT for middle-income taxpayers.

Introduced in 1969 to ensure that most upper-income households paid at least some tax, AMT has become emblematic of the inefficiencies plaguing the US tax collection system.

The problems stem largely from a technical mistake: the tax was not indexed for inflation – an oversight that meant that every year more and more middle-income citizens ended up paying it. It will be levied on some 3.5m people this year and the number could rise to more than 23m in 2007.

Both Republicans and Democrats support changes in the AMT regime because the tax is hitting middle and upper-income families – a crucial constituency.

But previous attempts at wholesale reform have stalled because of the need to find large revenue gains or spending cuts to offset the money raised by the tax. For the past few years Congress had agreed on temporary tax relief which costs about $30bn, considerably less than abolishing AMT, and is still considered the most likely option for 2007.

However, Mr Rangel said: "Nobody can challenge that is basic good policy to [scrap it]. The only question is where are we going to find the money to do it."

The financial pressures have been exacerbated by the Democratic leadership's pledge to match the cost of any tax change with spending cuts or other tax increases.

Mr Rangel said about $350bn of the $1,000bn needed to match AMT revenues could be found by closing "the tax gap" – a pool of funds that, for a number of reasons, goes unclaimed by the tax authorities. But he acknowledged the remainder would have to come from a bipartisan effort to close tax loopholes and find other sources of revenue.

Mr Rangel dampened hopes that the Democrats would roll back tax cuts introduced by President George W. Bush over the past few years, partly because the White House retains a veto on any such measures.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pentagon Takes Broader View On Emergency Spending (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon is preparing an emergency spending proposal that could be larger and broader than any since the Sept. 11 attacks, covering not only the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan but extending to other military operations connected to the Bush administration's war on terrorism.

The spending plans by military commanders may push the Defense Department into a conflict with Democrats as they take control of Capitol Hill next year. Democrats had been planning to limit the emergency "supplemental" spending measures that have funded the wars in favor of the regular federal budget process, which affords greater oversight and congressional control.

Congressional and military officials have said the Pentagon is considering a request of $127 billion to $150 billion in new emergency war spending, the largest such request since the special spending measures were begun in 2001. So far, Congress has allocated $495 billion for Afghanistan, Iraq and terrorism-related efforts.

Even within the Pentagon, the spending request is generating controversy. The Pentagon was due to forward its request to the White House by about Nov. 15. But a senior Defense official said the decision had been held up and Pentagon officials had asked Army and Air Force officials to provide more justification for the spending demands.

Pentagon officials would not comment on the budget figures, due to be made public in February.

The upcoming request, added to the $70 billion already allocated for next year, would easily exceed the annual cost of the Vietnam War at its height. Adjusted for inflation, the United States spent $121 billion on the Vietnam War in 1968, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

Still, the overall cost of the Vietnam War -- about $663 billion adjusted for inflation -- still exceeds the combined costs of the fighting thus far in Afghanistan and Iraq, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The next request stands to be larger in part because of new rules laid out in an Oct. 25 memo from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Rather than strictly limit spending to Iraq and Afghanistan costs, the memo said the services could include costs associated with military operations that are part of the larger war on terrorism.

Previously, the military portion of the supplemental spending measures has been used almost exclusively for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. England's memo would allow the military branches to include a greater number of expenses more loosely tied to the wars, such as new military weapons systems and training exercises.

The cost and approach of the spending request are likely to meet with resistance in Congress. Democratic congressional aides said the new majority on Capitol Hill was likely to push back against a request that exceeded $100 billion.

"This was a dream list for the military," said one aide, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity because the Pentagon has not formalized its request and because some members of Congress believe it is premature to comment publicly.

Democrats said a supplemental of $80 billion to $100 billion would be more realistic. House and Senate aides say they want to push in the opposite direction of the Pentagon, moving money out of the supplemental and into the regular budget.

"We are going to show more oversight," one Democratic aide said.

But Democrats acknowledged that it would be difficult to move a majority of the costs to the regular budget without forcing massive budget cuts in other departments.

Although there will be more scrutiny of the Pentagon requests, and the most outrageous spending proposals could be nixed, there is little doubt a large supplemental will be approved, some Democratic aides said.

"People will grouse that they are loading up the supplemental, but they will be hard-pressed to say no, because they realize the services need the equipment," one Democratic aide said.

According to the England memo, the Pentagon wants to include money in the supplemental to replace equipment destroyed in combat or run down by accelerated wear and tear. More controversially, it might allow the services to replace old equipment with new models.

Defense officials declined to lay out specifics about what constituted expenditures that would be allowed in the next supplemental spending bill.

A Defense official said the Navy and Marine Corps request of $30 billion has been viewed as relatively uncontroversial. But the Army and Air Force requested far more than the Pentagon was willing to take to the White House's Office of Management and Budget and were asked to provide more information to top Defense officials.

The Army, outside military analysts have said, has requested about $80 billion in the upcoming supplemental. Army officials have not confirmed the figure.

The Air Force has requested $33 billion in supplemental funding, said Maj. Morshe Araujo, a spokeswoman. The Air Force originally requested $17.4 billion; after the England memo was circulated, the Air Force added $16 billion more in requests, Araujo said.

Critics of the Pentagon budget process say the memo has encouraged the various services to inflate their requests.

"The England memo basically said, 'Let 'er rip,'" said Winslow Wheeler, director of the Straus Military Reform Project and a former congressional budget aide. "Anything goes as long as you can put it under the pretext of not only Iraq or Afghanistan but the global war on terror."

Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the nonpartisan Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va., said the timing of the memo suggested that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has resigned and is likely to be out by the end of the year, was punting on tough spending choices.

"It really does have the feeling of opening up the floodgates and letting someone else drown," Thompson said.

Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said the supplemental amounts being discussed publicly were "wildly speculative." The England memo, he said, was meant to enable the services to request money to replace worn-out equipment.

"It is fair to say: You are five years into this conflict and equipment is being used at a higher rate than its peacetime service life would be," Whitman said. "Those are costs directly related to the war, and we are going to have to figure out how we are going to deal with it."

But Wheeler said the services were doing more than replacing equipment destroyed in Iraq or Afghanistan. He was particularly critical of the Marine Corps' decision to use the emergency spending requests to replace old helicopters with the V-22 Osprey, a controversial and expensive tilt-rotor airplane that has yet to be deployed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"That is like telling your wife she has worn out the Yugo for getting to the train station and you are going to buy her a Ferrari," Wheeler said.

In a meeting with reporters last week, Gen. James T. Conway, the new Marine Corps commandant, said buying outdated equipment would be wasteful.

"What we have to do is be smart about it," Conway said. "We have to be good custodians of the nation's resources. We have to ask ourselves: Do we buy new old stuff, or do we go to the next generation of equipment and modernize in the process?"

Wars Wearing Down Military Gear At Cost Of About $2 Billion A Month (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — About $2 billion worth of Army and Marine Corps equipment — from rifles to tanks — is wearing out or being destroyed every month in Iraq and Afghanistan, military leaders and outside experts say.

That's equal to about a quarter of the $8 billion per month in military war costs. The wear and tear may lead to future equipment shortages and cutbacks in more advanced weapons, such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter being developed with allies around the world and the Army's new, high-tech family of weapons and equipment, says William Cohen, secretary of Defense from 1997 to 2001.

Pressure to keep spending under control can lead to cuts in both current maintenance and future weapons, Cohen says, but “the longer we defer on that, the more expensive it's going to be.”

The Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to re-equip and restore units returning from Iraq, says Leon Panetta, the former Clinton White House chief of staff and member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

On Monday, the Pentagon said it had issued more than $1.7 billion in equipment repair and replacement contracts during November alone. This summer, the leaders of the Army and Marine Corps said their services rack up a combined $23 billion a year in repair costs.

Army Gen. Peter Schoomaker and Marine Gen. James Conway told Congress that repair money comes only in special requests for war funding, not in annual budgets. That, they said, makes it hard to plan for future needs.

"They've been falling badly behind," says Winslow Wheeler, a former congressional budget analyst now at the independent Center for Defense Information.

The Pentagon is considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests for war funding next year.

Vehicles and other equipment are far more complex now than they were in previous conflicts such as Vietnam, making repairs and replacements even more expensive, Wheeler says. The Congressional Research Service says the entire Vietnam War cost an estimated $650 billion in today's money, while the global war on terrorism, including Iraq, has cost more than $500 billion so far.

The Army and Marines have reported using about 40% of their ground combat equipment in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to the Government Accountability Office (GAO). Units departing Iraq leave much of their heavy equipment behind, which further delays major maintenance and leaves holes in training for future missions, the report says.

A separate GAO report this month urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to investigate the Pentagon's planning for repair, maintenance and replacement of war equipment.

If the United States entered another war, "it would be difficult for us to accomplish anything," says retired lieutenant general Donald Kerrick, who served on the National Security Council under presidents Clinton and Bush.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has acknowledged the problem and said he is working with the White House to get more money for repairs.

"I think we have some reasonable understandings about the coming year and the importance of not having a two- or three-year lag," Rumsfeld said last month.

Medicare Costs Come In $13 Billion Under Budget (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, November 29, 2006

The Medicare drug benefit has cost nearly $13 billion less than expected this year -- a rare federal program coming in under budget -- and projections show it will cost about $200 billion less in its first decade than initially estimated.

President Bush credits competition among the dozens of private insurance companies administering the program for the cost coming in at $30 billion in 2006, about 30 percent below the projected $43 billion.

But figures provided to the Associated Press by the agency that oversees the benefit for the elderly and disabled show two other factors: lower-than-expected enrollment and drug prices that went up less than expected before the benefit kicked in.

Democrats say they can cut costs further by having the government directly negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies on behalf of beneficiaries. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker from California, says granting the government that authority will be one of her priorities for the new Congress' first 100 hours.

Why the program has been costing less than anticipated will be an important element of that debate. To date, however, there has been little detailed analysis of how the savings are being achieved.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, the federal agency that oversees the new drug benefit, provided the AP with its accounting of where the program saved money this year:

•Lower than projected enrollment: $7.5 billion.

•Competition: $6.9 billion.

•Drug prices rising less than expected in the two years before the benefit even began: $3.7 billion.

About $141 billion of projected savings over the decade result from slower growth in drug prices, said John Shatto, a Medicare actuary.

The savings being achieved by the program could make it harder for Democrats to make changes, particularly with surveys showing high satisfaction rates among seniors and the disabled. So Democratic lawmakers may focus on where the savings are coming from.

"Republicans would have you believe that the drug and insurance companies have sacrificed profits in the name of competition, but nothing could be further from the truth," said Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat. "In fact, the dirty little secret is that costs are lower because of low enrollment and a slowdown in drug spending."

Leslie V. Norwalk, the acting administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, says enrollment is actually lower because the agency's actuaries underestimated how many people already had drug coverage before Jan. 1, when the Medicare benefits started.

Nearly 10 million fewer people enrolled in the program than projected after Congress created the drug benefit in 2003.

In Following His Own Script, Webb May Test Senate's Limits (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

At a recent White House reception for freshman members of Congress, Virginia's newest senator tried to avoid President Bush. Democrat James Webb declined to stand in a presidential receiving line or to have his picture taken with the man he had often criticized on the stump this fall. But it wasn't long before Bush found him.

"How's your boy?" Bush asked, referring to Webb's son, a Marine serving in Iraq.

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Webb responded, echoing a campaign theme.

"That's not what I asked you," Bush said. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," Webb said coldly, ending the conversation on the State Floor of the East Wing of the White House.

Webb was narrowly elected to the U.S. Senate this month with a brash, unpolished style that helped win over independent voters in Virginia and earned him support from national party leaders. Now, his Democratic colleagues in the Senate are getting a close-up view of the former boxer, military officer and Republican who is joining their ranks.

If the exchange with Bush two weeks ago is any indication, Webb won't be a wallflower, especially when it comes to the war in Iraq. And he won't stick to a script drafted by top Democrats.

"I'm not particularly interested in having a picture of me and George W. Bush on my wall," Webb said in an interview yesterday in which he confirmed the exchange between him and Bush. "No offense to the institution of the presidency, and I'm certainly looking forward to working with him and his administration. [But] leaders do some symbolic things to try to convey who they are and what the message is."

In the days after the election, Webb's Democratic colleagues on Capitol Hill went out of their way to make nice with Bush and be seen by his side. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) sat down for a lunch and photo opportunity with Bush, as did Democratic leaders in the Senate.

Not Webb, who said he tried to avoid a confrontation with Bush at the White House reception but did not shy away from one when the president approached.

The White House declined to discuss the encounter. "As a general matter, we do not comment on private receptions hosted by the president at the White House," said White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino.

Webb said he has "strong ideas," but he also insisted that -- as a former Marine in Vietnam -- he knows how to work in a place such as the Senate, where being part of a team is important.

He plans to push for a new GI bill for soldiers who have served in the days since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, but not as a freshman senator. He has approached the Democratic leadership about getting senior legislators to sponsor the bill when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

A strong backer of gun rights, Webb may find himself at odds with many in his party. He expressed support during the campaign for a bill by his opponent, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), that would allow concealed weapons in national parks. But an aide said this week that Webb will review Allen's legislation.

"There are going to be times when I've got some strong ideas, but I'm not looking to simply be a renegade," he said. "I think people in the Democratic Party leadership have already begun to understand that I know how to work inside a structure."

His party's leaders hope that he means it.

Top Democratic senators, including incoming Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), had invested their money and prestige in Webb before he won the party primary in June. His victory was also theirs, but now they have to make sure he's not a liability.

"He's not a typical politician. He really has deep convictions," said Schumer, who headed the Senate Democrats' campaign arm. "We saw this in the campaign. We would have disagreements. But when you made a persuasive argument, he would say, 'You're right.' I am truly not worried about it. He understands the need to be part of a team."

One senior Democratic staff member on Capitol Hill, who spoke on condition that he not be identified so he could speak freely about the new senator, said that Webb's lack of political polish was part of his charm as a candidate but could be a problem as a senator.

"I think he's going to be a total pain. He is going to do things his own way. That's a good thing and a bad thing," the staff member said. But he said that Webb's personality may be just what the Senate needs. "You need a little of everything. Some element of that personality is helpful."

Webb has started to put himself out front. On "Meet the Press" last week, he dispensed with the normal banter with host Tim Russert to talk seriously about Iraq and the need for economic justice in the United States.

He announced yesterday that he has hired Paul J. Reagan, a communications director for former governor Mark R. Warner (D) and a former chief of staff for U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.). It will be Reagan's job to help his boss navigate the intricacies of Washington and Capitol Hill without losing the essence of his personality.

"The relationships he has built over his long career will serve me well," Webb said in a statement yesterday.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who campaigned hard to get Webb elected, said yesterday that the first-time officeholder doesn't have the finesse of most experienced politicians.

"He is not a backslapper," Kaine said. "There are different models that succeed in politics. There's the hail-fellow-well-met model of backslapping. That's not his style."

But Kaine said that Webb's background, including a stint as Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary, will make him an important -- if unpredictable -- voice on the war in Iraq.

"There are no senators who have that everyday anxiety that he has as a dad with a youngster on the front lines. That gives him gravitas and credibility on this issue," Kaine said. "People in the Senate, I'm sure, will agree with him or disagree with him on issue to issue. But they won't doubt that he's coming at it from a real sense of duty."

Son Also Rises In Testy Webb-Bush Exchange (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, November 29, 2006

President Bush has pledged to work with the new Democratic majorities in Congress, but he has already gotten off on the wrong foot with Jim Webb, whose surprise victory over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) tipped the Senate to the Democrats.

Webb, a decorated former Marine officer, hammered Allen and Bush over the unpopular war in Iraq while wearing his son's old combat boots on the campaign trail. It seems the president may have some lingering resentment.

At a private reception held at the White House with newly elected lawmakers shortly after the election, Bush asked Webb how his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Iraq, was doing.

Webb responded that he really wanted to see his son brought back home, said a person who heard about the exchange from Webb.

"I didn't ask you that, I asked how he's doing," Bush retorted, according to the source.

Webb confessed that he was so angered by this that he was tempted to slug the commander-in-chief, reported the source, but of course didn't. It's safe to say, however, that Bush and Webb won't be taking any overseas trips together anytime soon.

DOJ_NMG_0099382

"Jim did have a conversation with Bush at that dinner," said Webb's spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "Basically, he asked about Jim's son, Jim expressed the fact that he wanted to have him home." Todd did not want to escalate matters by commenting on Bush's response, saying, "It was a private conversation."

A White House spokeswoman declined to give Bush's version of the conversation.

Fake Rep. takes on colorful causes

Rep. Sherri Davis, a Republican from California, has a plucky resume, fabulous fashion sense, and a mission to eradicate yoga mat-borne illnesses. She's colorful, quotable and, unfortunately, totally fake.

Those who aren't up on their members of Congress, or who don't have a congressional directory handy, might be fooled by Rep. Davis's Internet footprints, which include a smattering of press releases, mentions on various blogs, and video clips posted on YouTube.com. She even has recommended items on Amazon.com.

The tales spread about her are just detailed enough to appear plausible. According to the press releases, which are posted on the website www.pr-inside.com and show up in Google news searches, the congresswoman is pressing legislative priorities including "a program designed to capitalize on the current 'scrapbooking craze' to increase youth reading levels through individual vouchers and through major tax-breaks to the American scrapbooking industry" and the Yoga Mat Cleanliness Act (YMCA), which the congresswoman promoted through appearances with actress Sarah Jessica Parker. According to the release, Parker "caught a bad case of tinea cruris [don't ask] from using an unclean yoga mat".

A woman purporting to be Davis appears in the YouTube clips offering bizarre policy prescriptions, such as suggesting that the problem of illegal immigration be solved by rounding up all illegal immigrants and forcing them to live in a tent city in the desert. Some viewers appeared fooled by the clips, posting comments like, "Is anyone else baffled as to how this ditz got elected? Or scared and embarrassed that she is one of the lawmakers of our country?"

Some details, though, are just too over-the-top. Davis' releases claim she "skyrocketed to fame in the 1990s with her raunchy rock-anthem '(Doing the) Baby Dance,' which reached No. 4 on the Billboard pop charts." Before taking office, Davis also played the role of Penny Pingleton in numerous regional performances of "Hairspray."

We tried to get to the bottom of the bottom of the ruse, but her "staffer," who identifies himself as Jake Barnes (oddly, that's the name of the lead character from Ernest Hemingway's "The Sun Also Rises") refuses to give up his "boss." "The idea that Congresswoman Sherri Davis, R-CA [sic] is a fictional character and not a real congresswoman is one that was planted in the media by Sherri's Democratic opponent in the congressional election this fall," he wrote us in an e-mail.

He said he hoped to have the congresswoman, who was traveling in Vienna, give us a call. We're holding our breath.

Sheriff, congressman, liquor-store owner … now lobbyist

The strange career of former Rep. Tommy Robinson just got a little stranger. The former Republican congressman from Arkansas is also a former sheriff who gained notoriety by chaining convicted prisoners to a fence. Now he owns a liquor store and, according to The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, just landed a new gig: as a lobbyist for the new president of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Robinson told the paper he would be "brokering oil and other business deals between a number of U.S. companies" and Congo President Joseph Kabila. Robinson will get to keep the $10,000 to $12,000 monthly income earned from the lobbying position under the terms of his bankruptcy proceedings in Little Rock, the story says.

According to the report, Robinson served a five-day jail sentence earlier this year for attacking a creditor in a Brinkley, Ark. barbeque restaurant.

Wal-Mart, GOP forsake God, groups say

Some Christian conservative groups say both Wal-Mart and the Republican Party have "forsaken God." And just as the GOP took a hit in the elections earlier this month, the groups say the retail giant's lower-than-expected November sales figures are the wages of that sin.

Why are sales below estimates? "It is for the same reason things went south for the Republican Party this past election cycle," read a statement by the Rev. Flip Benham and Pat McEwan, with Operation Save America and Operation Save Wal-Mart. "Wal-Mart has forsaken God and it has forsaken the people who love Him."

The groups led protesters on Nov. 24 to picket the “gates of hell” — that is, Wal-Mart stores around the country. They say Wal-Mart, like the GOP, has strayed from its founding principles, set by founder Sam Walton, citing Wal-Mart’s dispensing of “Plan B” contraception and the fact that the retailer is a corporate member of the National Gay & Lesbian Chamber of Commerce.

GOP not taking loss by the book

Looks like Republicans aren’t looking for answers after losses in the November elections — at least not in books.

Tom Nissley, senior books editor for Amazon.com, says he hasn’t seen the same post-election bump in sales for what he thinks of as “self-help” books for losers. After Democrats got trounced in the 2004 election, he noticed a spike in sales of left-friendly books such as Tom Franks’s “What’s the Matter With Kansas” and George Lakoff’s “Don’t Think of an Elephant,” books he describes as “what can we do and how to fix things” tomes.

This time, there’s no Republican analogue, he said. “That was a surprise for me,” Nissley said. “It might be that conservatives don’t think of themselves as needing to make a change.”

The two political books that have seen big boosts are “Fields of Fire,” the novel set in the Vietnam War by incoming Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) and “Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald Rumsfeld.”

Bush Willing To Work With Dems On Trade (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger, Ap Economics Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

President Bush's top trade negotiator said Tuesday the president still hopes to achieve bipartisan support for an aggressive trade liberalization agenda in the next Congress even with Democrats in control.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said the administration would continue to push for the conclusion of global trade talks known as the Doha Round before negotiating authority expires on June 30.

She said the administration also hopes to wrap up negotiations by early next year on free trade deals with South Korea and Malaysia and said that talks should be concluded soon with Panama.

She called gaining congressional approval for agreements already completed with Peru and Colombia a high priority.

In a speech to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Schwab warned against any move to erect protectionist barriers against the flow of goods into the country, something that critics say are needed in the face of record-high trade deficits they contend are costing American jobs.

Many Democrats campaigned against Bush's trade policies in the November congressional elections, saying the administration had failed to do enough to halt the loss of manufacturing jobs to low-wage foreign countries such as China. Since Bush took office in 2001, the country has lost nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs.

The Democratic takeover of the House and Senate has raised speculation that the administration's trade agenda will face serious obstacles in the new Congress.

But Schwab labeled this the "conventional wisdom" that a Democratic-controlled Congress would stop the administration's trade agenda "dead in its tracks."

"There are those in the extremes of both parties ready to preach retreating to protectionism and economic isolationism," Schwab said in her speech. She said nothing could be more harmful to the American economy.

"My hand is outstretched to any and all members of Congress — the new Democratic leadership and our Republican colleagues," she said. "We must think about the next generation, not just the next election."

Rep. Sander Levin, D-Mich., said in a statement that the administration needed to be prepared to seek compromises with Democrats on contentious trade issues.

"I hope Ambassador Schwab's remarks are not meant to say that the Bush administration's approach to trade is 'stay the course.' There needs to be a change in course," Levin said.

Schwab said she had been encouraged by comments on the need for bipartisanship made by Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., who will head up the Senate Finance Committee and Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who will head the House Ways and Means Committee, the two panels with responsibility for trade.

DOJ_NMG_0099384

But trade experts said Schwab may being far too optimistic about what can be done in the next Congress.

"I see rough waters ahead for the administration's trade agenda," said Dan Griswold, a trade expert at the Cato Institute, a think tank in Washington. "All the signs point toward legislative stalemate on trade."

Some analysts suggested for Bush to win approval of further trade deals he will have to drop opposition to providing greater benefits to workers laid off because of foreign competition and also accept Democratic demands to increase protections so that U.S. jobs are not moved to low-wage countries with lax labor and environmental standards.

Gary Hufbauer, a trade expert at the Institute for International Economics, said an early test for Bush will be whether he can get Congress to approve normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

Bush suffered an embarrassing defeat on this issue when the House failed to approve it by the necessary majority earlier this month right before he left on a trip to Vietnam.

"If Vietnam is held over until next year, that would indicate tough sledding for the administration," Hufbauer said.

Treasury's Paulson Sounds Warning On Protectionism (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

LONDON -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson warned that protectionist sentiment is rising all over the world, partly because "the benefits of trade are not spread evenly in any part of the world." But he said it would be "morally wrong" to give in to "protectionist elements."

Mr. Paulson's remarks, in a speech to the Confederation of British Industry and in subsequent comments to reporters, echo some of the themes that have been sounded by Democratic Party critics of globalization in the U.S., and like-minded people in other countries.

In contrast with those who would seek to slow the pace of globalization and prevent the completion of the current Doha round of world trade talks, Mr. Paulson argued that it is essential that globalization continue in order to assure future prosperity of developed and developing countries.

"Giving in to protectionist sentiment," he said, "would be telling developing nations that while we have benefited from increased trade, we aren't going to allow them the same opportunity to develop." That, he said, is "not only bad policy, it is morally wrong."

In Washington, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab echoed Mr. Paulson, raising alarms about the "extremes" in both major U.S. political parties that preach economic isolationism. "Those are forces we must confront in a bipartisan way," Ms. Schwab said. In an appearance before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Ms. Schwab vowed to work with Democrats in Congress next year.

Ms. Schwab suggested the Bush administration has made strides in already-completed trade deals to improve labor and environmental standards abroad, issues of importance to Democrats. And without offering specifics, Ms. Schwab suggested the administration needs to better respond to the needs of workers who lose their jobs as a result of foreign competition. The "dislocations are real," she said.

In London, Mr. Paulson acknowledged that trade in goods and services can eliminate jobs in the short run, especially jobs for workers with few skills. This, he said, is fueling resentment toward global trade and investment in many countries. "For over 20 years now, we've seen a trend driven by globalization: Those who have skills are getting greater rewards."

Public concern that trade is driving a wedge between winners and losers in the U.S. economy, he said, is a factor in tension between the U.S. and China. "Part of this relates to a feeling that the benefits of the trade between our two countries aren't being shared equally or fairly," he said in response to a question after his speech.

Citizenship Agency Lost 111,000 Files (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services has lost track of 111,000 files in 14 of the agency's busiest district offices and processed as many as 30,000 citizenship applications last year without the necessary files, congressional investigators reported yesterday.

The Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, conducted the review at the request of Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) after U.S. authorities granted citizenship in 2002 to a man without checking his primary file. The file, which was lost, indicated ties to the militant Islamic group Hezbollah.

"It only takes one missing file of somebody with links to a terrorist organization to become an American citizen," said Grassley, who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "We can't afford to be handing out citizenship with blinders on."

Collins, head of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, noted that some of the Sept. 11 hijackers entered the U.S. legally, disappearing until the terrorist attacks. She called it "unthinkable" that the U.S. immigration system could still grant citizenship to a potential terrorist "simply because they can't find the person's file."

An agency official said workers probably checked most of the files but failed to make note of it.

The GAO report, dated Oct. 27 and released by the senators yesterday, underscored long-standing problems at the agency, which was created out of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and is expected to bear the brunt of administering new rules if Congress overhauls immigration policy.

The $1.8 billion agency handled 7.5 million applications for immigration benefits in 2005 but relies on paper files. The agency awarded a five-year, $150 million contract in August to begin digitizing 55 million "alien files," or A-files, but for now it still relies on paper files.

The GAO found that the agency's workers failed to record A-file use in processing 30,000 of 715,000 naturalization cases last year, or 4 percent of cases. The GAO also found that as of July 27, Citizenship and Immigration Services' electronic tracking system reported that 111,000 A-files were lost in the 14 offices that manage two-thirds of naturalization cases.

Steven J. Pecinovsky, an agency liaison to the GAO, said workers are not required to note that they have checked A-files but will be in the future. A 2005 internal audit found a much lower incidence of unchecked A-files than the GAO cited -- about 0.5 percent.

The GAO also cited internal audits that found that 21 percent of files were not where they were supposed to be in Immigration Services' San Diego office in 2005 and that 6 percent of files could not be found in the Los Angeles office earlier this year.

Senators Irked Over Missing Immigration Files (AP)

The AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- About 30,000 applications from immigrants seeking citizenship were processed by the government even though thousands of background files used to determine eligibility were missing, congressional investigators found.

Details of the investigation by the Government Accountability Office were released by Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley of Iowa and Susan Collins of Maine Tuesday.

According to the GAO, 14 Citizenship and Immigration Services offices were missing 110,000 so-called alien files, or A-files. Such files contain applications and other documents of some noncitizens and serve as the primary file for the immigrant and help determine eligibility.

Grassley and Collins said the citizenship and immigration offices, which are part of the Department of Homeland Security, rely on A-files to help determine eligibility for immigration benefits. The files are used by homeland security and law enforcement agencies during criminal investigations and to decide whether someone should remain in the U.S.

The GAO said the citizenship and immigration agency may not have consulted A-files when processing 30,000 naturalization applications in 2005. A-files were checked in 96 percent of the naturalization cases processed that year. The agency manages 55 million A-files.

In addition, the number of applications processed without consulting A-files could have been less because workers sometimes don't record whether they've consulted the files, the GAO said.

Spokesmen at Department of Homeland Security and Citizenship and Immigration Services could not be reached immediately Tuesday evening.

Grassley and Collins said they requested the investigation after the Homeland Security agency granted U.S. citizenship to a suspected terrorist, without checking an A-file, in 2002.

"It only takes one missing file of somebody with links to a terrorist organization to become an American citizen," Grassley said in a news release.

The missing files also cause delays for immigrants with no security issues from becoming U.S. citizens, the senators said.

The senators said the agency agreed with the GAO to require workers to record whether an A-file was used to process a naturalization application and to use an automated file tracking system.

Pelosi Passes Hastings For Intel Chair (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

In a decision that could roil Democratic unity in the new House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi passed over Rep. Alcee Hastings Tuesday for the chairmanship of the Intelligence Committee.

Hastings, currently the No. 2 Democrat on the panel, had been aggressively making a case for the top position, supported by members of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Critics pointed out that he had been impeached when he was a federal judge and said naming him to such a sensitive post would be a mistake just as the Democrats take over House control pledging reforms.

"I am obviously disappointed with this decision," Hastings, D-Fla., said in a statement thanking his supporters. "I will be seeking better and bigger opportunities in a Democratic Congress."

He learned his bid for the chairmanship was unsuccessful during a closed-door meeting with Pelosi on Tuesday.

In a statement, Pelosi, D-Calif., said Hastings has made national security his highest priority. "He has served our country well, and I have full confidence that he will continue to do so," she said.

In a sign of the bitterness that has surrounded the debate, Hastings closed his statement by saying: "Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet."

The Black Caucus had no immediate comment.

A Democratic congressional aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity about internal party deliberations, said Pelosi has not yet decided who will get the position when the new Congress convenes in January.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, is next in line in seniority and is considered a strong contender for the job. Still, naming him would be a snub to the current senior Democrat on the panel, Jane Harman of California. Her committee leadership term expires at year's end, and she could be reappointed by Pelosi. Yet the two are believed to have deep differences.

Hastings, who came to Congress in 1992, was charged in an FBI bribery sting but acquitted by a federal jury in 1983. Some judicial colleagues said Hastings fabricated his defense, and their allegations led to his impeachment by the U.S. House in 1988. He was removed from the bench by the Senate the following year.

In 1997, the Justice Department found an agent had falsely testified against Hastings, but no action was taken to reopen his case.

In 2000, Democrats passed over another member of the Congressional Black Caucus — Rep. Sanford Bishop of Georgia — for the senior Democratic spot on the intelligence panel. Party leaders had agreed to give the position to Harman when she ran for Congress after an unsuccessful bid to be California governor.

Pelosi Moves To End Quarrel Over Intelligence Post (WSJ)

By David Rogers

WASHINGTON -- Moving to end weeks of damaging speculation, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said she wouldn't appoint Rep. Alcee Hastings, who was impeached as a federal judge, to be the next chairman of the House Intelligence Committee.

Ms. Pelosi gave no indication of who would get the post, but aides indicated that a decision could follow quickly this week in a bid to resolve the issue, which has been used by her critics to try to isolate the California Democrat and incoming House speaker.

The criticism of her leadership is striking given that no other speaker before her has had the same length of service on the intelligence panel as Ms. Pelosi. As speaker, she will have the power to single-handedly appoint the chair and members for the new Congress, but her discretion has been challenged by allies of fellow Californian, Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's ranking Democrat, who has campaigned for the post.

This pressure has increased since Ms. Pelosi defied expectations earlier this month by publicly interceding on behalf of Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) in his uphill and ultimately unsuccessful contest against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) to become House majority leader.

Ms. Pelosi said she was backing Mr. Murtha out of friendship and in recognition of his speaking out against the war in Iraq -- a major issue for Democrats in the midterm elections. But in going against the Washington establishment and Mr. Hoyer, she also made herself more vulnerable to pressure from allies to Ms. Harman, who was part of the Hoyer camp.

Pelosi allies argue that the lawmaker is being unfairly browbeaten by editorialists and critics in the caucus, who try to isolate her as a San Francisco liberal. The Murtha candidacy, however costly, was about opposition to the war, not an ideological issue, they say, and once the party has had time to begin to move its agenda in January, these fights will be forgotten.

Yesterday's announcement, which followed a meeting with Mr. Hastings, appeared designed as a first step in this direction and a bid to re-establish more control. In a brief statement, Ms. Pelosi said the two had had "extensive consultations, and today I advised him that I would select someone else as chairman."

In his statement, Mr. Hastings confirmed this decision. "I am obviously disappointed," he said. "As we learn in Ecclesiastes, however, for everything there is a season."

An African-American lawmaker from Florida, Mr. Hastings was drawn into the fray because he is next-in-line on the committee behind Ms. Harman, whose tenure is slated to expire at the end of this Congress. But from the outset Mr. Hastings's impeachment has been a liability, and one Ms. Pelosi had discussed with allies in the House.

As a judge, Mr. Hastings was charged and acquitted in federal court in a Federal Bureau of Investigation bribery sting. He was later impeached by the House and removed by the Senate in 1989 on different charges, including findings of an investigation by a special judicial panel that he had fabricated evidence that secured his acquittal.

If Ms. Pelosi holds firm, as expected, and doesn't name Ms. Harman to the post, she has several options. One is to elevate Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D., Texas), a Vietnam veteran and former member of the U.S. Border Patrol before coming to Congress. But she is also free to shake up the committee by appointing new members or bringing back past leaders of the panel, such as Rep. Norm Dicks (D., Wash), the former ranking Democrat and someone who could be a candidate for the chairmanship as well.

Hastings Won't Chair Intel Panel, Pelosi Says (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Tuesday that she would not name Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) as the next chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, creating new uncertainty around one of the chamber's most important leadership positions.

In a written statement, Pelosi said she had met with Hastings and "advised him that I would select someone else as chairman of the House Intelligence Committee."

Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who will become speaker when her party takes control of the House in January, did not explain why she was bypassing Hastings, the panel's second-ranking Democrat. Her office has previously indicated that the committee's top Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, will not be reappointed.

The possibility that Hastings would get the post created a torrent of criticism, especially because Pelosi pledged to lead "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history."

In 1989, Hastings was forced to step down as a federal judge in Florida after being impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate of taking part in a bribery scheme that involved the sentencing of two defendants convicted in his court of racketeering.

Hastings, who has steadfastly maintained his innocence, had been acquitted of similar charges in a criminal trial six years earlier, but a federal judicial commission urged Congress to re-consider his case. He first ran for Congress in 1992 and has been overwhelmingly reelected since.

Last week, he wrote a letter to Democratic colleagues, lobbying for the chairmanship.

On Tuesday he released a statement acknowledging he did not get the post but indicating a desire to remain on the panel, known formally as the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, where he has served for seven years.

"I am obviously disappointed with this decision," Hastings said in the statement, which included a swipe at his critics. "I will be seeking better and bigger opportunities in a Democratic Congress. Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet."

Pelosi's decision leaves a hole in the Democratic leadership ranks. The anticipated elevation of Hastings as chairman and the expected removal of Harman from the panel were seen as efforts to settle a debt with the Congressional Black Caucus, to which Hastings belongs: Another caucus member had been bumped from the panel in 2001 when Harman returned to Congress — and regained her seniority on the committee — after an unsuccessful run for governor of California.

Democratic aides indicated that Pelosi would probably tap someone not on the committee to become its chairman. Among the potential candidates is Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), who was on the panel for eight years in the 1990s and is familiar with the classified budgets of the nation's spy agencies from his service on the House Appropriations Committee.

Such a move is already gathering support among influential Democrats on Capitol Hill. Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana and a member of the Sept. 11 commission, said Pelosi should "go off the committee and appoint somebody brand new."

Pelosi Won't Pick Tainted Lawmaker For Key Post (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — Representative Nancy Pelosi announced on Tuesday that she would not award the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee to Representative Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, who was a leading contender for the post.

The decision by Mrs. Pelosi, the incoming speaker, ended weeks of speculation over whether she would tap Mr. Hastings, tainted by an old bribery scandal, for one of the most sensitive chairmanships when the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

Members of her staff had said she favored Mr. Hastings. But his position was weakened because he was impeached and removed as a federal judge in 1989 in connection with a bribery case. He was subsequently acquitted in the criminal case.

For Mrs. Pelosi, who had hammered the Republicans for ethical lapses in the fall campaigns, the decision to pass over Mr. Hastings was a sign that she did not relish another battle after the Democratic caucus rejected her choice for majority leader, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

On the other hand, her decision risked alienating the influential Congressional Black Caucus, which had strongly backed Mr. Hastings.

Mr. Hastings said in a statement he was "disappointed" with Mrs. Pelosi's decision and promised to work with her. He also took a shot at people who had publicly opposed his candidacy.

"Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099389

Mrs. Pelosi's allies said she remained committed to selecting someone other than Representative Jane Harman of California, who is the ranking Democrat on the panel. Two possible compromise candidates are a committee member, Silvestre Reyes of Texas, and Sanford D. Bishop Jr. of Georgia.

The news that someone is not being given a post is rarely the subject of announcements here. But the question of who will lead the Intelligence Committee has developed into something of a soap opera.

More than a year ago, Mrs. Pelosi told reporters of her intention to replace Ms. Harman as the top Democrat on the committee regardless of the results of the election.

Mrs. Pelosi and Ms. Harman have long had a contentious relationship, and Mrs. Pelosi has told colleagues that she is angry that Ms. Harman has not used her position to attack the administration more directly on issues like the faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq and the domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency.

Ms. Harman has been enlisting friends, allies and powerful Democratic donors to lobby Mrs. Pelosi on her behalf. Mrs. Pelosi's supporters say that has only hardened her stance.

This month, Ms. Harman said that the Democratic moderates' victories in the elections proved that the party needed to navigate a centrist stance on national security, as she has done on the Intelligence Committee for four years.

Ms. Harman has earned the support of the Blue Dog Democrats, a coalition of conservative and moderate Democrats.

Influential party members warned that selecting Mr. Hastings would provide too much ammunition for Republicans, warnings that Mrs. Pelosi's supporters said helped sway her.

Mrs. Pelosi has pointed out that it is her prerogative to choose the leader of the Intelligence Committee and that she does not need to select someone who is a panel member. The appointment is not subject to a vote.

Representative Norm Dicks of Washington, who was on the panel for eight years in the 1990s, has been mentioned as a possible candidate for the post. On Tuesday, however, a spokesman for Mr. Dicks said the congressman was not a serious candidate and would prefer a different committee.

The appointment is crucial for Mrs. Pelosi. She included a promise to improve the intelligence in the Democrats' six-point platform for the elections. She also came into office as minority leader promising to uphold the highest ethical standards. And she has campaigned against what she calls the Republican's "culture of corruption."

This year, Mrs. Pelosi removed Representative William J. Jefferson of Louisiana from his spot on the powerful Ways and Means Committee after he had been accused of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes.

Mr. Jefferson, like Mr. Hastings, is black, and just as his removal caused tension between Mrs. Pelosi and the Congressional Black Caucus, so did the decision not to choose Mr. Hastings.

A statement by the caucus praised Mr. Hastings for "unequivocal commitment to our nation's security, selflessness and true statesmanship," saying, "He would have made an outstanding Intelligence chairman, and we still hope he will at some point in our nation's future."

But unlike caucus statements in the Jefferson case, it avoided any direct criticism of Mrs. Pelosi.

Hastings, Harman Rejected For Chairmanship (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has decided against naming either Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the senior Democrat on the House intelligence committee, or Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.), the panel's No. 2 Democrat, to chair the pivotal committee next year.

The decisions came despite lobbying by conservative Democrats on Harman's behalf and a full-throttled campaign by Hastings to overcome the stigma of the 1988 impeachment that drove him from his federal judgeship.

The fight over the top spot on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has exposed the kind of factional politics that bedeviled House Democrats before they were swept from control in 1994. Harman, a moderate, strong-on-defense "Blue Dog" Democrat, had angered liberals with her reluctance to challenge the Bush administration's use of intelligence.

Hastings, an African American, was strongly backed by the Congressional Black Caucus but was ardently opposed by the Blue Dogs, who said his removal from the bench disqualifies him from such a sensitive post.

Complicating the matter was Pelosi's relationship with black Democrats. Earlier this year, she enraged the Black Caucus by removing one of its members, Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.), from the Ways and Means Committee after court documents revealed that federal investigators looking into allegations of bribery had found $90,000 in cash neatly bundled in his freezer.

Instead of picking Harman or Hastings, Pelosi will look for a compromise candidate, probably Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), but possibly Rep. Norman D. Dicks (Wash.), a hawkish member of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, or Rep. Sanford Bishop (Ga.), a conservative African American with experience on the intelligence committee. To entice Harman to run in 2000 for a House seat she had vacated for an unsuccessful bid for the California governorship, the Democratic leadership shunted Bishop off the committee -- another perceived slap at black lawmakers.

In announcing her decision, Pelosi praised Hastings. "Alcee Hastings has always placed national security as his highest priority," she said. "He has served our country well, and I have full confidence that he will continue to do so."

Hastings took a shot at conservatives and media voices who have come out strongly against his appointment. "Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet," he wrote.

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, voiced disappointment, saying in a statement that Hastings "would have made an outstanding Intelligence Chairman." Privately, caucus aides said they had dismissed reports that Hastings would not get the post and were taken aback that Pelosi had cut out an ally such as Hastings. Hastings himself suggested that a decision against him would be a victory for "Newt Gingrich, Sean Hannity, Ann Coulter, Michelle Malkin, Michael Barone, Drudge, anonymous bloggers, and other assorted misinformed fools."

In the end, Pelosi's pledge to clean up Congress after two years of scandal made Hastings's appointment impossible, Democrats said.

Likewise, Pelosi was not willing to bend the committee's unique term-limit rules for Harman, who she believes had violated a promise to step aside, according to Democrats. Harman had angered some Democrats with a tough management style that helped drive away longtime Democratic staffers.

In recent days, Hastings and his allies had launched a spirited campaign to clear his name from the stigma of his impeachment. Hastings distributed to Democratic colleagues six documents totaling 70 pages, including court testimony, letters from Republican and Democratic senators questioning his treatment, and a five-page letter from Hastings excoriating "the noise and misleading, poorly informed, misinformed, and sometimes venomous attacks on my integrity and character by pundits, politicians, and editors screaming the word 'impeachment.' "

He pointed repeatedly to his 1983 acquittal by a Miami jury and wrote that it is "amazing how little importance" his critics give that verdict. The events that followed that trial, he said, "are so convoluted, voluminous, complex and mundane that it would boggle the mind."

In fact, there is a certain simplicity in the conclusion drawn by an investigating committee of five eminent federal judges, each with strong civil rights credentials. Those judges, and later more than three dozen others, concluded that Hastings lied to the Miami jury as many as 15 times to win acquittal.

The original case against Florida's first black federal trial judge was circumstantial. A federal grand jury charged Hastings with conspiring with Washington lawyer William A. Borders Jr. to sell a lenient sentence to two convicted Florida racketeers for $150,000.

A sequence of meetings, telephone calls, judicial actions and taped conversations in 1981 convinced federal investigators that Hastings was on the take. But after 17 1/2 hours of deliberations at the end of a three-week trial, jurors voted not guilty.

Two federal judges soon filed an administrative complaint, accusing Hastings of conduct prejudicial to the courts, which led to the judicial investigation. John Doar, the chief House Watergate counsel, and a panel of judges investigating the matter said they uncovered substantial new evidence that convinced them that Hastings joined the bribery conspiracy and then fabricated a defense to hoodwink the jury.

In one example, they focused on Hastings's testimony about telephone calls. The issue was a taped conversation with Borders that prosecutors considered coded talk about a bribe. Hastings said it was an innocent discussion about helping a friend, Hemphill Pride, regain his law license.

Pride said that he knew of no such effort, that he would have rejected one and that he was not even eligible for reinstatement. He told the panel that Hastings, while under indictment, had urged him to remember details that, as far as Pride recalled, had never happened.

On the witness stand in Miami, however, Hastings showed the jury records of four telephone calls and confidently declared that he had made them to Pride. In fact, the Doar investigation revealed, the numbers called belonged to other people with no connection to Pride.

"Judge Hastings' conduct was premeditated, deliberate and contrived," wrote the committee, whose most prominent member was U.S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., famous for rulings integrating Alabama's public institutions.

When the Hastings case reached the House, Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), skeptical about the evidence, investigated further. In time, Conyers, an African American, became so certain of Hastings's guilt that he delivered an impassioned speech about race and justice -- and made an opening statement during the Senate proceedings, which ended with Hastings's conviction on 11 counts, including seven counts of making false statements.

"We did not wage that civil rights battle merely to replace one form of judicial corruption for another," Conyers said in the House, which voted 413 to 3 to impeach Hastings.

Hastings Denied Top Intelligence Seat (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi yesterday informed Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, the Florida Democrat who was removed as a federal judge over bribery charges, that he would be passed over for the chairmanship of one of the most sensitive and powerful committees on Capitol Hill.

"Congressman Alcee Hastings and I have had extensive consultations, and today I advised him that I would select someone else as chairman of the House intelligence committee," Mrs. Pelosi said in a short statement after meeting behind closed doors with Mr. Hastings.

Mrs. Pelosi received intense criticism after suggestions that she would elevate Mr. Hastings to the top spot.

Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argued that the former federal judge would be a poor choice for chairman because he was charged in 1981 with accepting a $150,000 bribe. A jury acquitted Mr. Hastings after a key witness refused to testify.

Still, a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives later impeached Mr. Hastings on a 413-3 vote with support from Mrs. Pelosi and others in Congress who now support Mr. Hastings. The Democrat-led Senate convicted Mr. Hastings and he was removed from office.

Mr. Hastings, the second-ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, maintains his innocence and dismissed the importance of his impeachment.

In a letter to colleagues last week, he said, "Most of the congresspersons and senators who voted never saw the evidence. Many of them never read the reports of the committee or reviewed the daily videos. Iraq and the budget are not the only times votes have been cast without adequate review and knowledge of the facts."

The speaker in waiting was attacked for considering Mr. Hastings for the chairmanship after suffering an embarrassing defeat when the majority of her caucus rejected her candidate for majority leader, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, in part because of ethics questions.

Mrs. Pelosi did not publicly explain why she passed over Mr. Hastings, saying only that he will continue to play a major role in the party's national security decisions.

Mrs. Pelosi, who represents San Francisco's congressional district, did not say whom else she is considering for the intelligence chairmanship. Rep. Jane Harman of California, the most senior Democrat on the panel, is not expected to be chosen because of personal and philosophical differences with Mrs. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0099392

Among Mr. Hastings' strongest supporters were fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose relations with Mrs. Pelosi have been strained. Caucus members have complained about unfair treatment and accused Mrs. Pelosi of holding them to a double standard on ethics matters.

Rep. Melvin L. Watt, North Carolina Democrat and caucus chairman, called the Hastings decision disappointing.

"The statement issued by Rep. Hastings following his meeting with Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi reflects the qualities for which the Congressional Black Caucus so strongly supported him to be the next Chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence -- an unequivocal commitment to our nation's security, selflessness and true statesmanship," Mr. Watt said. "He would have made an outstanding Intelligence Chairman and we still hope he will at some point in our nation's future."

Mr. Hastings seemed to accept the decision.

"Now I must, and will seek other ways to better serve the citizens of Florida's 23rd Congressional District and our great Nation," he said. "As has been the case over the past seven years of my service on the Intelligence Committee, the next Chair of the Committee will have my full support to do everything we can to protect the national security of the United States and our allies. Our nation's national security is far more important than my professional security."

Capuano Says Dem Transition Is 'disjointed' And Confusing (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 29, 2006

The lawmaker heading the day-to-day transition of House Democrats from minority to majority party says that process has become "disjointed" and that leaders need to do a better job communicating with each other.

But Rep. Michael Capuano (D-Mass.), whom Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) tapped after the election to head that transition, also said the inevitable messiness of a new party taking over the House is just part of the democratic process.

"I'm trying to deal with the physical [office] space, the personnel issues, House rules, and some of the legislative changes that may be done, and trying to get a handle on coordination," said Capuano in an interview with The Hill.

"A lot of people have their hands in it right now but the coordination isn't where I would like it to be," he said. "It's disjointed."

Capuano said that Pelosi and incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are involved in the transition effort.

Part of the question that has arisen, he said, is figuring out exactly who's in charge of various aspects of the transition. He said that he believes there does not need to be military-style delineations of responsibilities and argued against centralizing the effort in any one office.

"I just want to make sure that everyone is talking to everyone about what they're doing," he said. "It should be done in a coordinated manner."

Emanuel took the lead on ethics reform last week when he sent a memo to colleagues emphasizing the importance of approving rules changes and legislation implementing ethics and lobbying reform.

"Failing to deliver on this promise would be devastating to our standing with the public, and certainly jeopardize some of our marginal seats," wrote Emanuel. "The voters are looking to us for leadership, and it starts with real reform."

But other than Emanuel, Democratic leaders have remained quiet on what changes to House and Democratic Caucus rules they are contemplating. House Democrats are divided over how far they should go in changing House ethics rules.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a close ally of Pelosi's, caused a stir last month when he told a group of colleagues that he thought the Democratic lobbying reform package was "total crap."

Hoyer and Clyburn, meanwhile, are taking prominent roles.

Stacey Bernards, Hoyer's spokeswoman, said her boss was involved in all the transition issues, had met with Pelosi to discuss them last week, and plans to meet with her again this week.

Kristie Greco, Clyburn's aide, said that the incoming whip is "working for an effective and efficient transition that's driven by a tone of civility" as well as assembling "a staff and whip team that will be the most effective of any majority."

The Democratic leaders have yet to make final decisions on any potential changes to the House rules and the Democratic Caucus rules.

"It's all in the discussion stages," said Capuano.

One of the most sensitive subjects is how much weight should be given to seniority when deciding who will serve as committee and subcommittee chairmen.

Capuano said that there has been confusion over the importance of seniority. He said there is a perception that seniority is virtually the sole factor in determining committee leadership and makeup, adding that has not been true for years.

"People have misread the caucus rules and thought seniority is absolute," he said. "Not in 30 years has it been absolute. It is a factor.

"Seniority, the diversity of the caucus, and commitment to Democratic principles and agenda" are factors, he said, explaining that merit is the first factor listed in the expiring caucus rules but that it is not necessarily more important than seniority.

Pelosi and other leaders have laid out broad outlines of changes they would like to see made, but they still have to hammer out the crucial details.

As far as the procedures of the House, Pelosi has called for bipartisan administration of the committees and for the legislative process to return to a "more regular democratic order."

She has called for the elected Democratic and Republican leaders to consult regularly on scheduling and operation questions and for committee chairmen and ranking minority members to do the same. Pelosi has also proposed that the minority should control at least one-third of panel budgets and office space.

Pelosi also wants legislative changes to address complaints that she and her Democratic colleagues had of Republicans during their 12-year rule:

Bills should be written after full committee hearings and markups.

The minority party should be allowed to fully debate and offer alternatives to legislation receiving votes on the House floor.

Lawmakers should have at least 24 hours to examine bills and conference reports before voting on them.

Floor votes should be completed within 17 minutes and should not be held open to manipulate the outcome.

House and Senate conference committees should hold weekly meetings including all conference members.

Democrats complained in previous Congresses of the Republicans' habit of limiting bicameral negotiations to House and Senate committee chairmen or a few additional appointed conferees.

Pelosi and Democratic leaders have also proposed a series of ethics reforms. They include banning gifts and travel, extending the time former lawmakers are not allowed to lobby former colleagues, and requiring lobbyists to disclose more information about their activities.

Capuano said that Democratic leaders agree that the House should have something akin to an office of public integrity to police improper behavior. Such an office is one of the most controversial elements of ethics reform. Senators voted overwhelmingly against it earlier this year.

But he said they must decide how it should be set up and "what their full responsibility would be."

Dems, Allies Plot Strategy (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Labor union representatives, liberal leaders, and aides to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) met yesterday to begin work on a broad lobbying push to promote Pelosi's 100-legislative-hour agenda with a campaign expected to mimic the one that helped defeat President Bush's proposed reforms to Social Security.

Yesterday's meeting is a signal that interest groups allied with Democrats are going on the offensive, transitioning from the defensive crouch they have held for much of Bush's time in office.

The purpose of the gathering was to ensure that party allies are unified during the first crucial weeks of the Democratic majority and that the agenda Democrats campaigned on this fall does not become entangled by interest-group squabbles and competition.

"We're talking about engaging in many of the same activities we engaged in during the Social Security effort," said Chuck Loveless, director of legislation at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), which hosted the meeting. Loveless said the campaign would launch immediately and work to mobilize support in December and January.

Party strategists are speculating that they will have a brief window of legislative productivity before a curtain of partisanship falls across town as Republicans and Democrats gear up for the 2008 presidential election.

The first priority of the lobbying plan is to pass a minimum-wage increase. The campaign will also focus on allowing the government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, repealing tax benefits for oil companies, and cutting the interest rate for student loans.

The strategic advantage of the 100-hour agenda is that it is made up of proposals that are broadly popular, thereby allowing the Democrats' allies to achieve consensus and work together from the start of next year. After that agenda is passed, groups are likely to go off in their own directions and clash over competing priorities.

Aides to incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) did not attend the meeting, according to one participant, because the immediate focus of unions and liberal groups is to pass quickly the 100-hour agenda in the House. Fast passage will allow Democrats and their allies to launch Phase II of their legislative plan, which will be to put pressure on the Senate to pass the same agenda.

The third phase will be to convince Bush to sign the measures into law.

"The assumption is to pass it quickly in the House so we can get a head of steam and put pressure on the Senate," said Bob Borosage, co-director of the liberal advocacy group Campaign for America's Future, who attended the meeting. "As you remember, most of the Contract With America passed the House and never emerged from the Senate. We want to avoid that."

Borosage predicted that as many as 100 groups would ultimately participate in the initiative and that it would be broader than the campaign against Bush's plans for Social Security.

Groups will mobilize their members to contact and meet with members of Congress and to hold events in their home states and districts. The campaign is expected to include minimal television advertising.

Representatives from AFSCME, AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), the National Education Association, the American Federation of Teachers, Americans United, a labor-funded advocacy group, and a slew of progressive groups — including USAction, ACORN, Campaign for America's Future, and MoveOn.org — attended the meeting.

Bill Samuel, legislative director for the AFL-CIO, estimated that the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress would span about two weeks. Democratic-leaning groups will then begin to pursue their more narrowly shared legislative goals.

"The 100 hours' agenda is really stuff that can be done quickly and have popular support and is not terribly complicated," said Samuel. "It's a down payment, there's a much larger agenda."

Samuel said that Congress has to tackle big economic issues related to wages, retirement security, and healthcare.

Both Samuel and Anna Burger, the secretary-treasurer of SEIU, said that Congress must take major steps toward providing universal healthcare coverage in the U.S.

"We need a healthcare policy that guarantees every man, woman and child in America has quality and affordable healthcare," said Burger, who also chairs Change to Win, a coalition of seven unions representing 6 million workers. "There have been lots of policies out there — it's a matter of political will to get the job done."

But legislation providing for universal healthcare coverage will be expensive, and Democrats have promised to pass budget rules that would require all new spending to be paid for.

Asked how to pay for expanded healthcare, Samuel said "We have to review tax cuts for the wealthy."

Samuel said that unions would also press for Congress to allow Bush less freedom to negotiate trade agreements, noting that Bush's so-called fast-track trade negotiating authority expires in June.

"They need to set negotiating objectives that are enforceable," he said of Congress.

Unions will also lobby for Democrats to pass the Employee Free Choice Act, which Burger said would protect workers who want to join unions from employer intimidation. That bill is expected to draw strong opposition from Republicans and industry groups.

Culture-war Veterans Hold Fire, For Now (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 29, 2006

After a long battle with conservatives on social issues and judicial nominations, Democratic-aligned interest groups are hailing the coming congressional changeover and weighing exactly how and when to exert their influence.

Republican control of the Capitol may have forced abortion-rights and civil-liberties advocates to play perpetual defense, but those wilderness years also gave the groups valuable practice at building coalitions across the aisle and branding themselves as more mainstream than their conservative counterparts.

Now, as Democrats prepare to assume the majority, these veterans of the culture wars are seeking to shape the agenda of the new leadership. Democratic lawmakers have outlined ambitious goals on Iraq and economic policy, however, challenging their interest-group allies to pick their battles without adopting the confrontational tactics that many believe helped derail the GOP.

"We're definitely taking a look at the way conservative groups approach" abortion, said Donna Crane, government relations director at NARAL Pro-Choice America. "Specifically, we are going to not do what they do, which is use this issue for political gain."

NARAL has aimed its recent efforts less at preserving women's right to an abortion than at making the procedure, as former President Clinton first put it, "safe, legal and rare." One of the family-planning packages strongly backed by NARAL and Planned Parenthood boasts as its chief sponsor new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who describes himself as pro-life.

That "prevention-first" approach is designed to win support from both Democratic and Republican abortion opponents in both parties, capitalizing on the defeat of anti-abortion initiatives in South Dakota, Oregon and California. Jackie Payne, government-relations director at Planned Parenthood, predicted that the Reid bill, which "polls extremely well," would gain freshman supporters next year.

"I don't think we need to play games," Payne said. "I honestly believe we're going for such a common-sense agenda … We don't have to look to [conservatives] for strategies."

Conservative groups of all stripes, from the Concerned Women of America to the Committee for Justice, found common ground this session in the campaign to confirm Supreme Court Justices John Roberts and Samuel Alito as well as a slew of federal circuit nominees whose conservative records alarmed Democrats and civil-liberties groups alike. Yet a Senate Judiciary Committee gavel held by Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) does not herald an interest-group role reversal, said Elliot Mincberg, vice president and legal director at People for the American Way.

"The basic M.O. and attitude is a little bit different" among liberal-leaning groups active on nominations, Mincberg said, adding that "you're not going to see us saying the harsh things that some of the Manny Mirandas of the world have said." Miranda, a former Senate GOP leadership aide, earned a reputation for aggression as head of the conservative Third Branch Conference.

Mincberg, like several fellow advocates, also asserted his willingness to disagree with Democrats when necessary. Democrats will face their first civil liberties test on the Bush administration's program of surveillance without warrants — which the Justice Department inspector general this week began investigating — as well as on the White House-pushed detainee trials bill that Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) has proposed rolling back.

"Were going to push just as hard on the Democrats … as we did on the Republicans," said Caroline Fredrickson, Washington director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Their voting records on our scorecard are definitely better, but that does not mean they're perfect."

Fredrickson pointed to a different risk for interest groups looking forward to a Democratic Congress — that activists might become less eager to pressure a party perceived as more friendly. "We're not willing to wait," she said.

The Judiciary chairmanship belongs to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) for at least one more week, a narrow window in which to take up six hotly contested judicial nominations that the White House resubmitted to the Senate just after the election. Specter has expressed an intention to vote again on the six while acknowledging the emboldened opposition from Leahy and other panel Democrats.

"The White House can send these nominations up to the Hill, but that does not mean they're going to be taken up," said Dick Woodruff, senior legislative adviser at Alliance for Justice. "Gridlock for the next two years would be fine [on judicial picks]."

Woodruff said he would be watching closely as Democrats weigh "how far they are willing to go" in revisiting the detainee bill, a move likely to spark a veto threat from Bush that would require 16 Senate Republican votes to override.

On gay-rights issues, such as employment non-discrimination and expansion of the hate-crimes law, Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese took a respectful view of the long to-do list facing his Democratic allies.

"One of the most important things we can do is be sensitive to the fact that the new leadership in this Congress, [Speaker Nancy] Pelosi [D-Calif.] and Reid, have a huge responsibility to speak to the issues the American people couldn't have been clearer about in putting them there: the war in Iraq and corruption in government," Solmonese said.

Though the gay community might see its issues move lower on the priority list, Solmonese said, such pragmatism is a small price to pay to end the Republicans' prolonged attacks on gay marriage. The page he plans to borrow from conservative groups' playbook: "Be really smart and be really strategic."

Like abortion-rights groups, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence has used the Republican majority to develop a political strategy with bipartisan appeal that it will continue to pursue. Reinstating the lapsed assault weapons ban, a high priority for many urban Democrats, is outranked on the Brady Campaign agenda by boosting law enforcement funding and strengthening background checks.

"My goal is to get us to a position where both Republicans and Democrats are coming to us and asking for our endorsement," Helmke said. "That hasn't really been the case."

Endorsements and contributions often help bolster interest groups' influence with lawmakers. The groups consulted for this story that maintain PACs gave more than $1.6 million this cycle, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, but only two GOP recipients of their largess, Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Deborah Pryce (Ohio), who will cede her leadership post next year, won reelection.

Senate Leader-elect Sets Agenda (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry Reid said Tuesday he's doing away with the "do-nothing Congress" that Democrats campaigned against and plans to keep senators working long hours — focusing first on ethics, the minimum wage and stem cell research.

The Nevada Democrat said he would tackle those priorities after cleaning up the "financial mess" the outgoing Republican Congress is leaving behind, a reference to nine long-overdue spending bills covering 13 Cabinet departments for the budget year that began Oct. 1.

"They're just leaving town, it appears," Reid said during an interview with The Associated Press in his Capitol office. "And so we're going to have to find a way to fund the government for the next year."

The must-pass legislation totals more than $460 billion and could divert time from other items on the Democratic agenda. "It's certainly not going to help it," Reid said.

He is wrapping up his final days as Senate minority leader. He will assume control of the Senate's agenda on Jan. 4, when the next Congress convenes with 10 new senators, at least 52 new House members and Democrats holding majorities in both houses for the first time since 1994.

"We're going to put in some hours here that haven't been put in in a long time," Reid said. That means "being here more days in the week, and we start off this year with seven weeks without a break. That hasn't been done in many, many years here."

Reid said he hopes President Bush is willing to work with Democratic congressional leaders, but he added that the early signs have not been encouraging. He said the White House has not reached out to him since his meeting with Bush in the Oval Office on Nov. 10.

"He said when I met with him after the election he wanted to work together, and I told him, `Mr. President, you said that two years ago and we haven't gotten anything done,'" Reid said.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said lawmakers have been out of town for most of the time since the Nov. 10 meeting and the president has been traveling abroad. He said Bush "has been very forthright in his interest in having a bipartisan dialogue on the Hill. That wasn't just a gesture in the days after the election — that was an authentic, sincere effort."

Reid said he hoped Bush would use his State of the Union address before Congress early next year to lay out plans for health care, retirement security, decreasing dependence on foreign oil, reducing government deficits and, most importantly, Iraq.

He said the Senate will conduct hearings to investigate problems in Iraq but Democrats have no immediate plans to cut spending on the war.

"Now he's the commander in chief, and we're not going to do anything to limit funding or cut off funds, even though there are some on the outside who suggest that," Reid said. "I think we want to make sure that the troops have everything that they need."

With only a two-seat majority and a Republican president with veto power, Reid's Democrats will have an incentive to work with political opponents to get their priorities into the law books.

Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, whom Republicans voted to be their minority leader in the new year, said while he and Reid are not going to agree on every item, they agree on the need for bipartisan achievements on special spending bills and other matters.

"Earmark transparency is a good start, but I would also like to see us find common ground on Social Security, homeland security, extending tax relief and other major issues that we can't just kick down the road," McConnell told the AP.

Bush used the only veto of his presidency so far to reject a bill passed by Congress last year that would have expanded embryonic stem cell research through government funding.

Supporters of such research say it could lead to treatments and cures for a wide variety of ailments, including Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases as well as spinal cord injuries. Bush and abortion foes, however, have opposed expanding embryonic stem cell research because the embryos die in the process of harvesting the stem cells from them.

Fratto said Bush gave the matter deep thought and consulted with researchers and religious leaders on the moral and ethical implications of his position. Reid said he hoped the president "will relent and see the light."

In the meantime, Reid said the Senate is "not even close" to having the two-thirds vote necessary to override Bush's veto but he hopes some Republicans will join the Democrats after the GOP's election losses this month.

He pointed to Missouri, where the issue helped pro-stem cell candidate Claire McCaskill defeat incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who said embryonic stem cell research destroys human life at its earliest stages.

The midterm election came on the heels of several ethical scandals involving lawmakers, and Reid said reform is needed. He said "the first thing we do" will be to require lawmakers to put their names on "earmarks" — spending items added to bills that often help a specific company or project in their districts. Bush supports such transparency, Fratto said.

Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said there were 9,963 such projects in the spending bills for the 2006 budget year, costing $29 billion.

The third item at the top of Reid's agenda is increasing the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. It's also one of several measures that Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi has promised to bring to the House floor in the first 100 hours that chamber is in session. Fratto said Bush is willing to support an increase in the minimum wage, although he doesn't want to publicly debate the amount and wants to make sure it won't hurt small businesses.

McConnell Pledges Cooperation (WP)

By Eric Pianin

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Sounding a conciliatory note, the new Senate Republican leader vowed yesterday to work with Democrats to pass a minimum-wage increase and a strong ethics reform package shortly after the new Democratic-controlled Congress begins work next year.

Senate Minority Leader-elect Mitch McConnell (Ky.) described as "easy stuff" much of the Democrats' opening agenda, including a proposal to boost the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour and a congressional ethics package that would ban gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, as well as impose new controls on the budget deficit. These issues, however, have not proved to be easy before.

McConnell said he is urging bolder action. He challenged House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to push for a long-term solution to financing the Social Security system and for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. Democrats in the current Congress blocked President Bush's proposal to partially privatize Social Security, while an impasse between House and Senate Republicans over approaches to immigration changes thwarted a deal.

"One thing I hope we can do, now that we have the election out of the way, is see if we can quit kicking the can down the road on a number of significant issues," McConnell told a meeting of Washington Post editors and reporters. "Left over from last year, I would put immigration at the top of the list. But I also share the view . . . that this would be the perfect time to tackle Social Security."

While some fear that the new Congress will become a political battleground in the run-up to the 2008 presidential campaign -- with at least eight Democratic and Republican senators considering bids for the White House -- McConnell asserted that a grand deal on Social Security is still possible, even with a Democratic-controlled House and Senate and a Republican White House. He noted that divided government did not prevent President Ronald Reagan and a Democratic Congress in 1983 from striking a landmark deal ensuring the long-term solvency of Social Security.

McConnell said the two parties should be open to a wide range of approaches -- "I don't think we should rule anything in or out."

In recent days, Bush and senior administration officials have revived talk of reaching an accord on an overhaul of Social Security that would maintain the program's solvency beyond the baby boom generation's retirement. In an interview with The Washington Post last week, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., the president's point man on Social Security, promised that the White House will enter talks with Democrats with "no preconditions." That is a significant shift for Bush, who had previously said that any Social Security legislation would have to include private accounts that would allow workers to divert some of their payroll taxes to investments in stocks or bonds.

McConnell added another concession yesterday, saying that Social Security legislation should "solve the problem as far into the future as possible" -- a standard that is far more flexible than Bush's insistence on nothing short of a "permanent" fix.

McConnell, 64, will succeed Sen. Bill Frist (Tenn.) as the Senate Republican leader in January, when Frist steps down to explore a possible bid for the GOP presidential nomination.

The Kentucky lawmaker, like Reid, is a consummate dealmaker whose top priority is legislative achievement. They both rose through the Senate ranks by mastering the rules and building strong relationships with colleagues. Both are combative lawyer-politicians who overcame childhood challenges and are now in their mid-60s. Unlike Frist, a surgeon, McConnell and Reid are veteran practitioners of the Senate's opaque, clubby brand of politics, with no apparent desire to become president or grab television time to espouse their parties' goals.

Yesterday, McConnell said he and Reid "have a good relationship" and talk practically every day that the Senate is in session. He said that he and the new majority leader are determined to avoid legislative gridlock in the coming Congress.

In a wide-ranging session, McConnell said that although a majority of voters voiced their discontent with the administration's Iraq war policies, he doubts the Democrats can muster support for a resolution setting a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said that Republicans would back a boost in the minimum wage, but that it would have to be linked to a GOP priority, such as a tax cut for small businesses to ease the impact.

For Fiscal Conservatives, Losing May Be Liberating (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

All Republicans had a lousy November. For fiscal conservatives, the gloom only started on Election Day, when the GOP lost control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0099399

Conservative candidates suffered humiliating losses in the House GOP leadership elections. Democrats threatened to govern from the center, turning conservatives into a minority of the minority. Milton Friedman, the patron saint of free-market economics, died on Nov. 16. Just yesterday, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) declared to the New York Daily News editorial board that "Reaganomics is dead."

But does that make the glass half empty, or half full?

In Congress, the minority life is mostly talk and little action, and yet for advocates of minimal spending and low taxes, that may not turn out to be so bad. It's easier to promote fiscal discipline in theory than to practice it as a party leader or committee chairman. Remember that $200 million-plus "Bridge to Nowhere" in Alaska? It still makes conservatives cringe.

"Now that Republicans are in the opposition, they're going to be the most saintly budget hawks you can imagine," said American Enterprise Institute economist Kevin A. Hassett. With the absence of power, he notes, comes the absence of accountability and blame. As Hassett put it, "being in the minority means never having to say you're sorry."

Fiscal conservatives started to agitate days after the election, when the Republican-led 109th Congress reconvened to wrap up unfinished business. At the top of the to-do list: nine remaining spending bills for the fiscal year that started Oct. 1.

Few Republicans returned to Washington expecting to complete all the outstanding bills. But many wanted to pass at least a few, if only to show that the GOP wasn't abrogating its governing duties. But several fiscal conservatives in the Senate saw an opportunity to take a stand against "earmarks," the special projects that members from both parties had tucked inside the bills. The rebels announced their intention to block all spending bills from advancing -- even one that financed veterans benefits and military housing.

"We need to examine the bills in the light of the last election, in which I think the American people were unhappy with our spending habits," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) explained to reporters. He and his allies, including Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), want Congress to pass a "continuing resolution" to extend funding from the previous fiscal year. "We'd save the taxpayers a lot of money," Sessions said.

Their quest has reinvigorated fiscal conservative groups such as the Club for Growth, which suffered several major election defeats this year. "The Senate showdown on earmarks is next week," the club's blog reported yesterday. "The good guys, Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, are battling the appropriators and the big spenders." The article warned, though, that the continuing resolution "isn't a done deal."

A chief target of the budget hawks is a group of Democratic House freshmen who won seats in conservative districts, including the Florida seat that was held by disgraced Rep. Mark Foley, and Tom DeLay's former seat in Texas. Republicans call these "rented seats" and hope to win them back in 2008.

"Democrats aren't going to want to make massive cuts," said Stuart Roy, a longtime senior Republican House aide who works as a public-affairs consultant. Back in the GOP-minority days of the 1980s, House Republicans sought to force Democrats to vote against small spending reductions, often fractions of a percent. But as Roy pointed out, these little-noticed maneuvers helped Republicans build a case that Democrats' spending habits had spiraled out of control.

"Spending cuts resonate in a macro sense, especially if you can show they are tied specifically to waste," he said.

The trick, Roy added, is to avoid programs that happen to be popular, such as public television funding. "There will be a substantial number of people who will want to go out and do that." That impulse should be resisted: "This is not a governing strategy, it is a minority strategy."

Another enticing realm is taxes. In the 110th Congress, fiscal conservatives will act as chief defenders of the numerous temporary tax cuts that Republicans have passed since President Bush took office. Breaks that benefit wealthy individuals are particularly unpopular with Democrats, but particularly cherished by fiscal conservatives, who believe low tax rates at the top of the economic ladder fuel growth.

The first showdown will come over the alternative minimum tax, which Democrats have vowed to address early in their tenure. Adjusting the tax so that it will not envelop another 20 million or so middle-class families will cost $50 billion-plus per year, official estimates show. The incoming House Ways and Means chairman, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), has vowed to pay for the fix, but that could be politically difficult.

"Rangel is going to need a really large tax increase to keep his promise," wrote Bruce Bartlett, a conservative economist, anticipating the Democratic dilemma with glee.

GOP's Bleak Retreat Into The Minority (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) expressed astonishment during a recent meeting of conservative lawmakers that Republicans would soon lose the room where members hold their regular Bible study, an aide present said.

On a similar note, Republicans across Capitol Hill have been forced to confront the unwelcome presence of Democrats touring their offices to map out arrangements for the coming Congress.

The Republican retreat from ornate leadership chambers and spacious committee offices has been a harsh awakening for members of the outgoing majority, but that is just one of the many difficult realities GOP members and staff must accept about life in the minority.

Still stinging from their midterm defeat, leaders in the House must rewrite the party's internal rules to adapt to their diminished status and reorganize the Steering Committee to decide who will serve on each committee and who will be the ranking Republican before slinking off to the offices allocated to them by Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

A small group of leadership aides in the offices of outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), incoming Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and outgoing Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) are leading that effort, but none of the major decisions is expected to be announced until early next week. Those aides are meeting throughout the week, leadership staff said.

The challenge for Boehner will be incorporating those Republicans left alienated by the results of leadership contests earlier this month while he secures his grip on GOP lawmakers in the House, aides said in the wake of those leadership elections.

A major fight is brewing among conservatives in the House to elect the next chairman of the Republican Study Committee.

Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) have been calling members of the increasingly influential committee to ask for their support in the election next Wednesday.

Conservatives were among the most affected by the results of the leadership contests, in which a slate of familiar faces convincingly defeated a handful of outspoken challengers, including Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the outgoing RSC chairman, and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), another staunch conservative. These candidates ran on a message of change following the midterm defeat but were rebuffed by their colleagues.

Shadegg, who lost his bid to oust Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) as whip, said one of the reasons members did not answer his call for change was because so many had just survived similar campaigns for change in their own reelection fights.

"I don't think they've had enough time to decide what the election means," Shadegg said moments after leaving the leadership race.

Hensarling has been an outspoken ally of Pence, who suffered a landslide defeat to Boehner in the leader's race. Pence and Hensarling led a small band of upstarts who, over the past two years, have waged public battles with the leadership over revised budget rules and federal funding for the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast. The Texas Republican also backed Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) in his confrontation with appropriators last summer over earmarks included in spending bills that reached the House floor.

Many staffers consider Tiahrt, an appropriator, as the leadership-backed candidate who would mute the influence of conservative agitators as Republicans try to unite in the minority.

"It's an effort to neuter the RSC," one aide said. "It's an effort to split the powerbase."

Tiahrt spokesman Chuck Knapp said his boss met with the group's three remaining founders because members asked him to run and that the Kansas Republican has not had any conversations with Boehner or his staff about chairing the RSC.

Hensarling, Tiahrt and Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), who would also like to be considered, met with the founders before Thanksgiving. In the past, those founders have nominated each incoming chairman, but leaders of the committee changed the rules under Pence to create the Steering Committee and to allow non-founders to nominate members before the vote.

The remaining founders — Johnson and Reps. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) and John Doolittle (R-Calif.) — were expected to nominate Tiahrt, aides said before the holiday break, but that seems less certain this week, some of the same aides now say.

The founders are discussing options and could make an announcement before members return to Washington, aides said yesterday.

Retiring Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.) also plays an uncertain role in the nominating process because he will not be a member in the next Congress, but he has met with each of the candidates, aides said.

Knapp said his boss would "proudly accept" the founders' nomination but would not seek it on the floor if those lawmakers select someone else.

"There has been a process in place, and he is one to respect that process," Knapp said.

Rep. Tom Feeney's (R-Fla.) office distributed a "dear colleague" letter on behalf of Hensarling to members of the committee yesterday. Reps. Gresham Barrett (R-S.C.), Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Kevin Brady (R-Texas) and Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) joined Feeney, Flake, Pence and Shadegg on the letter.

"He's been very encouraged by the support he has received over the phone," Hensarling spokesman Brad Dayspring said.

One question heading into the race is how many members of the committee will vote. The official number hovers somewhere above 100, but only 40 to 50 members attend most meetings, with 80 to 90 attending some of the biggest.

There is grumbling that some members may leave the RSC if Tiahrt wins, creating an early divide among Republicans in the minority. Shadegg created similar grumbling before the 109th Congress until Pence was named chairman.

Other members are seeking colleagues' support for an impending decision by the soon-to-be-reconfigured Steering Committee about who will serve as the ranking Republican on the various committees.

Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.), for example, circulated a "dear colleague" to members of the Steering Committee highlighting his legislative accomplishments since 1993 and his television appearances during the last year in his own bid to be the ranking Republican on the International Relations Committee.

The Steering Committee is expected to look similar to the structure under Hastert, with leaders, regional reps and class reps expected to have one vote with Boehner holding more sway, aides said this week. Outgoing Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) will not have a vote because he is retiring from Congress, and many of the current leaders were replaced in the elections before Thanksgiving.

Senators Back More Funds For Social Security Administration (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

With spending bills apparently stalled, 54 senators have sent an appeal to the Senate leadership asking that the Social Security Administration receive adequate funding to avert workplace disruptions.

The senators -- 42 Democrats and 12 Republicans -- called for a fiscal 2007 appropriation that would add $401 million to the agency's administrative account. Without the money, Social Security would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices for 10 days next year, the senators said.

"A furlough of this scope and magnitude will create a significant hardship on the elderly and disabled persons who depend heavily on field office staff resources -- particularly those in rural areas who must travel long distances to access services," the senators said in a letter to Senate Republican and Democratic leaders.

Fears of the lack of spending bills -- or what those spending bills might bring -- are hitting other agencies. Except for the Defense and Homeland Security departments, Congress has not enacted the regular spending bills for the government, and some agencies are worrying about being caught in a pinch. Until budgets are settled, for example, the Energy Department has suspended employee bonuses, and the Labor Department has adopted a "soft freeze" on hiring.

Since Oct. 1, the agencies have operated under continuing resolutions -- interim funding bills known as CRs. They finance operations at the lowest of three possible levels -- the 2006 budget, the Senate's 2007 proposed budget or the House's version for 2007. Congress returns next week for what some Capitol Hill aides think will be a short legislative session, and it's likely that Congress will again put off budget decisions until next year. In that event, Hill aides predict, some small agencies could be at risk of layoffs or short-term layoffs, called furloughs.

The Food Safety and Inspection Service, for example, has no plans for furloughs, but more than 80 percent of its budget goes toward salaries and benefits. "When an agency has that large of a percentage going to salaries, and if there are salary increases that take effect in January, it will be difficult to make up the increase out of program costs," said Steven Cohen, senior press officer at the agency.

The Veterans Affairs Department has been counting on a $2.8 billion increase for veterans' health care in fiscal 2007. "Operating under a long-term continuing resolution will, before long, adversely affect the timely delivery of care and the effective and efficient management of the department," said Lisette Mondello, the department's assistant secretary for public and intergovernmental affairs.

The White House's Office of Management and Budget hopes to work with Congress on a solution that avoids staffing problems. "There is currently language in the existing CR that prevents furloughs, and we expect the next CR to address reductions in force," said Christin Baker, OMB associate director for communications. "If the government continues to operate under a long-term CR, we will work closely with agencies and lawmakers to ensure there are no major disruptions to essential government services."

Concern about the plight of Social Security has been mounting since mid-September, in part because it provides benefits to nearly 49 million Americans.

The Senate's bill for Social Security would provide $9.1 billion for the agency's administrative expenses, $401 million less than the president requested and $54 million below what was appropriated in fiscal 2006. The House bill would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking.

Sens. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) organized the letter to Senate leadership. It pointed out that Social Security has been given additional work, such as handling the new Medicare prescription drug benefit, while coping with staffing shortages caused by previous budget shortfalls. New workloads and lack of staff "have slowed processing times for disability claims" and "lessened the quality of service" to the public, the letter said.

Asked about the letter, Social Security Commissioner Jo Anne B. Barnhart said she appreciated "the widespread bipartisan support for the president's budget request," which she said would allow the agency to provide "the public with the service they expect and deserve."

Jenny Manley, spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee, said the committee chairman, Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.), "is well aware of the needs of the Social Security Administration." Manley said: "Our preference would have been to address this in regular order and in an appropriations bill, but that does not seem to be in the cards at this point."

Bases Refuse Offering Of Nuns (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

AURORA, Colo. -- Three nuns were thwarted yesterday in their effort to pay their debt to society with food instead of cash when officials at two Colorado Air Force bases refused to accept their donations.

The Dominican sisters -- Carol Gilbert, Jackie Hudson and Ardeth Platte -- had collected thousands of cans of food in an effort to pay the military $3,082 in restitution for cutting through a chain-link fence at a Colorado missile silo in 2002.

The sisters, who each served jail time for the break-in, said they devised the plan because they could not in good conscience give money to the military. They are still awaiting court approval for their proposal.

But airmen at Buckley Air Force Base here turned away two pickup trucks loaded with thousands of cans of food yesterday, telling volunteer drivers that the facility had just received a large donation of food and had nowhere to store the nuns' delivery.

An hour later, officials at Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado Springs told volunteer Bill Sulzman that the facility couldn't accept a truckload of canned goods "because it was part of the restitution plan," he said.

Mr. Sulzman said he was surprised because he had coordinated the drop-off with a base sergeant.

He called the base's refusal "a political decision."

DOJ_NMG_0099403

"Clearly, the decision at Buckley got back to Petersen and canceled the deal here," said Mr. Sulzman, who works for Citizens for Peace in Space. "It was a case of the chain of command overruling a lower-level decision to give food to lower-income Air Force families."

He then dropped off the containers of baby food, coffee and peanut butter at the ecumenical food bank run by Colorado Springs churches. The canned goods intended for Buckley were donated to a Denver rescue mission.

The nuns called the military's reaction disappointing but not entirely unexpected. The U.S. attorney's office here has said the restitution should be paid in cash, not food, although U.S. District Court Judge Robert Blackburn will make the final decision.

The sisters could return to in prison if they refuse to comply with the restitution requirement.

"Any effort to collect food for those in need is a tremendous gesture," U.S. attorney's office spokesman Jeff Dorschner said. "But it is the government's continued position that food should not count toward restitution."

He noted that fixing the fence at the Weld County, Colo., missile silo was paid for with cash.

"Real money was used to repair the damage done by the sisters, and the taxpayers should be reimbursed with real money," Mr. Dorschner said.

Although the delivery didn't make it to its intended destination, the sisters argued that the canned food should count toward their restitution. As many as 30 percent of men who visit food banks are veterans, they said.

After the drop-offs, the sisters delivered a 19-page list of the donated canned goods to their probation officer.

"Some of this food will still get to people who are military veterans, and that's the best we can do," Sister Gilbert said.

Presidential Motorcades Can Be Dangerous (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - They look glamorous from the curb, exciting and powerful as they race through a city with lights flashing, sirens blaring and a very, very important person waving from inside an armored limousine.

But presidential motorcades can be dangerous. The most recent reminder: the death this week of a Honolulu motorcycle officer who was injured while escorting President Bush during a brief stop en route home from Asia.

Sure, the president is safe in his limousine - so safe that no one can remember a commander in chief buckling his seat belt.

But the rest of the entourage is at risk of accidents and injuries, and they happen more often than most people realize.

First are the motorcycle cops, usually local officers who block intersections along the route.

Once the motorcade passes them, they race ahead to block another intersection up the road. Rushing at speeds up to 85 miles per hour or more, even well-trained riders can have trouble on wet pavement or curves.

"You really get your adrenaline running. You're leaping from intersection to intersection, blocking traffic, and you're putting yourself in harm's way," said Jim Kelley, a retired Houston motorcycle officer who worked motorcades for presidents from Dwight Eisenhower through Gerald Ford.

"If it's raining, you've got to worry about the oil slicks. You've got to worry about railroad tracks. You're trained for it, but it's risky."

In Hawaii, Steve Favela, 30, suffered fatal injuries when he and two other officers crashed as the motorcade sped across Hickam Air Force Base on rain-slicked pavement. A fourth motorcycle officer suffered a broken wrist when he crashed while working a different Bush motorcade.

In New Mexico last February, a motorcycle cop was injured when he lost control and crashed into a wall while escorting a Bush motorcade on Interstate 25.

Another risk is the accordion effect, when the front of the motorcade slows or stops, and cars, vans and buses at the rear are following one another so closely and so fast - maybe 10 or 15 feet apart at speeds as high as 60 miles per hour - that they can't avoid a crash.

Last December, a Bush motorcade was two blocks from the White House when an ambulance crashed into a communications van, which in turn crashed into another van in front of it. There were no injuries.

Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce said the agency doesn't keep records of how many motorcades have involved accidents. "Thankfully, they usually don't include either fatalities or injuries," she said.

Still, they sometimes do.

In New Mexico in 1998, for example, two vans crashed into each other in a slow-moving motorcade carrying then-Vice President Al Gore down wet roads from the Albuquerque airport. That crash in turn caused three motorcycle cops to spin out, injuring all three officers.

In California in 1996, a bus at the end of a Bob Dole presidential campaign caravan had to slam on the brakes when the front end of the police-escorted motorcade slowed abruptly. NBC reporter Kelly O'Donnell flew through the aisle of the bus, suffering bruises and a broken clavicle when she landed.

Making matters even dicier, Secret Service agents drive only the "control package" or "secure package," consisting of the president's limo and a few vehicles in front of and behind him.

"Those guys are the best, finest, most well-trained drivers for that kind of circumstance in the world," said John Podesta, a White House chief of staff under Bill Clinton. "But that's only about eight vehicles."

The rest of the motorcade, which often numbers 20 or more vehicles - vans carrying local guests, White House aides and the news media - are driven by volunteers or locally hired drivers.

"You're at the mercy of volunteers," Podesta said.

The risks of motorcades aren't unique to the United States.

In Malaysia last year, a police officer crashed into a cow while escorting a sultan's motorcade. The police officer was injured. The cow died.

Bernanke: Economy Slowing As Expected (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, November 29, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday that risks from inflation or a worse-than-expected housing slump could further complicate things for an economy that already is in slowdown mode.

"The deceleration in economic activity currently under way appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned," Bernanke said in his most extensive comments on the economy since the summer. The slowdown in overall activity mostly reflects the housing slump, he said. As the economy cools, inflation also should continue to gradually ease over the next year or so, the Fed chief added.

Yet, "substantial uncertainties" surround the Fed's outlook, Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the National Italian American Foundation in New York.

The slowdown in the once sizzling housing market could turn out to be deeper than expected, putting an even greater drag on overall economic activity. Or, Bernanke surmised, economic growth could rebound more strongly than expected, which could lead to a flare-up in inflation.

"A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome," he said.

Overall inflation has showed signs of improving in recent months as once surging energy prices have calmed down. However, "core" prices - which exclude energy and food and are closely watched by the Fed - still remain "uncomfortably high," Bernanke said. Looking ahead, Bernanke said he expects those core prices to moderate gradually over the next year or so.

But he made clear the Fed will be keep a close eye on the matter, especially on labor costs, which can spark inflation if they grow rapidly.

Although the Federal Reserve has left interest rates alone since August, Bernanke repeated the central bank's interest in keeping open the possibility of a rate increase down the road, if such action would be needed to fend off inflation.

To thwart inflation, the Fed had hoisted interest rates 17 times since June 2004, its longest string of increases in its history. With the economy slowing, the Fed has stayed on the sidelines since August. Many economists believe the Fed will keep its finger on the interest rate pause button it meets next on Dec. 12, the last such session this year.

Bernanke's remarks followed a batch of mostly downbeat economic reports issued Tuesday.

Orders placed to U.S. factories for manufactured goods plunged in October by the largest amount in more than six years. The median price of an existing home sold last month dropped by a record amount. And, consumer confidence in the economy sank in November.

Economic growth during the July-to-September quarter slowed to a pace of just 1.6 percent, the most sluggish in more than three years. That mostly reflected the housing slump. Investment in home building was cut by the largest amount in 15 years.

"The slowing pace of residential construction is likely to be a drag on economic growth into next year," Bernanke predicted. Even though there are signs that the demand for homes is stabilizing, builders still need to work off a bloated inventory of unsold homes and that will take time and further adjustments, he said.

The Fed chief added that even with the drag on the economy from the housing slump and a struggling auto sector, the jobs climate is still fairly healthy.

The nation's unemployment rate sank to a five-year low of 4.4 percent in October and workers' wages grew solidly. Those factors should help cushion the blows to the economy from the housing slump, Bernanke said.

Bernanke: Inflation 'uncomfortably High' (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 29, 2006

The economy is growing at a "solid pace" outside of housing and manufacturing, but a key inflation measure remains "uncomfortably high," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday.

In a speech to the National Italian American Foundation in New York, Bernanke said it would be "especially troublesome" if price pressures don't moderate, as the Fed has forecast. He said the sputtering housing market will be a drag on growth into 2007, even if sales stay near the current pace. "Overall, the economy is likely to expand at a moderate pace going forward," Bernanke said, adding that growth should accelerate over the coming year.

Economists interpreted Bernanke's comments as a sign the central bank is not likely to cut interest rates anytime soon and could be forced to raise them in coming months to keep price pressures under control. Although the Fed does not directly set mortgage or other private-sector loan rates, its short-term rate target is used as a benchmark when banks price consumer and business loans.

"Whether further policy action against inflation (to raise rates) will be needed depends on the incoming data," Bernanke said, adding that the risks to the inflation forecast were "primarily to the upside."

To control inflation and remove excess economic stimulus, the Fed raised short-term interest rates from a low 1% to 5.25% from June 2004 to June 2006. Economists polled by USA TODAY in October predicted the Fed would start cutting rates next year.

Stephen Stanley of Greenwich Capital Markets said Bernanke's remarks made it clear the "two policy options in the near term" are to leave rates alone or raise them.

The National Association of Realtors on Tuesday said existing home sales unexpectedly ticked up in October, though annual prices fell for a third-consecutive month (story, above). Also, the government said orders for long-lasting durable goods plunged 8.3% in October, the biggest drop since July 2000.

Overall, the economy grew at a slow 1.6% annual pace in the third quarter, down from the 5.6% rate of the first. Core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy, is running 2.7% annually, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort zone.

While falling energy and housing prices have taken some of the edge off inflation, the Fed is watching wage growth and the tight labor market. Rising wages help workers but could breed growing inflation if companies pass on labor costs via higher prices. Also supporting growth: The auto sector may be firming, and consumer spending has held up.

Bernanke Warns Inflation Remains A Significant Risk (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

In a contrast with the widely held view on Wall Street that slower economic growth will lead to interest-rate cuts, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered an upbeat assessment of the nation's economy, warning that tight labor markets could put more pressure on wages and prices.

Many investors point to declining housing construction, mixed news on holiday sales and a tame reading on inflation as indications that the economy is weakening, inflation risks are fading and that the next move by the Fed will be to cut interest rates, perhaps as soon as next spring.

However, Mr. Bernanke's hawkish message suggests rate cuts are unlikely in the months to come.

In his first major speech on the economic outlook since his testimony to Congress in July, Mr. Bernanke said growth outside of housing and autos remains "solid," underlying inflation "uncomfortably high" and that the choice before the Fed is whether to raise rates, not whether to cut them. Since June, the central bank has held its target for short-term interest rates steady at 5.25%.

"A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome," Mr. Bernanke told the National Italian American Foundation in New York yesterday. "Whether further policy action against inflation will be required depends on the incoming data."

Stock and bond markets barely reacted -- underscoring how, in recent months, Fed officials and investors increasingly have seemed to be looking at two different economies.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 14.74 points yesterday to 12136.45, after falling 158 points in the previous session. (See related article7.)

Long-term bond yields, which fell yesterday morning on news of a surprisingly large drop in durable goods orders, retraced only a bit of that decline after Mr. Bernanke's speech. Long-term bond yields tend to rise on expectations of stronger growth, higher inflation and higher short-term interest rates.

Indeed, futures markets still see a high likelihood of a rate cut in the next six months. Long-term bond rates, at 4.51%, remain well below short-term rates, a relationship that in the past has often foreshadowed recession.

"Market participants are simply much more pessimistic...and, clearly, not easily convinced that the chairman's sanguine outlook is the most likely scenario," said Stephen Stanley, an economist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Whether the Fed's optimism or the market's pessimism will prove correct remains to be seen. However, as long as investor pessimism keeps long-term rates, including mortgage rates low, that provides support to the housing market and makes it less likely the Fed will have to cut rates.

Yesterday, Mr. Bernanke spotlighted the labor market as a potential source of inflation pressure. "It seems clear that labor costs...have been rising more quickly of late. Some part of this acceleration no doubt reflects the current tightness in labor markets," he said.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October, well below the 4.75% to 5% range Fed officials had projected in July.

Mr. Bernanke raised the possibility that corporations could absorb higher labor costs without raising prices by reducing their profit margins, which now are relatively wide. But "the more worrisome possibility is that tight product markets might allow firms to pass all, or part of, their higher labor costs through to prices, adding to inflation pressures."

Charles Plosser, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, reinforced the Fed's hawkish message yesterday in a speech at the University of Rochester in Rochester, N.Y. "There remains some risk that policy is not yet firm enough to ensure a return to price stability over a reasonable time horizon," he said.

Economists themselves are divided on the outlook for the economy, with some predicting that a housing-led slowdown will intensify and others saying that low unemployment rates and buoyant financial markets will fuel a pickup in economic activity.

Economic data released yesterday provided ammunition for both sides. In October, orders for durable goods -- big-ticket items, such as machine tools and dishwashers, designed to last three or more years -- fell 8.3% from September, fueled by a steep drop in commercial airplane orders, the Commerce Department said.

Orders for capital goods, excluding defense and aircraft products -- a barometer of business spending -- fell 5.1%, the first decrease in six months. That was led by a 25.6% plunge in orders for computers and related products. Economic consulting firm Global Insight attributed most of that drop to Microsoft Corp.'s planned launch of a new operating system next year, which is causing some potential buyers to delay purchases.

Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc., said the latest data suggest that capital spending "won't provide as big of a cushion" as expected for an economy that is being undercut by a struggling housing market.

Separately, the Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group in New York, reported that its consumer confidence index fell to 102.9 this month from 105.1 in October.

On the positive side, the National Association of Realtors said sales of previously owned homes in October rose 0.5% from September to an annual rate of 6.24 million, the first monthly rise since February. But the median home price fell to $221,000, down 3.5% from a year earlier. That was probably the largest such drop since World War II, said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist. However, the latest decline followed an unprecedented multiyear run-up in prices.

Mr. Lereah said sellers in many markets have been cutting prices and those reductions, coupled with relatively low mortgage rates, have helped spur more sales. He attributed part of the decline in median prices to the fact the homes in lower-priced markets like Texas accounted for a larger share of sales than a year ago.

While buyers are creeping back into the market, the inventory of homes for sale rose 1.9% in October to 3.85 million, or a 7.4-month supply.

Since July, the Fed's forecast has been for economic growth to slow to slightly less than its long-term trend rate, taking some of the pressure off existing labor and business capacity. It expects the slowdown, coupled with the indirect effects of the recent decline in energy prices, should nudge core inflation down.

Mr. Bernanke said yesterday that the economy was broadly following that forecast. "Outside of the housing and motor-vehicle sectors, economic activity has, on balance, been expanding at a solid pace," he said. Trends in core inflation, which excludes food and energy, are less worrisome than in the spring, though at 2.7% in October, the rate "remains uncomfortably high."

The biggest risk to growth, Mr. Bernanke said, is that "the correction in the housing market could turn out to be more severe and widespread."

"The rate of home-price appreciation has slowed significantly," and the overhang of unsold homes is likely even larger than official figures show, he said.

Yet the Fed is clearly gaining confidence that housing won't experience a hard landing. While home construction will probably fall further to bring supply back in line with demand, Mr. Bernanke said demand for homes appears to have stabilized, thanks to lower mortgage rates and home prices.

Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, made a similar observation yesterday to another New York audience, saying the worst of the housing adjustment was over. But he added that the decline in prices might yet make consumers feel poor enough to depress their spending.

Mr. Bernanke said there is "little evidence" that a weak housing market is "spilling over more broadly to consumer spending or aggregate employment." As long as that remains true, he said, growth could reaccelerate in such a way that the economy starts to overheat, generating inflation pressure.

Fed Chief Optimistic Of Soft Landing (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The nation's central bank is growing more confident that the U.S. economy will slow gradually in a way that should cause inflation to decline without tipping the nation into a recession, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

"Over the next year or so, the economy appears likely to expand at a moderate rate, close to or modestly below the economy's long-run sustainable pace," Bernanke told the National Italian American Foundation in New York, in his most extensive remarks on the economy since July. Inflation "is expected to slow gradually from its recent level."

The primary risk to the Fed's forecast is the possibility that a tight labor market could push inflation higher than expected, which could prompt the Fed to raise interest rates, Bernanke said, according to a text of his prepared remarks.

Inflation "has been somewhat better behaved of late" but also remains "uncomfortably high," he said.

Bernanke delivered his speech just a few hours after two economic reports fanned concerns that the economy might be weakening further. The reports showed that new orders for long-lasting durable goods, including automobiles and appliances, fell sharply in October and that consumer confidence dipped in November.

The economy expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the three months ended in September, down from a 2.6 percent pace in the three months ended in June.

Bernanke did not directly address yesterday's economic statistics nor did he discuss a recent fall in the value of the dollar that could have wide-ranging effects on U.S. companies and workers.

He said the economic slowdown "primarily reflects a cooling of the housing market." He struck an upbeat tone, however, saying, "to date, there is little evidence that the weakness in housing markets is spilling over more broadly to consumer spending" or the labor market.

Bernanke's comments reinforced financial-market expectations that Fed policymakers will leave their benchmark overnight interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent when they meet in two weeks and hold it steady in the months ahead.

"The Fed is firmly on hold," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist for PNC Financial Services Group. He said Bernanke's remarks show that the Fed thinks "the economy is not snowballing down a slope toward a hard landing or a recession. There are plenty of cushions along the way."

The slower pace of home construction "is likely to be a drag on economic growth into next year," Bernanke said. But he also pointed to signs that home sales may be stabilizing. Sales of new homes rose in August and September, and sales of previously owned homes rose in October. Mortgage applications have been increasing since July.

Bernanke said most of the economy outside of the housing market "appears to be expanding at a solid rate." Many factories are churning out more goods for export. U.S. businesses are spending more on non-residential construction, equipment and software.

And consumer spending has continued to rise, buoyed by low unemployment, rising wages and falling fuel prices.

Rather than sound concerned about a slowdown, Bernanke suggested it was just what the Fed expected when it raised interest rates steadily over two years through June to keep the economy from overheating and driving inflation higher.

Markets Uncertain Despite Fed Comments (FT)

By Our International Staff

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Financial markets remained gripped by uncertainty over the outlook for the dollar on Tuesday, even as Ben Bernanke appeared to head off talk of imminent US interest rate cuts by warning that inflation remained “uncomfortably high”.

The dollar strengthened briefly on the comments by the Federal Reserve chairman, but they failed to claim the markets, with currencies still volatile in later trading.

The euro hit a 20-month high against both the dollar and the yen, while the pound rose 0.5 per cent to $1.9480. That brought it close to peak of 1.9548 reached on December 2004, the highest level since sterling was ejected from Exchange Rate Mechanism in 1992.

Bonds were also unsettled, while equities slipped back in early trading, and the cost of buying insurance against credit risk increased.

Speaking in New York, Mr Bernanke reassured investors that the outlook for the US economy remained fair, and the slowdown to more moderate growth was proceeding largely as expected.

He said incoming data would determine “whether further policy action against inflation will be required”.

DOJ_NMG_0099409

The speech follows days of jitters in financial markets, with investors betting that US economic weakness would force the Fed to cut interest rates next year, undermining the dollar.

Earlier in the day, fresh US data showed house sales inching up, but prices falling on one measure, with confidence weaker and a significant drop in durable goods orders.

While investors have been troubled by recent US data, however, Mr Bernanke said the slowdown "appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisaged in the Federal Reserve's July report".

His message was reinforced by Hank Paulson, US Treasury Secretary, who told reporters in London the US economy was making a "successful transition" to a more sustainable rate of growth, and by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which said the outlook for the world economy remained bright.

Releasing its twice-yearly outlook, the OECD said it saw signs of a smooth rebalancing of global economic growth, with faster growth in Europe offsetting much of the slowdown in the US.

Jean-Philippe Cotis, the OECD's chief economist, said there were signs that the growth of global trade imbalances had now stopped, raising the chances of a benign outcome.

Attributing the recent fall in the dollar to signs of economic strength in Europe and elsewhere, he added: "Even a smooth adjustment of imbalances has to start somewhere...we are not yet in a position where the depreciation of the dollar suggests people are fleeing the US."

Blue Chips Stage A Slight Recovery Despite Glum Signals On Interest Rates (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Stocks edged higher despite troubling comments about interest rates from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke.

The gains erased little of Monday's steep market drop, which included a 158.46-point decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. After sliding further in early trading, the blue-chip average ended the day up 14.74 points, or 0.1%, at 12136.45, 13.2% higher for the year. Among the Dow's strongest components was Exxon Mobil Corp., which rose 2.3%, helped by the second consecutive rise in crude-oil prices.

Forecasts of colder weather in the Northeastern U.S. and continuing supply worries drove crude futures contracts for January delivery up 67 cents, or 1.1%, to $60.99 a barrel, now off just 0.1% for the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also opened the session lower but climbed 4.82 points for the day to end at 1386.72, up 11.1% for the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.69 points to 2412.61, up 9.4% for the year. Both were up 0.3% for the day.

In a speech to the National Italian American Foundation in New York, Mr. Bernanke said that inflation remains "uncomfortably high" and that the main decision facing the central bank is whether to raise interest rates to keep the economy in check, not whether to cut rates to stimulate further growth.

Wall Street likes low interest rates because cheap borrowing costs encourage spending by businesses and consumers.

Tobias Levkovich, chief U.S. equity strategist at Citigroup, said Mr. Bernanke's comments probably disappointed investors who had been hoping for a Fed cut sooner rather than later, perhaps early in 2007. On the other hand, he said the speech and recent data released by the government signal that Wall Street's hopes for a gradual slowdown in economic growth are coming true.

"The economy hasn't collapsed," Mr. Levkovich said. "Housing prices are off, but that hasn't really hurt the consumer. Employment is still solid, consumers have income and they're spending it."

Housing data released yesterday by the National Association of Realtors showed an increase in the number of new homes sold in October, but a steep drop in home prices. The median new-home price fell 3.5% from the year-earlier period, to $221,000, a record-setting third straight decline in that measure.

With the holiday shopping season in full swing, many analysts are watching closely for any sign that consumers might curtail their spending. In a glum development along those lines, the Conference Board reported that its consumer confidence index slipped to 102.9 in November, worse than analysts had expected.

For the Dow, the rise yesterday halted two consecutive days of declines, and the average now is 206.11 points below its record close, established less than two weeks ago, on Nov. 17.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, declined 0.3%, or 0.7 point, to 231.45.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.65 billion shares, as 2,144 stocks advanced and 1,173 fell.

Bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 8/32 point, or $2.50 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.505%. The 30-year bond rose 10/32 to yield 4.594%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose slightly to 116.09 yen, compared with 116.08 yen. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.3198, compared with $1.3126.

Existing-Home Sales Climb, But Prices Show Record Drop (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

New data offered a mixed picture of the housing sector's condition as home sales picked up, but prices fell. Meanwhile, the first look at business investment in the fourth quarter revealed a sharp pullback, indicating that business spending won't lend as much support to economic growth as some analysts had been expecting.

The National Association of Realtors reported that previously owned home sales rose 0.5% from the previous month to a seasonably adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million units, which is up from an upwardly revised September sales pace of 6.21 million.

It's the first monthly rise in sales that the trade group has reported in eight months. But the national median home price plummeted 3.5% to $221,000 from a year ago -- the largest year-over-year price drop since the trade group began keeping records in 1968, and "it's probably the largest price drop since World War II," said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist. It follows a 2.2% price decline in September and a 1.7% drop in August.

Mr. Lereah said sellers in many markets have been cutting prices and that, coupled with relatively low mortgage rates, have helped spur more sales. But he also attributed part of the median price decline to the fact that there were a greater number of lower priced homes and fewer high priced homes sold in October than a year ago. He said sales in markets such as Texas, where home prices are lower than many U.S. markets, were fairly strong in October. That strength contributed to the overall mix of more lower-priced homes selling.

Mr. Lereah also said prospective buyers of high-priced homes in once hot markets are more likely to wait to buy in anticipation of further price declines than first-time buyers who may be buying a home because of a job change.

While the slight uptick in sales suggests buyers are creeping back into the market, the inventory of unsold homes remains relatively high. Total housing inventory rose 1.9% in October from the previous month to 3.85 million existing homes for sale, which represents a 7.4 month supply at the current sales pace. Economists said that weak condominium and co-op sales -- which declined 4.8 % in October from the previous month-- weighed heavily on the overall housing market. By comparison, single family home sales -- which make up the bulk of housing sales -- rose 1.3% in October.

While the improved sales pace could help prevent job losses in industries heavily tied to housing, such as furniture and mortgages, Mr. Lereah said "the wealth effect of housing right now is certainly turning negative," because of the price declines.

Decline in Durable Goods

Durable-goods orders fell 8.3% last month to a seasonally adjusted $209.97 billion, reflecting a steep drop in commercial airplane orders, the Commerce Department said Tuesday. That was the sharpest drop since July 2000. Moreover, "core" orders of capital goods, a barometer of business spending that excludes defense and aircraft products, fell for the first time in six months, underscoring widespread weakness. New orders for core goods fell 5.1% in October, as orders for computers and related products plunged 25.6% last month. Core orders had risen by a monthly average of 1.1% in the nine months through September.

Economists at consulting firm Global Insight said computer orders likely dropped sharply because Microsoft Corp. is introducing a new computer operating system in 2007, which may have caused companies to delay computer purchases. Meanwhile, orders for communications equipment and fabricated metals also fell last month.

Yesterday's report surprised analysts, who had been expecting business spending on core goods to continue growing at a steady pace, a development that has helped the economy soften the blow of this year's housing industry contraction.

Business orders last month were "far, far weaker than expected" said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc. The report suggests that capital spending will weaken in the current quarter and that "it won't provide as big of a cushion" for an economy being undercut by a struggling housing market, he said.

Following yesterday's report, Mr. Hoffman lowered his forecast for economic growth in the fourth quarter to 2.25%, on an annualized basis, from roughly 2.5%. Last week, many other forecasters lowered their estimates of fourth-quarter growth after the Commerce Department reported that construction of new homes slid to a six-year low in October.

Separately, The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, reported that its consumer confidence index fell to a reading of 102.9 this month [Nov] from 105.1 in October.

Home Prices Fell At Record Pace In October (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

U.S. existing home prices dropped a record 3.5 percent last month, compared with the same month a year earlier, while the total number of residences sold fell 11.5 percent compared with October 2005, according to an industry report released yesterday.

Nationwide, the median price of a single-family home, condominium or cooperative apartment dropped to $221,000 last month from $229,000 in October 2005, according to a report by the National Association of Realtors, a trade group representing U.S. real estate agents. The median is the point at which half the homes sell for more and half for less.

The largest drop in sales prices -- 7 percent, or double the national average -- came in the South, which includes the Washington area.

In a rare piece of good news for the beleaguered U.S. real estate industry, however, sales of existing homes rose 0.5 percent from September to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million in October, the first monthly increase since February, the report said.

Pat Vredevoogd Combs, president of the Realtors' group, attributed the October uptick in sales volume to "sellers cutting their price enough to encourage sales."

By region, home sales rose 6.4 percent in the West; were flat in the Midwest; fell 2.9 percent in the Northeast; and declined 1.2 percent in the South, according to the trade group's report.

David Lereah, the group's chief economist, predicted a sales rebound during the first three months of next year.

"The demographics of our growing population, historically low and declining mortgage interest rates, and healthy job creation mean the wherewithal is there to buy homes in most of the country, but many buyers remain on the sidelines," Lereah said in a statement. "After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007."

Lereah also predicted home-sale prices will experience "modest appreciation" in the early spring.

Other reports have noted some variation in sales volume and prices around the region. Prices have dipped more in Northern Virginia and the District than in much of Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0099412

While median home prices rose 6.7 percent in Prince George's County, 1.95 percent in Anne Arundel County and 0.70 percent in Montgomery County over the past year, they fell 6.4 percent in Northern Virginia, 11.8 percent in the District and 10.8 percent in Loudoun County, according to the Metropolitan Regional Information Systems, the region's multiple listing service.

Prices Of Existing Homes Plummet (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Prices of existing homes — which fell a record 3.5% last month — will likely drop further through year's end, delivering the bitter medicine needed to restore the health of the housing market, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday.

The median price fell in October for a third-consecutive month, to $221,000, as sellers were forced to cut prices. Those price drops, coupled with a dip in mortgage rates, seem to be reviving sales. Existing home sales ended a six-month losing streak in October, unexpectedly inching up 0.5%.

Prices still have further to fall, says David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. But, he notes, the faster they fall, the faster the correction in the home market will end. “The correction is working, and sales are stabilizing,” Lereah says. “That's good news for the economy.”

In the meantime, buyers in many areas continue to enjoy an advantage. They have an ample 7.4-month supply of homes to choose from, and, “Sellers will have to overcome their state of denial and start dropping prices even more to clear this market,” says Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors. “And once that happens, we will then have to convince buyers that prices have stopped falling. We are a long way from that point.”

Fear of falling prices keeps Christopher Robinette awake at night. Robinette, a 25-year-old engineer, wants to buy his first house in Reno but frets: “I don't want to buy and have the value of the house go down and then try to sell it at a loss. I have a job where I have the potential to move, and the value of homes is unstable at this point, and that makes me hesitant.”

The median price for an existing single-family home in October was $221,300, down 3.4% from October last year. Sales of existing single-family homes rose 1.3% from September, though they were down 11% from October last year. Condo owners felt even more pain. The median price skidded 5.3% to $214,300. Sales fell 4.8% from September and 14.5% from 2005.

Today, the Commerce Department will release October sales figures for new homes. Those figures are expected to show more weakness.

Hardest hit last month were homeowners in the South, where the median price plunged 7% to $185,000 from a spike in October 2005. Sales in the South were down nearly 9% from a year ago. A big drag on the region: sales in Florida, which tumbled 22%.

One surprise was in the West, where prices were nearly flat at $340,000, despite chronic affordability problems for the working class. Sales actually rose 6.4% from September to October. California's median price, the highest in the nation, gained 2% to a wallet-draining $548,680 in October from October last year.

“I am so confused about California,” Lereah says. “You really expect California to have a big price correction. And that's not happening.”

Existing Home Prices Tumble Despite Sales Uptick (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Nationwide existing home sales rebounded last month but the median sales price took its biggest year-over-year decline in nearly four decades, according to real estate figures released today.

In California, October results were the opposite, with sales, excluding condominiums, slipping 0.3% from the previous month and the median sales price gaining 2% from October 2005 to $548,680, according to the California Assn. of Realtors.

Nationally, sales of existing homes, including condos, rose 0.5% in October from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted, annual rate of 6.24 million units, according to the National Assn. of Realtors. It was the first monthly increase since February.

However, the sales pace remained below last year's level and prices also tumbled for the third consecutive month. In October, the median price fell 3.5% from the same month last year to $221,000, according to NAR.

The median is a typical market price, where half of the homes sold for more and half sold for less.

The modest rebound in sales may indicate that the nationwide housing slow down might be bottoming out — but any noticeable relief for sellers probably won't come until next year, according to some housing observers.

"After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007," NAR economist David Lereah said in a statement. "The annual decline in the October median home price is skewed because there was an uncharacteristic spike in October 2005, but the trend for the fourth quarter will be prices remaining slightly below a year ago. Overall prices are projected to see modest appreciation around early spring."

But other economists say a turnaround is still far away, with many signs pointing to a buyer's market for some time to come. For example, the inventory of unsold homes, increased 1.9% in October to 3.85 million existing homes.

"There is little chance of significant near-term relief, and we expect prices to continue falling at an accelerating rate for both single family and condo homes," said Ian Shepherdson, an economist with High Frequency Economics.

In California, it took significantly longer to sell a home compared to a year ago, when sales were near record highs. Last month, the median number of days it took to sell a single-family home was 57, up from a revised 34 from a year ago.

Officials with the California Assn. of Realtors were also cautious about the outlook.

"While it appears that home sales have stabilized over the past three months, it's too soon to say whether or not the market has bottomed out," CAR President Colleen Badagliacco said in a statement. "We do expect smaller year-over-year declines in home sales for the remainder of the year.

On a regional basis, the West reported the strongest results, with existing-home sales in October rising 6.4% from the previous month. The median price, however, sank 0.6% from October 2005 to $340,000. The California Assn. of Realtors was scheduled to release statewide figures later today.

In other economic news today, new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said that a slow down in economic activity is taking place as expected but warned of economic "uncertainties."

"The deceleration in economic activity currently underway appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned," Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the National Italian American Foundation in New York.

Yet, "substantial uncertainties" still cloud the economic outlook, Bernanke said in an account by the Associated Press. "A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome."

In a separate announcement, the Commerce Department said today that orders for durable goods fell by a larger than expected 8.3% in October from the previous month as demand for such items as commercial aircraft and computers waned.

Dollar At 20-Month Low Vs. The Euro (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 28 -- The U.S. dollar fell to a 20-month low against the euro Tuesday, the latest development in a year-long currency readjustment that could make some imported goods more expensive, but could also help American workers by boosting exports.

Traders are not entirely sure why the currency is falling, but several pointed Tuesday to signs of economic weakness in the United States and strength in Europe. That is fueling expectations that interest rates will rise in Europe relative to the United States, prompting investors to move assets out of dollars.

Many economists welcomed the decline. Despite six trading days of fairly sharp drops, they say, the dollar remains significantly overvalued against other currencies, making U.S.-made goods more expensive on world markets while encouraging imports.

That, combined with the willingness of U.S. consumers to continue spending despite rising debt, has helped to give the United States a trade deficit expected to reach $900 billion by the end of the year, according to the International Monetary Fund.

"The strength of the dollar has contributed to this historically high trade deficit," said William R. Cline, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in the District. "The dollar needs to fall, and that should be seen as a good sign, not a bad sign."

At the close of trading here Tuesday, one dollar was worth 0.758 euro, a drop of about 12 percent since December 2005. The rapid movement in recent days, though eliciting considerable attention from traders, has amounted to a drop of less than 3 percent. Economists say that is too small by itself to make much of a dent in the trade balance.

Moreover, changes in foreign exchange rates typically take from nine months to two years to be reflected in business and in the price of goods on shelves because orders and investment decisions are made months in advance.

"The movement so far is negligible," said Desmond Lachman, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. "That's going to do nothing in terms of adjusting the U.S. balance."

President's Bush's Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., reacted to the decline by speaking Tuesday of his support for a "strong dollar." That is a ritual that Treasury secretaries have followed for years -- they cannot welcome declines for fear of precipitating a rout of the currency. As he said the words, though, Paulson was preparing for a trip to China, during which he plans to press officials there to raise the value of China's currency, and thus lower the value of the dollar. Such a move would boost the U.S. competitive position in global trade.

U.S. manufacturers have complained that China keeps its currency too low on world markets, making Chinese goods artificially cheap and taking jobs from U.S. workers.

"China is the real problem," Lachman said. "That's where the real friction is going to occur."

In recent years, as the U.S. trade deficit has swelled and as fast-growing Asian countries -- not least, China -- have captured a greater share of commerce, economists have grown increasingly fretful about the imbalances imperiling the global economy.

According to economic textbooks, when a country runs a large trade deficit, its currency is supposed to feel downward pressure. The United States has defied this economic truism in recent years. China and Japan have plowed the spoils of their burgeoning exports into U.S. Treasury bills and other dollar-denominated investments, propping up the dollar, helping keep U.S. interest rates low and fueling consumer spending in this country. That has boosted imports from Asia, sending more dollars there and keeping the cycle going.

Economists assume the imbalances cannot last forever. China has amassed a pile of foreign exchange reserves exceeding $1 trillion. The U.S. current account deficit, which is calculated as the trade deficit plus capital transferred across borders and interest on investments, is expected to reach $870 billion by the end of the year, according to the IMF. That is about 7 percent of the total output of the U.S. economy.

The Bush administration asserts that this is an endorsement of the economy, with foreigners continuing to express confidence in the United States as a place to invest. Economists say that, one way or another, balance will be restored, with a significantly weaker U.S. dollar.

Kristin Forbes, a former U.S. Treasury official and now a business professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, estimated that the dollar would have to drop to 30 percent from 20 percent against major currencies to trim the current account deficit to 4 percent of the overall economy.

The key question is how and when the adjustment comes: Policymakers want an orderly and gradual decline in the dollar as opposed to a sudden collapse. The latter could jack up interest rates and send housing prices plummeting, while diminishing demand for the Asian exports that have propelled growth across the Pacific.

On Tuesday, economists said the dollar's recent drop against the euro looks more like the next phase of a gradual decline than the beginning of a disastrous unraveling. But much depends on the psychology of traders, particularly as there is talk that China and other countries are moving to diversify their holdings, putting some of their savings into currencies other than the dollar.

"There is a risk that if the financial markets feed on this, you could have quite a bit of turmoil," said Edwin M. Truman, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute.

Traders and analysts said the recent flight from the dollar largely reflects expectations that the U.S. economy will continue to grow more sluggishly than the global economy in the months ahead.

Investors' concerns about U.S. economic weakness were fanned Tuesday by reports showing that new orders for durable goods, such as automobiles and appliances, fell sharply in October, and that consumer confidence slipped lower in November.

Many investors think that the Federal Reserve will hold interest rates steady for a while and that it is likely to cut rates next year. In contrast, the European Central Bank appears likely to continue boosting interest rates in the 12-country zone that uses the euro currency, enhancing the return on investments in that region.

"That's definitely a key relationship," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Henderson reported from Washington. Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

The Devaluationists (WSJ)

The dollar's recent weakness against the euro and other currencies has brought out the usual suspects to blame the usual suspects. That is, the crowd that has long believed the greenback needs to be devalued because of the large U.S. trade defic it is declaring that day has finally arrived. The fact that the dollar has held up well for years despite the trade deficit doesn't seem to matter to this conventional wisdom.

Our view is simpler: When U.S. economic policies look like they might take a turn for the worse, dollar-denominated assets lose some of their allure. So, for example, when the new Democratic majority in Congress talks about raising taxes on capital gains and dividends, investors in U.S. financial and corporate assets get the jitters. And when U.S. monetary policy accommodates more inflation, investors also look for other places to put their marginal cash. Talk of a tax increase has certainly been in the news in recent weeks, and the jury is still out on the Federal Reserve's resolve to correct its inflationary easy-money blunder of 2003-2005.

On one issue we do agree with the trade-deficit devaluationists: The margin for error in American economic policy has been reduced. There are many more places, such as China and the former Eastern Europe, where high returns can be had. The euro has also emerged as a potential alternative as a reserve currency.

That's all the more reason for Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to say, as he did yesterday, that a strong dollar is "clearly in our nation's interest." Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke also sounded the right note in saying that inflation remains too high and the Fed will be vigilant in seeing it fall. The dollar's fate is very much in our own hands.

GOP Senatorial Committee In The Red (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 29, 2006

The Republicans' senatorial campaign arm, which lagged behind other national party committees in fundraising the past two years, emerged from the Nov. 7 election in debt and is soliciting donations to get out of the red.

In an urgent appeal to donors this week, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, beseeched contributors to "help us retire our debt."

"If we let this debt linger, it will cripple our efforts to recruit great candidates for the next election and begin our drive to win the one additional seat we need to regain the Senate majority," Dole wrote.

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the letter, which was confirmed by NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne. "We do have a debt, as Senator Dole noted," Ronayne said.

Ronayne would not divulge the amount of the debt. Party committees are required to file postelection financial reports with the Federal Election Commission on Dec. 7.

As of Oct. 18, the date of the last financial reports to the commission, the NRSC had $8.9 million of cash on hand. At that point in the two-year election cycle, it had raised $77.9 million and spent $70 million.

Of the six Republican and Democratic Party committees, however, the NRSC had been the least successful in raising contributions. Its Democratic counterpart, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, had raised $103.9 million by Oct.

DOJ_NMG_0099416

18. According to their financial reports, Democratic senators were far more generous in contributing to the DSCC than Republican senators were in giving to Dole's committee.

In her letter, Dole said she authorized the committee to go into debt to make a last-ditch effort to win close races.

The NRSC obtained significant help from the Republican National Committee, which in the final week of the campaign targeted Senate contests in Missouri and Tennessee. In that same week, the NRSC spent about $5 million in losing Republican efforts in New Jersey, Virginia, Montana, Maryland and Rhode Island.

Wulsin Concedes To Schmidt In Ohio (AP-Y)

AP, November 29, 2006

Three weeks after Election Day, Democrat Victoria Wulsin conceded to Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt on Tuesday but suggested that she might run again.

The Associated Press declared Schmidt the winner Nov. 21 after the first provisional ballot tallies were reported in the 2nd District, but Wulsin said then that she wanted to make sure all ballots were counted before conceding.

"I definitely want to try again," Wulsin said.

Wulsin conceded just before Clermont County reported final unofficial results that showed Schmidt with an overall total of 120,112 votes, or 50.5 percent, to 117,595 votes, or 49.5 percent for Wulsin.

"I've worked hard in Congress for the people of southern Ohio, and I look forward to continuing that work thanks to the confidence that the voters have shown in me," Schmidt said in a statement.

Schmidt, a backer of President Bush's Iraq policy, gained national attention in Congress last year with a verbal assault on the House floor against Rep. John Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and decorated Marine veteran who served in Vietnam. Of Murtha's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, Schmidt said: "Cowards cut and run. Marines never do." She later apologized.

Vote Disparity Still A Mystery In Fla. Election For Congress (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Nov. 28 -- Almost since the time the votes were tallied here on election night, the race for Florida's 13th Congressional District has been surrounded by a contentious mystery:

Why were there no votes for Congress recorded from more than 18,000 people who chose candidates in other races?

The answer is central not only to the outcome of the election, which for now has been won by Republican Vern Buchanan by a mere 369 votes and is in litigation, but also to the ongoing debates over whether the electronic voting systems in use nationwide can yield reliable tallies and recounts. Coincidentally, the latest dust-up has occurred in the contest for the seat being vacated by Katherine Harris, who presided over Florida's election apparatus during the much-disputed 2000 contest between President Bush and former vice president Al Gore.

So far, there are three theories, and lots of political and legal posturing.

Maybe, as scores of voters have claimed, there were glitches with the touch-screen systems and they dropped votes.

Or maybe voters overlooked the congressional race simply because of a confusing ballot design.

Or maybe, as some say, an astoundingly high number of Sarasota County residents decided to forgo voting in the high-profile race.

On Tuesday, as state election officials here ran a mock election to test the machines for defects, there were no clear answers. By evening, as clerical workers input votes, no major problems were reported with the machines, but the review will continue through the week.

"Our analysis of the results shows that something went very wrong," said Kendall Coffey, an attorney for Buchanan's challenger, Christine Jennings. He played down the significance of the tests, saying they did not faithfully replicate the voting because the state clerical workers were presumably more adept at the machinery than voters in general would be.

Hayden Dempsey, an attorney for Buchanan, said: "There is nothing wrong with the machines, as these tests show."

The essence of the dispute arises from the fact that once all the votes were counted in the Nov. 7 election, a troubling anomaly appeared in the tally.

DOJ_NMG_0099417

More than 18,000 people who had voted in other contests did not have selections recorded in the congressional race.

The phenomenon of voters casting ballots without making selections in every race is known as "undervoting," and it happens in virtually every big election, particularly in contests for lesser-known offices that some voters ignore.

But the magnitude of the undervoting in the Buchanan-Jennings race was startling -- about 15 percent of those who cast ballots in Sarasota. By contrast, it was about 2.5 percent among voters in other counties.

Jennings has filed a lawsuit alleging that thousands of Sarasota County votes were not counted because of "the pervasive malfunctioning of electronic voting machines." The county tilts in her favor.

The broken-machine theory is backed by two voting experts and scores of sworn statements from voters who had trouble with the machines, Coffey said. The Sarasota Herald-Tribune has reported that more than 100 have reported problems with the machines.

But other experts who have analyzed the ballots and the results argue that the culprit might be not the machines but rather voters confused by a poorly designed ballot.

The congressional race appeared on the same screen as the gubernatorial contest, which had a brighter banner and took up more space.

Ted Selker of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a director of the CalTech/MIT Voting Technology Project, said that tests in his lab have shown that as many as 60 percent of voters can miss races when they are displayed in such a manner.

If the missing votes were caused by ballot design, that is bad news for the challenger, because it is more difficult under Florida law to challenge an election because of ballot design or voter confusion.

Jennings's legal team has dismissed the idea of a bad ballot.

"I don't see any history to show that, with a highly visible, hotly contested race like this, voters are going to fail to find it on the ballot," Coffey said. "It's just not such an awful ballot design that you can explain the disappearance of 15 percent of the votes."

The final theory, that the missing votes reflect many voters' disgust with the aggressive campaigns, is largely dismissed by many experts. It seems extremely unlikely, they said, that only Sarasota County residents decided not to vote.

Like many here, Joan Tallman, 70, a retired bank vice president, said she was appalled and mystified by the trouble.

"Funky machines? I don't know," she said, shaking her head. "But a lot of those votes didn't count."

2008 Candidates Search Web For Next New Thing (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Former Sen. John Edwards's favorite books include "The Trial of Socrates," "God's Politics" and "Into Thin Air." His favorite musician is Bruce Springsteen. His heroes are his wife, Elizabeth, and the American people.

How did this information about a likely 2008 presidential candidate become public? Through MySpace.com, a networking website where Edwards (D-N.C.), like former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), has set up pages to tell people about himself. Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) has 6,000 friends on his page at Facebook.com. Visitors to those pages can join the candidates' "networks" and candidates can use the sites to communicate with narrow groups of likely voters.

Ret. Gen. Wesley Clark (D) has focused his efforts on podcasting, creating an audio message that his supporters can listen to at his website or download from Apple's iTunes. Clark has the second most listened-to podcast among likely 2008 contenders, after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), as measured by iTunes.

Seemingly overnight, the Internet has changed politics and the course of campaigns. The 30-second television advertisement has been a staple of campaigning for decades. But last summer, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) made YouTube a must-use campaign website. The site allows users to post and circulate video instantly, and Allen was caught on videotape calling S.R. Sidarth, a volunteer of Indian descent for Sen.-elect Jim Webb (D-Va.), "macaca," which was said to be a racial insult.

Candidates face a serious challenge from the new ways people gather information and news. Fewer people are watching network television or reading major newspapers, turning instead to the Internet. This trend has left candidates hustling to figure out how technology can help them communicate with a fragmented audience.

"The way to get it back is to develop a message and put it out across different channels," said Jerome Armstrong, a consultant to former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner's (D) political action committee, Move Forward Together. "Those are the two overriding big things out there. The key is having a message broadcast all in sync. I'm not sure how it's going to get done."

Armstrong and other technology-savvy aides said candidates must integrate all of the different messaging platforms — blogging, instant messaging, text-messaging, social networking — with a campaign's field and communications programs.

"It's not about technology. It's the principles behind the technology," said Peter Daou, a consultant to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). "What campaigns miss are the principles about how this bottom-up approach works."

"Having a MySpace profile is great, but it's kind of a like [having] a phone and voter file and not using them together," said Matt Burgess, an associate with the media-consulting firm of MacWilliams, Robinson & Partners.

Potential 2008 candidates have been searching for talented whiz kids who could thrive in both Silicon Valley and Capitol Hill.

Warner's hire of Armstrong, a cofounder of the liberal blog MyDD.com, created buzz in the mainstream media and blogosphere. President Clinton hosted a lunch in his Harlem office in September for bloggers. Several sources said that Nicco Mele, the CEO of EchoDitto, an internet strategy firm, and Howard Dean's webmaster when Dean was running for president in the 2004 cycle, has let it be known that he wants to work for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) if he runs for president.

Clark does not rely on consultants. His supporters have created pages at MySpace.com and Facebook.com, said Erik Mullen, Clark's spokesman.

The search for new organizing tools continues. One new fad, used by a handful of campaigns in 2006, is the use of technology that lets candidates create an incentive program for online supporters. New software would let campaigns measure a volunteer's level of activity and reward him or her with campaign paraphernalia.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), who defeated three candidates to win reelection, created the Perry Alliance Network, a system for online supporters to help the campaign and earn T-shirts and bumper stickers.

The Michigan Coalition for Progress, a liberal 527 group and a client of MacWilliams, Robinson & Partners, held a text-messaging contest and awarded two iPods to the winners.

Another new enthusiasm appears to be for "virtual campaigning" on websites such as Second Life, a virtual world with more than 1.6 million users where Warner first campaigned for and then later explained why he decided to drop out of the 2008 race.

Social networking sites carry some risks for candidates because political opponents can use material against them. Some candidates banned their 20-something-year-old aides from using MySpace or Facebook because they feared their opponents would use the content against them.

Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) said some Republican activists criticized him because his 20-year-old daughter's Facebook profile included a photo of her holding a beer.

Hagel's Moment? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

A month ago the idea that Sen. Chuck Hagel would make a serious run for the Republican presidential nomination would have been a non-starter. As an outspoken critic of President Bush on Iraq and other issues, Hagel's way was blocked. His best hope was nomination by a quixotic third party in an online convention.

It's a measure of the step change brought about by the Nov. 7 elections that Hagel is now seriously exploring a GOP presidential bid. The Republican blowout, he says, reflected a "breakdown of confidence and trust in governance" and opened the way for what he believes will be "the most wide-open presidential race since 1952." The Nebraska senator says he will make a formal decision in the next two months on whether to run.

What would make a Hagel candidacy interesting is that he can claim to have been right about Iraq and other key issues earlier than almost any national politician, Republican or Democratic. Though a Vietnam veteran and a hawk on many national security issues, he had prescient misgivings about the Iraq war -- and, more important, the political courage to express these doubts clearly, at a time when many politicians were running for cover.

Hagel warned about the dangers of invading Iraq in a Feb. 20, 2003, speech in Kansas. He noted that America stood "nearly alone" in advocating military force to disarm Iraq and cautioned against "a rush to war." Some of Hagel's premonitions were almost eerie: "What comes after Saddam Hussein? The uncertainties of a post-Saddam, post-conflict Middle East should give us pause, encourage prudence and force us to recognize the necessity of coalitions in seeing it through." He urged the Bush administration to transfer postwar oversight to the United Nations as soon as possible, and he admonished Iraq boosters to "put aside the mistaken delusion that democracy is just around the corner."

Hagel was also early to understand the importance of talking to Iran, another idea that has since become commonplace but at the time took political guts. In a July 10, 2003, speech on the Senate floor, he said that a direct U.S. dialogue with Tehran about the nuclear issue might be necessary. In a Nov. 15, 2005, speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, he was emphatic: "The fact that our two governments cannot -- or will not -- sit down to exchange views must end."

Such outspoken criticisms of Bush policies had put Hagel outside the respectable Republican perimeter -- until Election Day. Hagel delivered his own blunt postmortem in a Nov. 16 speech to a conservative political action committee, GOPAC. The message of the election, he said, "is the American people saying you failed." Republicans had become so focused on keeping power that "we came loose of our moorings."

Hagel went on to criticize his party's failings in language you rarely hear in the usual pre-masticated sound bites of today's politicians. On GOP ethics lapses: "When you blow past the ethical standards and you play on the edge of legality, you're in trouble." On Bush administration foreign policy: "You cannot have a foreign policy based on divine mission. We tried that in the Middle Ages, that's what the Crusades were about."

It strains credulity to imagine that a GOP controlled by Bush and Karl Rove could learn to love Hagel, but, as the Nebraskan says, this is a time of "transformational politics." A more practical problem is that if Hagel does decide to seek the nomination, he will be competing for the same niche as the GOP front-runner, Sen. John McCain, who has been on his "straight-talk express" longer than has Hagel. And although McCain's centrist halo has been tarnished by his efforts to woo the far right, he remains a far more polished speaker and campaigner than Hagel. But on Iraq, Hagel has a clearer stance than does McCain, whose call for a big increase in troops is out of step with both the recommendations of U.S. military commanders and the public mood.

Hagel likes to evoke the Republicanism of Dwight Eisenhower, another former military officer who could be devastating in his criticism of the policies advocated by the military-industrial complex. "This was a real Republican president," he told the GOPAC audience.

Will that pre-Reagan Revolution message play to the party faithful in Iowa and New Hampshire in 2008? Will the Bush administration's problems become so severe that Republicans would embrace a senator from the radical center? The very fact that Hagel is mulling a campaign reminds us that American politics turned a corner this month and that we are in new territory.

Women Want A Woman President (HILL)

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Almost a hundred years ago, Sigmund Freud famously asked, “What do women want?” In political terms, the answer is unmistakable: What women want is a woman president. And their voting preferences are showing how strongly they feel.

According to the Gallup Poll of November 9-12, both Democratic and Republican women disproportionately support their party’s potential female candidates. While it has not been unusual to see polls showing a bias by female voters in favor of women who run on the Democratic Party line, most of these surveys have failed to distinguish whether it is party or gender that is attracting female voters. And, until recently, Republican women have not shown a preference for a female candidate.

But the Gallup Poll tested Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a Democratic primary field and Condoleezza Rice in a Republican match-up. Among both sexes, Hillary ran first in her party with 31 percent of the vote, followed by newly hyped Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) at 19 percent, John Edwards, likely benefiting from his wife’s best-selling book, at 10 percent, Al Gore at 9 percent and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), probably suffering from his foot-in-mouth disease, back at 7 percent.

On the Republican side, Rudy Giuliani led with 28 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) at 26 percent, Rice at 13 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) at 7 percent, outgoing Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney at 5 percent and soon-to-be-former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) at 4 percent.

But since both fields are cluttered with possible non-candidates, the real relevance of this survey is to demonstrate the impact of a female candidate on voters of both parties.

Hillary was favored by 38 percent of the women in the Gallup Poll's Democratic Primary match-up but got only 23 percent of the men. On the Republican side, Rice won 18 percent of the women and only 8 percent of the men.

Such a dramatic gender gap, on each side of the partisan divide, illustrates the power of a woman candidate, from either party, running for president.

Remember that women are 52 percent of our population, 54 percent of the registered vote, and usually between 55 percent and 56 percent of actual turnout.

Indeed, so powerful is the female vote that it is credited with swinging two of our last three presidential elections. In 1996, it was the soccer moms who turned away from the abstract "family values" of the Republicans to embrace the more pragmatic and specific child- and education-focused programs of the Clinton administration. In 2004, these same moms, now designated "security moms," turned away from the bite-sized measures of the Democrats and voted for the tough anti-terrorist policies of George Bush.

Nineteen million single women voted in 2000 and 27 million came out in 2004. If a woman runs for president, it stands to reason that such turnout will rise still further. If single women vote in proportion to their share of the national population, they could account for 32 million votes in 2008. Since women who are either divorced, widowed, or never married voted Democratic by a two-to-one margin in 2004 and 2006, it is likely that this influx of single women will be crucial to Hillary's candidacy (or to Rice's if she decides to run).

In our male-dominated political world, where pundits speak mainly to one another and confirm each other's wisdom, we do not fully appreciate the power of a woman candidate. Single moms, disproportionately in poverty, burdened by the need for good daycare and schools, often rotting in minimum-wage jobs, are natural fodder for a woman Democrat who can identify with their plight and focus on their needs. The cultural outpouring that would likely greet the first woman to be nominated by a party to run for president would probably drive these women out in droves to vote and participate in the political process.

It could be that women get what they want in 2008.

Anti-Clinton Donor Reported As Donor To Giuliani As Well (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A leading organizer of a political action committee created to derail Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects is also a major contributor to Rudolph W. Giuliani, according to campaign finance reports.

The organizer, Richard Collins, a principal figure behind the group Stop Her Now, has given $10,000 to Mr. Giuliani's political action committee Solutions America over the last two years, according to campaign finance disclosure documents.

On a Web site postedMonday, the Stop Her Now group says that its goals include attempting "to shed light on the real Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America."

Mrs. Clinton's advisers predicted the group's efforts would fail. "As the last campaign demonstrated, attempts to throw around inaccurate, distorted charges about Hillary's record are not going to impress the public," said Ann Lewis, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Clinton, referring to her re-election victory earlier this month.

While the Giuliani camp has no direct connection to Stop Her Now, some Democrats argued yesterday that Mr. Giuliani — who seems poised for a possible presidential run of his own — should disavow the personal nature of the criticisms that the group is leveling at Mrs. Clinton.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, declined to comment.

Stop Her Now is among the newest of the so-called 527 advocacy groups whose prominence has grown in recent years. These partisan groups, known as 527s because of the tax code that governs them, have helped Democrats and Republicans raise enormous sums of money and energize their political bases.

The groups began playing a more prominent role in 2004 after new federal campaign finance laws prohibited major donors, unions and corporations from giving unlimited amounts of money to parties. Many of those donors, in turn, began contributing large sums of money to 527s instead.

In the case of Stop Her Now, Mr. Collins, a wealthy Texas businessman, funneled $80,000 into the group's coffers in the last few months, making him the group's single largest donor in the third quarter of 2006, according to the disclosure documents.

The group has struggled to raise money and gain attention since last year, when Arthur J. Finkelstein, a longtime Republican strategist, began lining up donors to help the committee wage a campaign against Mrs. Clinton's 2006 Senate re-election bid.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Collins, a Republican activist, said he hoped to line up "a couple of hundred thousand donors" to help finance his group in advance of a possible presidential run by Mrs. Clinton. He said Mr. Finkelstein was a close personal friend and described himself as the chairman of the Stop Her Now organization.

Second New Leader Resigns From The Christian Coalition (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

For the second time in little more than a year, the Christian Coalition of America named a new leader and then removed him before he ever fully took the reins of the conservative political advocacy group.

The Rev. Joel Hunter, pastor of a nondenominational megachurch in Longwood, Fla., said he resigned as the coalition's incoming president because its board of directors disagreed with his plan to broaden the organization's agenda. In addition to opposing abortion and same-sex marriage, Hunter, 58, wanted to take on such issues as poverty, global warming and HIV/AIDS.

"My position is, unless we are caring as much for the vulnerable outside the womb as inside the womb, we're not carrying out the full message of Jesus," he said in a telephone interview yesterday. "They began to think this might threaten their base or evaporate some of their support, and they said they just couldn't go there."

Roberta Combs, chairman of the coalition's four-member board, said that Hunter "is still a good friend" but that they agreed during a Nov. 21 conference call that "it would be best for everyone" if he did not become president.

The Christian Coalition announced Hunter's appointment in early October, and he was scheduled to take over day-to-day operations from Combs on Jan. 1. In the interim, his positions in favor of tackling global warming, increasing the minimum wage and opposing the death penalty were reported in The Washington Post and some other newspapers, causing unrest among the coalition's grass-roots supporters.

Four state chapters -- in Alabama, Georgia, Iowa and Ohio -- have broken away from the national organization in recent months, and some of the mutinous state leaders cited Hunter's pronouncements as a factor.

"We have been wanting to broaden our agenda for some time," Combs said. "But there's a way to do that. We wanted to survey our supporters first and make sure they're on board on new issues. Joel saw it differently -- he just wanted to go out and do it."

Founded in 1989 by the Rev. Pat Robertson, the Christian Coalition was once a powerhouse in domestic politics with a budget that reached $25 million a year in the mid-1990s. But since Ralph Reed left as its president in 1997, it has fallen on hard times, running up more than $2 million in debt, according to tax filings.

Hunter had offered to work for the coalition with no salary while remaining pastor of his Northland Church near Orlando. He said finances were not the reason for his early departure.

"I got a look at who they owed money to. It's sobering," he said. "But with the right leadership and the capability of rebuilding a grass-roots organization, it's not insurmountable. My church budget is $15 million a year. . . . It's not too intimidating for me to think I could have raised that kind of money."

According to some former officials of the Christian Coalition, the turmoil at the top reflects Combs's reluctance to yield control. In September 2005, she named Jason T. Christy as the coalition's executive director, a new position. Three weeks later, he resigned.

Christy, 36, owns a Scottsdale, Ariz., media company that publishes a daily Christian newsletter and a monthly magazine called the Church Report. He said yesterday that Combs had promised to step aside and let him run the Christian Coalition but that he quickly discovered she was "a micromanager" with "a narcissistic leadership style."

Christy added that his political views are far different from those of Hunter, author of a book called "Right Wing, Wrong Bird: Why the Tactics of the Religious Right Won't Fly With Most Conservative Christians."

"In terms of Hunter, they picked the wrong captain for the wrong ship," he said. "The title of his book alone tells me that they did not do their due diligence."

Hunter said he made clear from the moment that Combs approached him about the job in April that he wanted to pursue a broad agenda of "compassion issues."

"I hope we can break out of 'liberal' and 'conservative.' I'm not sure when compassion became fitted under 'liberal,' " he said. "There are many Christians, especially in their twenties and thirties, who don't care about liberal and conservative. They just see that if you're going to love your neighbor, you have to address things like the environment."

Initially, Hunter added, Combs "seemed to be interested" in his approach. "But I think it's very difficult once you have poured your life into an organization to transfer authority to someone else," he said.

Bush Wants More Countries In Visa-waiver Program (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 29, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday that he wants more countries in a program that allows foreigners to stay in the USA without visas, despite criticism that the move could open the door to terrorists.

“We want people to come to our country,” Bush said in Tallinn, Estonia, one of several European countries that have asked to be included in the visa-waiver program, in which 27 foreign countries now participate. “It's in our nation's interest that people be able to come and visit.”

Bush said his administration aims to add more countries to the program, created to facilitate tourism and business travel 15 years before the 9/11 attacks increased fears of terrorism. He pledged to ensure that “those that want to continue to kill Americans aren't able to exploit the system.”

Under the program, citizens from visa-waiver countries can travel to the USA for up to 90 days without a visa. To be eligible, countries must prove that only a small percentage of their citizens violate the terms of their visas and only a small percentage are rejected when they apply for them. Residents of waiver countries don't have to go through the time-consuming security interviews and checks required for those who must apply for visas.

Critics blasted Bush's plan as an expansion of a dangerous loophole in the nation's effort to secure its borders. Several terrorists — including shoe-bomber Richard Reid and 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui — boarded planes to the USA with passports from visa-waiver countries.

“That's a step in the wrong direction,” said Clark Kent Ervin, former inspector general at the Homeland Security Department. “We ought to be ending the visa-waiver program, not expanding it. There's a reason why terrorists are keen to obtain passports from visa-waiver countries: They don't have to undergo extensive security checks.”

In September, the Government Accountability Office found that “stolen passports from visa-waiver countries are prized travel documents among terrorists, criminals and immigration-law violators.”

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said any expansion of the program must include measures to make the USA safer. Among such measures would be a requirement that countries provide more information about airline passengers before takeoff so that U.S. officials would have more time to check their names against terrorist watch lists, he said. “I want a net increase in security,” Chertoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0099423

The travel industry backs Bush's plan. Rick Webster of the Travel Industry Association said, "The program is essential. It facilitates almost two-thirds of overseas travel. It's good for our economy and … our diplomatic efforts. The end of the program would mean tens of billions of dollars in lost revenue and a worsened U.S. image."

Visa Waivers May Be Offered To More Nations (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The Bush administration will ask Congress to change and expand a program that allows citizens of some countries to enter the United States without visas. In exchange, the U.S. government would require visitors to provide more data about themselves before they board planes.

During stops yesterday in Latvia and Estonia, President Bush told officials of those countries that he would try to persuade Congress to add countries to the visa waiver program.

In a statement, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that in addition to being expanded, the program should be changed to increase security. For example, participating nations would be asked to quickly provide information on lost or stolen passports.

Officials did not say which other countries the administration might try adding to the program. Countries from Central and Eastern Europe have expressed interest in entering the program, which lets travelers enter the United States with only a passport.

The visa waiver program was created in 1988 and was originally focused on preventing illegal immigration into the country. But since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the focus has shifted to security, and the program has been altered several times in hopes of strengthening the government's ability to detect and deter terrorists.

The program applies to citizens of 27 countries traveling to the United States for 90 days or less for tourism or business, said Homeland Security spokesman Jarrod Agen. About 15 million people visit the country under the program each year.

Bush Seeks To Ease Visa Requirement (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush said yesterday he will push Congress for a "loosening" of requirements for foreigners to visit the United States without a visa, pitting him against those who have called for the program instead to be tightened or even scrapped altogether after September 11.

The Visa Waiver Program allows visitors with valid passports from 27 approved countries to enter the United States for up to 90 days without a visa. That makes tourism and business travel easier by eliminating the need for a visa, though such travelers can avoid a security screening.

After meeting with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves in Tallinn, Mr. Bush said he will press Congress to revamp the program to allow more countries to join.

"I'm going to work with our Congress and our international partners to modify our Visa Waiver Program," Mr. Bush said. "It's a way to make sure that nations like Estonia qualify more quickly for the program and, at the same time, strengthen the program's security components."

But the proposed expansion would run athwart concerns that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) cannot keep up with the 27 countries already approved, as the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative branch, found in a July report.

"DHS cannot effectively monitor the law enforcement and security risks posed by visa waiver countries on a consistent, ongoing basis because it has not provided [the Office of International Enforcement] with adequate staffing and resources," GAO investigators concluded, adding they also found "weaknesses" in how DHS talks with overseas posts working on visa issues.

European Union officials have complained that while U.S. nationals can visit any of the 25 EU member states without a visa, only 15 of these countries receive reciprocal privileges from the United States. Mr. Bush discussed the problem with EU officials at a July summit in Vienna, Austria.

Exclusion from the waiver program is a point of contention in former communist bloc countries such as Estonia, Poland and Hungary that have become staunch U.S. allies in the war on terrorism.

Mr. Bush said the economic and political progress those nations have made earns them the privilege of participating in the program.

"Both the [Estonian] president and the prime minister made this a important part of our discussions," he said. "They made it clear to me that if we're an ally in NATO, people ought to be able to come to our country in a much easier fashion."

Mr. Bush said he wanted to "assure members of Congress that in loosening the visa-waiver issue, or changing the visa-waiver issue, that we'll still be able to protect our country from people who would exploit the Visa Waiver Program to come to our country to do harm."

Among the current requirements is that the visa-refusal rate from a country be below 3 percent and that they have a low rate of travelers who violate the 90-day limit.

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council, said Mr. Bush will ask Congress for the power to waive the 3 percent rule for some countries as long as those nations meet new enhanced security requirements.

The waiver program recently began requiring passports to include a machine-readable computer chip containing passport data as a security measure.

The GAO warned that tightening or ending the Visa Waiver Program could lead to other countries retaliating and requiring visas for U.S. visitors. But the investigators said the program has drawbacks because travelers from visa-waiver countries don't have to be screened as closely as other travelers -- a concern Michael W. Cutler, a retired Immigration and Naturalization Service agent, said shows why everyone entering the United States should have to obtain a visa.

Without it, the only mandatory screening is done by a Customs and Border Protection inspector who is trying to move visitors along the entry line, Mr. Cutler said. He said the visa application process provides investigators leads to go after terror suspects. Lying on the application is punishable by a stiff prison sentence -- a charge authorities can often make stick even in cases where they can't prove terrorist or criminal involvement.

The former agent said the examples of would-be shoe bomber Richard C. Reid and this summer's foiled plot to blow up airplanes headed from London to the United States, show the vulnerabilities.

"These terrorists were able to gain access to airliners and potentially our nation without first applying for visas. This is because Great Britain, the country of citizenship for all of these terrorists, participates in the Visa Waiver Program," Mr. Cutler said.

Half of all trips by non-immigrant foreigners into the United States are people traveling on passports from visa-waiver countries.

In a statement yesterday Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff did not say how his department will handle the increased demands but described the new security enhancements.

"We envision a secure travel-authorization system that will allow us to receive data about travelers from countries before they get on the plane," he said. "Countries that are willing to assist the United States in doing effective checks on travelers could be put on track to enter the program soon."

Bush Touts Estonia's Flat Income Tax (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

President Bush says the United States should have a simpler tax system. Apparently he has found one he likes — Estonia's. In a brief stop in the Baltic nation on Tuesday, Bush managed to tout Estonia's flat income tax three times.

"They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple," Bush said in Tallinn after getting a look at how Estonian citizens can file their taxes online.

In a toast about an hour later to Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, Bush said, "I am amazed to be in a country that has been able to effect a flat tax in such a positive way."

And before fielding reporters' questions with Ilves, Bush again praised Estonia's approach to taxation.

DOJ_NMG_0099425

"I appreciate the fact that you got a flat tax, you got a tax system that's transparent and simple," he said.

Bush stopped in Estonia en route to a NATO summit in neighboring Latvia.

Back home, Bush has pledged to simplify the tax laws in the United States, which he calls a complicated mess. One idea is a flat tax, which taxes all income at a single rate and gets rid of deductions. Yet comprehensive reform of the U.S. tax system has gone nowhere in Congress.

Bush smiled and nodded — then nodded some more — as Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip enthusiastically explained how his government holds paperless Cabinet meetings.

The system, which uses digital signatures, permits legislation to be OK'd with the click of a mouse.

Ansip's explanation, though, was not as lickety split. He described in detail how the dozen members of the Cabinet — in a room dubbed the "Starship Enterprise" — can vote or make comments online. Cabinet meetings that used last about four to five hours now wrap up in about 30 minutes.

Bush endured the lengthy explanation, shifting his weight back and forth.

He seemed charmed by Estonia's use of the Internet in making daily life easier for its citizens.

"They've got an e-government system that should be the envy of a lot of nations," Bush said.

Bush received two gifts from his Estonian hosts: a glass sculpture and a Skype wireless phone that can be used to make calls over the Internet.

The country is often nicknamed "E-Stonia" for its booming high-tech industry, and it is the main hub of Skype, the Internet telephone company that eBay bought last year for $2.6 billion.

If the phone and accompanying headset Bush received illustrated Estonia's technological savvy, the other one represented its yearning for light during the dark winter months.

Titled "Northern Light," the sculpture symbolizes "the Nordic freshness and crispness, the longing for light during lasting dark periods, strength of purpose and perseverance," the Estonian government said.

Bush said he was honored to be the first sitting American president to visit Estonia, with one regret: his wife couldn't make the trip.

He told Ilves that first lady Laura Bush had an important schedule conflict at home.

"She's receiving the Christmas tree at the White House," Bush explained to the Estonian president.

Laura Bush received the tree from a Pennsylvania family on Monday in the Blue Room. The event is the ceremonial start to the holiday season and considered a big deal at the White House.

Rice, Abbas To Hold Meeting In West Bank (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, November 29, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice put Washington's heft behind new Mideast peace overtures on Tuesday, scheduling an unexpected meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas this week.

The meeting — the second between Rice and Abbas in two months — was announced a day after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called on the Palestinians to return to peace talks, saying his country would be willing to leave most of the West Bank in exchange for a "real peace."

Israel and the Palestinians also agreed Saturday on a cease-fire to end five months of fighting in the Gaza Strip, and Rice's visit was seen as a further push to use the momentum to start new peace talks.

Rice, who is accompanying President Bush on a trip to neighboring Jordan, will meet Abbas on Thursday in the West Bank town of Jericho, said Saeb Erekat, a top Abbas aide. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, raised the possibility that she would also meet with an Israeli official.

DOJ_NMG_0099426

The United States was the main engine behind the phased "road map" peace plan, which calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. The plan foundered shortly after it was presented in 2003, with both sides failing to live up to their initial obligations.

Subsequent efforts to get the sides talking again suffered another blow in January, when Hamas militants won Palestinian parliamentary elections. Israel and the West boycotted the new government, imposing crippling economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority to try to force the Islamic group to moderate its violently anti-Israel views.

Tensions exploded in June when Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier, sparking an Israeli military offensive in Gaza. But the cease-fire that went into effect early Sunday has raised hopes that new peace moves could be on the horizon.

In his speech Monday, Olmert said Israel would release frozen funds to the Palestinian Authority, free Palestinian prisoners and ease checkpoints if Palestinians choose the path of peace.

Abbas said Tuesday that Olmert's speech was a "positive" step toward peacemaking.

If Olmert's "intentions are good, then we can build on this (his initiative) in order to put forward a plan for future negotiations on all issues related to the Palestinian cause," Abbas said during a visit to Jordan.

The cease-fire remains fragile, with militants still firing homemade rockets at Israel since the truce took effect. Militants launched two more rockets at Israel on Tuesday night, Palestinian witnesses said. There were no reports of injuries.

Olmert said he was "a bit frustrated" the rocket fire had not stopped.

"I hope the Palestinians will meet their commitment to the cease-fire just as we are," he said, adding that Israel plans to continue to show restraint in responding.

But Defense Minister Amir Peretz warned there was a limit to Israel's patience.

"Whoever agrees to a cease-fire must be able to impose it," Peretz said. "Violations of cease-fire understandings will provoke a harsh response on our part."

McCormack, the State Department spokesman, praised Israel for showing "great restraint in not responding to some of the rocket attacks that actually have taken place after the cease-fire officially went into effect."

McCormack said the Palestinians must have a government that complies with international demands to stop attacks on Israel, accept Israel's right to exist and respect past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Hamas has not yet agreed to those demands.

Military officials said Israel has agreed in principle to let Abbas bring 1,200 Jordan-based Palestine Liberation Organization forces into Gaza to help monitor the cease-fire. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

The Palestinians were informed of Israel's decision, the officials said, but Erekat said no deal had been finalized.

Also Tuesday, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas left Gaza for his first trip abroad since taking office in March. Haniyeh was to hold meetings in Egypt on Wednesday. He will also visit Lebanon, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Syria and Iran to seek political and financial support for his government.

Jordan's King To Push Different Agenda (AP)

By Jamal Halaby

AP, November 29, 2006

Jordan's king made clear Tuesday he will press for a renewed effort to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict when he meets with President Bush this week for talks in which the U.S. priority will likely be Iraq.

In a speech to parliament, King Abdullah II described the Israeli-Palestinian dispute as the "core" issue in the Middle East and indicated that in his talks with Bush, he would underline the need for the United States to push for peace.

Bush is likely to focus on Iraq's deteriorating security when he starts a two-day visit to Jordan on Wednesday for talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, hosted by King Abdullah II.

But Abdullah and the leaders of two other U.S. allies in the Middle East — Egypt and Saudi Arabia — argue the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the most pressing crisis in the region, and fear Islamic militancy will strengthen if it is not resolved.

Moderate Arabs want the Bush administration to devote an equal amount of diplomatic energy on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process — stagnant since 2000 — as on Iraq.

Abdullah pledged "all possible support to the Palestinians so they can regain their rights," though he warned that his country would not accept a deal that causes an influx of Palestinians.

"Jordan will not accept an unjust settlement of the issue, nor will Jordan accept any settlement that comes at its expense," Abdullah told lawmakers, who applauded loudly.

He was referring to fears of a settlement that would cause thousands of Palestinians to settle in the kingdom, upsetting the country's delicate demographic balance.

Roughly half of Jordan's 5.5 million population consists of Palestinian families who fled, or were driven out of, their homes in the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars.

From Abdullah's point of view, "the Palestinian issue lies at the center of regional problems," said chief government spokesman Nasser Judeh.

"While the king will discuss Iraq and Lebanon with President Bush, the core issue remains the unresolved Palestinian-Israeli crisis," Judeh told The Associated Press.

Arab diplomats said Abdullah was also expected to present Bush with a proposal to curb Iraq's sectarian strife before it becomes a full-blown civil war and give Iraqi security and government greater responsibilities.

Few details were available on the proposal, which envisions the possible formation of a military or new national unity government in Iraq, according to the diplomats, who asked for anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Jordan and other moderate Arabs are concerned that growing Shiite influence in Iran, Syria and Lebanon, will help hard-line Iran dominate the region and give rise to more extremism.

Iran Resolution, Still Not Final, Drops Mention Of Sanctions (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — The six world powers seeking to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions are circulating a significantly weakened draft for a United Nations Security Council resolution against Tehran's nuclear program, in a bid to keep their fragile coalition from falling apart.

The new text under consideration has dropped all mention of sanctions against Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr, according to European diplomats. The United States had initially proposed including Bushehr on the list of programs to single out, but Russia, which has been helping to build the power plant with the Iranians, balked.

Diplomats from the six countries, which also include Britain, France, Germany and China, have been squabbling about the draft resolution for almost three months. There is still no agreement on a final draft.

Complicating the matter is the steady drumbeat in Washington, from inside and outside the Bush administration, calling on President Bush to initiate talks with Iran over the worsening violence in Iraq.

"This has to be carefully managed," said one European diplomat, speaking under condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic practice. "It's important for the U.S. to separate the two issues, because the Iranians would like everything to be combined."

It has been six months since the six powers offered Iran a list of incentives to stop enriching uranium and threatened sanctions if Iran did not. In June, at the time of the initial offer, American officials said Iran had "weeks, not months" to comply.

The growing call for Washington to initiate talks with Tehran over Iraq is only one of the complicating factors. Also holding things up is that Russia and China—but Russia in particular — dislike like the idea of punitive sanctions, and have been dragged along kicking and screaming, according to diplomats.

American officials have sought a strongly worded resolution that would prohibit any technical or financial assistance that could benefit Iran's nuclear program, and would impose a ban on visas for any Iranians involved in nuclear activities, according to American and European diplomats involved in the talks.

Iranian Imbroglio Gives New Boost To Odd Exile Group (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099428

Early this summer, as Washington fretted about Iran's nuclear program, supporters of Mujahedin-e Khalq, an Iranian opposition group, held a rally in an auditorium two blocks from the White House. Prominent members of Congress addressed the crowd, as did the State Department's recently retired ambassador-at-large for war crimes.

Maryam Rajavi, the dissident outfit's leader, beamed in a stirring speech via satellite from France. Denouncing Iran's clerical rulers and their nuclear ambitions, she proclaimed democracy "the answer to Islamic fundamentalism."

Mujahedin-e Khalq, known as MEK, is Iran's largest exile opposition group and, say its supporters, the best hope of bringing democracy to Iran. It reaches into Iran through its own satellite TV channel and claims an underground network of activists inside the Islamic republic. It also has a big presence in neighboring Iraq, where U.S. soldiers watch over more than 3,000 MEK members gathered in a sprawling camp north of Baghdad.

The MEK, however, has a big handicap: The U.S. government says it's a terrorist organization. Officials cite its role in the murder of Americans in the 1970s and subsequent terror attacks that killed hundreds of Iranians. Another big blemish is the group's long collaboration with Saddam Hussein. On top of all that, former members describe the MEK as a personality cult obsessed with celibacy and martyrdom.

So how does an outlaw organization with a bloodstained past, a history of intimacy with Iraq's toppled despot and a reputation for oddness generate thunderous applause almost within earshot of the Oval Office?

Part of the answer lies in subterfuge: Mujahedin-e Khalq, which means People's Holy Warriors, has a raft of support groups with innocuous names, such as the National Convention for a Democratic, Secular Republic in Iran, the host of the Washington event. These haven't been banned and disavow violence.

More important in blurring the MEK's status, however, is the muddle surrounding U.S. policy toward Iran. With the U.S. armed forces bogged down in Iraq and America's military options against neighboring Iran severely limited, the MEK and its fans are lobbying hard to present the group as an ally that can help curb Tehran's growing influence. These supporters, who include lawmakers and conservative foreign-policy analysts, insist the MEK has no links to terrorism.

Most U.S. officials scoff at forming any alliance with the MEK and dispute its claims of having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization. A senior White House official says the Bush administration continues to view the MEK as a terrorist organization and "not an advocate for democracy or human rights" in Iran.

But some Iran analysts say the MEK's thinly disguised presence in the U.S. makes a mockery of the administration's antiterrorism campaign. The White House accuses Iran of supporting terrorist groups, they say, yet turns a blind eye toward the MEK. "It gives the impression that some terrorist organizations are better than others," says Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, an Iranian-American civic organization.

Charm Offensive

Leading the push to get the MEK's "terrorist" tag removed, with help from some members of Congress, is an outfit called the Iran Policy Committee. The committee's president, Raymond Tanter, a former National Security Council official under President Reagan, says the MEK's designation is "restraining" the organization's ability to promote democratic change in Iran. His group recently published a glossy book that challenges the terrorism charges made against the MEK, and this month helped host an event on Capitol Hill arguing the same point.

The charm offensive has taken the MEK far from its origins. First set up in 1965 by vaguely Islamic left-wing intellectuals in Tehran, Mujahedin-e Khalq used to curse American "imperialism" and murdered a string of U.S. military personnel and defense contractors in the 1970s, says the State Department. The group blames the attacks on rogue Marxist factions and says they were not endorsed by MEK's leaders, who were in jail at the time or had been executed.

Shortly before Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution, the Shah's crumbling America-backed regime released jailed MEK activists. One of them, Massoud Rajavi, a former law student at Tehran University, became the group's paramount leader and allied with Islamist forces to topple the Shah. But the group quickly split with Iran's new clerical rulers led by Ayatollah Khomeini, who executed thousands of MEK supporters. The MEK retaliated with a wave of terror of its own.

Mr. Rajavi fled to France, where his brother, a doctor, has a house in Auvers-sur-Oise, a sleepy town outside Paris. To rally Iranians to his cause, Mr. Rajavi sent Massoud Khodabandeh, a British-educated electrical engineer, to Iran's Kurdish region to set up a radio transmitter. He began to broadcast taped tirades against Ayatollah Khomeini.

In France, the group swiftly fell prey to political and romantic bickering. Mr. Rajavi, who had just divorced his second wife, shocked supporters by taking up with the wife of a close friend and fellow MEK activist. They married and she took the name Maryam Rajavi.

Another contentious liaison followed. Mr. Rajavi moved to Iraq in 1986 with his new wife and forged an alliance with Saddam Hussein, then at war with Iran. Former MEK members say the Iraq dictator provided a six-story office building in Baghdad and military bases, including Camp Ashraf, named in honor of Mr. Rajavi's first wife, who had been killed in Iran by Ayatollah Khomeini's regime.

After a disastrous lunge into Iran in 1988, the MEK embarked on a more successful military venture. It helped Saddam Hussein crush an uprising by Kurds after Iraq's defeat by U.S. forces during the 1991 Gulf War, according to U.S. diplomats and the State Department's 2005 Country Reports on Terrorism.

Increasingly seen in the West as an Iraqi stooge, Mr. Rajavi sent Ms. Rajavi back to France to drum up support. Her campaign made some headway but foundered when the U.S. and Europe began looking for ways to reach out to Iran's newly elected reformist president, Mohammad Khatami.

Senior diplomats in the Clinton administration say the MEK figured prominently as a bargaining chip in a bridge-building effort with Tehran. Washington hoped it could get Iran to back a Middle East peace initiative, stop funding terrorist groups and forswear nuclear weapons. Iran, for its part, wanted the U.S. to take a hard line against the MEK.

In 1997, the State Department added the MEK to a list of global terrorist organizations as "a signal" of the U.S.'s desire for rapprochement with Tehran's reformists, says Martin Indyk, who at the time was assistant secretary of state for Near East Affairs. President Khatami's government "considered it a pretty big deal," Mr. Indyk says.

The MEK also got hit by a string of defections. Among those to quit was Mr. Khodabandeh, the electrical engineer. He married another defector, Anne Singleton, an English woman who had visited Camp Ashraf, where she says she was taught an anti-imperialist song that vowed "death to America." Ms. Singleton wrote a book denouncing the MEK as a crazed cult of enforced celibacy and brutal discipline.

Other former members describe a good cause warped by methods reminiscent of Mao Tse-tung's Cultural Revolution -- a constant hunt for internal enemies, ideological "cleansing" sessions and harsh punishment of real or imagined dissent. Mohsen Abbasloo, a 28-year-old former MEK activist, says he was jailed and beaten at Camp Ashraf for over a month after he voiced mild doubts. "I went there full of hope but it was not even 1% of what I expected," says Mr. Abbasloo, who says he spent four years at the huge desert complex of barracks, office buildings and military training grounds between Baghdad and Iraq's border with Iran.

Mohammad Mohaddessin, a veteran MEK member and chief foreign-affairs official of its political arm, denies accusations of brutality and describes defectors as "tools of the Iranian regime."

Throughout the 1990s, the MEK continued to operate in Washington and elsewhere through various front organizations, the most prominent of which was the Paris-based National Council of Resistance of Iran. In 1999, the State Department banned the NCRI on the grounds that it is the MEK's official political arm. The NCRI describes itself as an Iranian parliament-in-exile comprising 530 members and not just representing the MEK.

Its former U.S.-based spokesman, Alireza Jafarzadeh, remained a regular on the Washington lobbying and policy circuits. In recent years he appeared routinely on Fox News as a foreign-affairs analyst. In 2002, he held a Washington news conference to reveal a secret uranium enrichment facility in the Iranian city of Natanz. The International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna later confirmed the claim. President Bush and other senior U.S. officials publicly praised what they called an Iranian "dissident group" for unearthing the information.

Former MEK members and some U.S. officials say they believe the Natanz information was fed to the MEK by Israel, which wanted to make it public. The MEK derides this as nonsense.

John Moody, a Fox News senior vice president, says Mr. Jafarzadeh's contract as a foreign-affairs analyst lapsed, but doesn't rule out further employment. "He consistently provides accurate and sometimes exclusive information," he says.

In 2002, 150 members of the House of Representatives signed a petition seeking the MEK's removal from the U.S. government's terrorist list.

As America geared up for war with Iraq in early 2003, the MEK muted its adulation of Saddam Hussein, say people who were in Ashraf at the time. Top leaders, including the Rajavi couple, quietly bailed from Camp Ashraf.

"We suddenly noticed that a lot of senior people were missing," says Behzad Alishahi, an Iranian who spent more than 15 years at the camp working as an MEK TV presenter. Just before the U.S. invaded in March, he says, hundreds of MEK fighters rushed toward the Iraq-Iran border for an attack on Iran. They turned back, he says, after U.S. planes bombed their convoy and Camp Ashraf.

Ms. Rajavi fled to the group's compound in Auvers-sur-Oise, France. Her husband vanished, along with his hairdresser and bodyguards. This stirred rumors that he had been picked up by the U.S. military and was providing intelligence about Saddam Hussein and also Iran.

A State Department official says Mr. Rajavi was last seen in Baghdad in March 2003 and is now either dead or in hiding. The MEK says he's alive and evading Iranian assassins.

When American troops pulled up outside Camp Ashraf shortly after the fall of Baghdad in April 2003, the MEK offered no resistance and later agreed to disarm. Mr. Alishahi says he and colleagues at the TV station were ordered by MEK commanders to destroy film and other evidence of close ties to Saddam Hussein.

U.S. officials launched a review of camp residents to decide if they should be prosecuted for terrorism. At the same time, the Central Intelligence Agency warned French authorities to watch out for the MEK. The French dispatched hundreds of police to storm the MEK's Auvers-sur-Oise compound. They arrested Maryam Rajavi and carted away $9 million in cash and documents detailing bank accounts in France, the U.S. and elsewhere holding tens of millions of dollars.

Also confiscated, says a senior French security official, were videos of Mr. Rajavi meeting Saddam Hussein and 99 satellite-positioning devices programmed with coordinates for Iran. The French also found what they say were signs that the Iraqi dictator had bankrolled the organization, something the MEK has always denied. These included stacks of dollar bills wrapped in Iraqi newspapers and documents relating to a gift of Iraqi oil, say French officials who were involved.

Drawing Criticism

The raid drew criticism from lawmakers and others in France and also the U.S. About 10 MEK members set themselves on fire in Europe and Canada in protest. Two died from their burns. French police released Ms. Rajavi but launched a formal terrorism-conspiracy investigation of her and 16 others.

Mr. Mohaddessin, the group's foreign-affairs spokesman, who was also detained and later released, ridicules the raid as a publicity stunt to win favor with Iran. There were enough police, he says, "for a coup in an African country."

The U.S. review of Camp Ashraf, which began around the same time as the French raid and finished in summer 2004, partially vindicated the MEK. Only one person has faced any U.S. charges, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Iran who was arrested in September in New York for allegedly providing support to a terrorist group. The roughly 3,300 now still in Ashraf were given the status of "protected persons" under the Geneva Convention, which promises humane treatment for nonnationals in a country at war. The U.S. military, as the occupying power, took on the role of protector. A White House official says this "protected" status applies only to individuals, not to the MEK as an organization.

Former Ashraf residents say MEK commanders, most of whom are women, have worked hard to woo the American soldiers who are now nominally in charge, inviting them to use a big swimming pool and serving them pizza. American forces have, under an agreement with the MEK, confiscated the group's roughly 300 tanks, 250 armored personnel carriers, 250 artillery pieces and 10,000 small arms. They also blew up most of the MEK's ammunition. But Camp Ashraf still functions as a bastion of opposition to Iran, shielded from the turmoil elsewhere in Iraq by American soldiers.

In June, the MEK camp hosted a mass rally of Iranian dissidents and thousands of Iraqis. Ms. Rajavi sent a message from France urging them to "cut off the tentacles of the Iranian regime." The MEK's satellite TV station, meanwhile, pumps out adulatory propaganda for Ms. Rajavi and her missing husband, Massoud.

Both the Pentagon and the U.S. Central Command declined to comment on the military's dealings with the MEK in Iraq. But individual officers have expressed support for the MEK. In May 2003, Maj. Gen. Raymond Odierno, then-commander of America's 4th Infantry Division, commended MEK members at Camp Ashraf for their cooperation and told reporters that "this should lead to a review of whether they are still a terrorist organization."

In 2005, following a report by Human Rights Watch detailing torture and other abuses at MEK camps in Iraq before the U.S. invasion, the commander of a U.S. military police unit that had been stationed at Camp Ashraf wrote to the U.S.-based human-rights group to defend the MEK. He said U.S. forces had not found "any credible evidence" of any such abuses and said he would "like my own daughter to someday visit these units for the cultural exchange."

In Washington, debate raged during this time over how to deal with the MEK, say current and former U.S. officials. Amid the screening of Ashraf residents, some in the Pentagon pushed to use the MEK as a tool against Iran and Iranian-backed militants operating inside Iraq, say current and former State Department officials involved in Iraq policy.

Colin Powell, who was then secretary of state, pushed back against the idea of cooperating with the MEK, say current and former officials. Mr. Powell and his underlings argued that any flirtation with the MEK would undermine Washington's stand against terrorism. The State Department then designated the group's previously tolerated U.S. affiliate, NCRI-U.S., as a terrorist front for the MEK. In August 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation shut down its offices at the National Press Club in Washington.

"There was this kind of language [being offered by Pentagon officials] that one man's terrorist was another man's freedom fighter," says Lawrence Wilkerson, who served as Mr. Powell's chief of staff at the time. He says the State Department pushed through 2003 and 2004 for the MEK's disarmament.

Douglas Feith, who served as the Pentagon's No. 3 civilian official until last year, denies any desire by the Pentagon to cozy up to the MEK. "The idea that we would use them against Iran is fantasy," he says.

MEK leaders sheltering in the West are now ramping up a campaign, along with their American and European fans, to present Maryam Rajavi and her missing husband as the only way to stop Iran from developing a nuclear bomb. This summer, thousands of their supporters gathered in a Paris convention hall. Ms. Rajavi arrived in a chauffeured Bentley, stepping onto a red carpet to the sound of trumpets. Rose petals were strewn at her feet. A former French prime minister and other VIPs applauded.

Among the MEK's Washington supporters are a significant mix of lawmakers on both sides of the aisle. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican who chairs the International Relations Subcommittee on the Middle East and Central Asia, drafted legislation this year that would require the White House to provide funding to Iran's largest opposition groups, although the bill doesn't explicitly name the MEK.

Mr. Abbasloo, the former Camp Ashraf resident, who is now in Europe, says he doesn't like Iran's current regime but mocks the MEK as an alternative. "This would only replace a snake with a crocodile," he says. "I hope America is not going to be that stupid."

U.S., N.Korean Envoys To Hold More Talks (AP)

By Audra Ang

AP, November 29, 2006

The top American, North Korean and Chinese nuclear negotiators met for a second day Wednesday, a U.S. Embassy spokeswoman said, amid a diplomatic push to resume six-nation talks on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill met with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawai at the Diaoyutai state guesthouse for a second round of talks, said Susan Stevenson, spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Beijing.

She did not have details of the discussions or whether Hill met with Wu and Kim together or separately. The three met on Tuesday.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the main goal of the current meetings was to "make sure that everybody, at least, has a good, solid understanding of what might happen" when six-nation talks aimed at persuading the North to abandon its nuclear weapons reconvene.

"What Chris did today (Tuesday) was to start to provide information on how we might be able to define what is an effective round of the six-party talks that produces concrete results," he said.

According to South Korea's Yonhap news agency, Hill on Tuesday "stressed that the North needs to report all of its nuclear programs before seeking economic incentives."

DOJ_NMG_0099432

On his part, Kim insisted that Washington lift its financial sanctions on Pyongyang and "take steps to help normalize relations between the two enemies," Yonhap said.

North Korea agreed in September 2005 to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. But Washington imposed the financial sanctions against a Macau-based bank on suspicions it was laundering counterfeit money for the North Koreans. Angered by the move, Pyongyang withdrew from the talks two months later.

Kim said before Tuesday's meetings got started that the timing of the next round of six-party talks on his country's nuclear program "depends on the United States."

"There are too many outstanding issues" and both parties should narrow their differences, Kim told reporters.

Officials have yet to determine an exact date for the next round of negotiations. The China-hosted talks involve the United States, North Korea, Japan, South Korea and Russia, which has not sent an envoy to Beijing.

"We hope all sides can grasp this opportunity and take a flexible, pragmatic and constructive approach in order to realize the early resumption of six-party talks," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said at a regular briefing.

Kim's trip to Beijing — a rare overseas visit — and the presence of other negotiators added to prospects of compromises to give new life to the talks.

An unannounced meeting between Hill and Kim last month in Beijing led to Pyongyang agreeing to return to the arms negotiations amid heightened tensions after its first nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Hill told reporters when he arrived Monday that the U.S. anticipated that the talks would "get going at some point very soon."

Hill has also met with South Korea's nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, and Japan's representative Kenichiro Sasae.

Mystery Illness Hits Former Russian PM (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Yegor Gaidar, Russia's former prime minister and the architect of the country's market reforms, last week suffered a sudden, unexplained and violent illness on a visit to Ireland, a day after Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB spy, died in London from an apparent radiation poisoning.

Mr Gaidar is now in a stable condition at an undisclosed Moscow hospital, undergoing tests. In a telephone interview with the FT, Mr Gaidar said the doctors had so far been unable to identify the cause of the violent vomiting and bleeding that he suffered during a conference in Ireland.

Anatoly Chubais, his former associate and the head of Russia's electricity monopoly, said he suspected Mr Gaidar may have been poisoned. However, he strongly ruled out that either Russia's security services or the Kremlin could have had any involvement. There is no indication of radiation being the cause of his illness.

Mr Gaidar is one of Russian President Vladimir Putin's softer critics and his daughter is a leader of an opposition movement. Mr Gaidar, who heads an economic think-tank in Moscow, has close connections with the government and occasionally advises them on economic matters.

"I have suffered sudden problems with my health on November 24 which posed a threat to my life. This threat has not been realised. After a few hours the situation stabilised," Mr Gaidar said.

Mr Chubais and Mr Gaidar said the doctors could not explain the symptoms he had suffered.

Mr Gaidar said he felt ill after eating a simple breakfast where he was staying near Dublin. He said he could barely move any of his limbs and had to lie down for most of the afternoon.

Ekaterina Genieva, who helped to organise the conference at National University of Ireland, Maynooth, said Mr Gaidar looked pale and unwell when a few hours later he came down to answer questions about his book The Death of the Empire: Lessons for Contemporary Russia. After about 10 minutes, Mr Gaidar said he had to leave the room.

"I rushed after him and found him lying on the floor, unconscious. He was vomiting blood and also bleeding from the nose for about 35 minutes," Ms Genieva said. Mr Gaidar was taken to James Connolly Memorial Hospital in Blanchardstown, where he was treated overnight. The following morning, Mr Gaidar had asked to be discharged and, after a visit to the Russian embassy, was put on a flight back to Moscow.

Mr Gaidar declined to comment about whether he believed he had suffered a poisoning attack. The news of his illness comes after a series of mysterious incidents involving Russian public figures over the past month. It emerged as the Kremlin and state-run television continued to suggest the murky world of Russia's recent émigrés was behind the death of Mr Litvinenko.

Sources in Dublin said they did not suspect anything untoward in Mr Gaidar's illness.

Billionaire Ally Of Dead Spy Issues Statement (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 28 — Boris A. Berezovsky, an exiled Russian billionaire and fierce opponent of the Kremlin, confirmed Tuesday that the police found radioactive traces in his office after the death last week of his close associate, Alexander V. Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radiation.

While the association between the men has become widely known, the discovery of radioactive traces at Mr. Berezovsky's Mayfair office highlighted their close ties and offered one more clue about Mr. Litvinenko's movements on Nov. 1, the day he first reported feeling unwell.

Late Tuesday, the police said they had broadened their efforts to trace Mr. Litvinenko's whereabouts before he died, searching two more places in central London — an address in Mayfair and the Sheraton Park Lane Hotel.

Mr. Berezovsky, one of the most prominent and wealthy Russian exiles in London, visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital before he died. Apart from the traces at his office, where Mr. Litvinenko was a frequent visitor, he has not been implicated in the police inquiry.

Mr. Litvinenko, a former secret service agent, accused the Russian authorities of poisoning him with what the police said was a radioactive isotope, polonium 210. Mr. Berezovsky pointedly refrained Tuesday from making a similarly direct accusation.

In what aides said was his first formal statement since Mr. Litvinenko's death, Mr. Berezovsky said he was "deeply saddened" by the death of his associate, who had worked for both the K.G.B. and its successor organization, known by its Russian initials, F.S.B.

Referring to Mr. Litvinenko's claim that he had refused an order to assassinate Mr. Berezovsky in the late 1990s, Mr. Berezovsky said: "I credit him with saving my life, and he remained a close friend and ally ever since. I will remember him for his bravery, his determination and his honor.

"Many of Mr. Litvinenko's friends and I have already publicly expressed our views about what we think might have happened. Therefore I believe the most helpful course we can take is to let the police get on with their work," the statement said. "I have complete faith in the British authorities and the police. They are conducting a thorough and professional investigation, and we should now wait for the results."

Mr. Berezovsky said the traces of radiation in his office had been "discovered as part of an ongoing police investigation of all the locations visited by Alexander Litvinenko" on Nov. 1.

Previously, the police tracked Mr. Litvinenko on that day to a sushi bar, the five-star Millennium Mayfair hotel in central London and his own home in north London. Officers have also discovered traces of radiation at a security company in Mayfair called Erinys, the company acknowledged in a statement.

Mr. Litvinenko visited its office "on a matter totally unrelated to issues now being investigated by the police," the company said.

Friends of Mr. Litvinenko have said he was a frequent visitor to Mr. Berezovsky's office. Mr. Berezovsky fled Russia in late 2000, after amassing a fortune in the freewheeling 1990s through a car dealership, a media empire, the Aeroflot airline and holdings in oil and aluminum.

An autopsy is to be carried out on Mr. Litvinenko on Friday, following the formal opening of a coroner's inquest on Thursday.

The British authorities said Tuesday that eight people had been sent to a clinic to be tested for radiation traces. One of them was a reporter for The Daily Mirror tabloid, Graham Brough, who said he was tested after shaking hands with Mario Scaramella, an Italian academic who said he met Mr. Litvinenko in the Itsu sushi bar in Piccadilly on Nov. 1.

Mr. Brough wrote in The Daily Mirror on Tuesday that he had been singled out for testing because "Scaramella's palms had been slightly sweaty when I shook hands" with him during an interview last week in Naples.

British health authorities and the police have said polonium 210 cannot be transmitted through the skin and is not harmful unless it is swallowed, breathed in or passed through an open wound.

Mr. Scaramella has also been tested for radiation by the British police, according to Paolo Guzzanti, an Italian senator who led a parliamentary commission investigating the possibility of K.G.B. activity in Italy. The panel employed Mario Scaramella as a consultant, according to Mr. Guzzanti, who said he spoke to Mr. Scaramella on Tuesday.

"He said he was in a castle outside of London, and I don't know if it is official, but he is under police protection," Mr. Guzzanti said in a telephone interview on Tuesday. "He has three armored cars around him with bodyguards and the police or secret service," he added. The British police have declined to confirm those assertions.

Mr. Scaramella has told Italian reporters that when he met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, he showed the Russian man e-mail messages from a mutual intelligence acquaintance listing individuals whose lives were said to be in danger from criminals based in St. Petersburg.

The messages reportedly claimed that the same criminals killed Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist, in Moscow last month. Mr. Litvinenko's associates say he was investigating her fatal shooting when he was poisoned.

In his first public remarks on the matter, Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that no "diplomatic or political barrier" would be allowed to thwart the police inquiry into Mr. Litvinenko's death. "It is obviously a very, very serious matter indeed," Mr. Blair told a news conference. "We are determined to find out what happened and who is responsible."

Blair Pledges To Pursue Probe Of Ex-Spy's Death (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 28 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that "there is no diplomatic or political barrier in the way" of investigating the mysterious fatal poisoning of a former Russian spy in London and that he planned to speak with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the matter "at any time that is appropriate."

"It obviously is a very serious matter and we are determined to find out what happened and who is responsible," Blair said about the death of Alexander Litvinenko, 43, the former agent and a vocal critic of Putin. Doctors said Litvinenko was poisoned by a radioactive substance known as polonium-210.

Litvinenko, whose hair fell out and organs failed three weeks after he first felt ill, blamed Putin for his death, according to a statement that friends said he dictated as he lay dying last week. The Kremlin has called that allegation "nonsense."

Blair's remarks came as Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky, another ardent critic of Putin living in London, confirmed that traces of the radioactive substance were found in his office in central London.

In a statement Tuesday, Berezovsky said the substance was discovered as a result of "police investigation of all the locations visited by Andrew Litvinenko" on Nov. 1, the day he became ill. Police closed and sealed Berezovsky's office.

Berezovsky did not say in his statement whether he had met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1 -- the day police believe he was poisoned. Police are trying to retrace Litvinenko's steps, piecing together his whereabouts with security camera footage, his cellphone records and interviews with him before he died Thursday.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of both Litvinenko and Berezovsky, said in an interview that Berezovsky and his staff had been tested for exposure to radiation. Litvinenko used Berezovsky's facilities as a "back office," Goldfarb said. "If he needed to make a Xerox copy, he would come in and use the Xerox machine and then go out."

Scotland Yard has said it also found traces of polonium-210 in Litvinenko's home and at a central London sushi restaurant and a hotel he visited Nov. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0099435

Late Tuesday, police began to search two more locations -- a building at 58 Grosvenor and the Sheraton Park Lane Hotel in Piccadilly. A spokesman said that as of almost midnight, no radiation had been found.

More than 1,100 people have called a help line for those worried over possible exposure to the radiation, health officials said, and eight people showing some symptoms were being referred for further tests.

Mario Scaramella, an Italian who has said he met with Litvinenko at the restaurant Nov. 1 and showed him sensitive e-mail messages, said Tuesday that he was under British protection and being tested for contamination, the Associated Press reported.

Russia's top nuclear official, Sergei Kiriyenko, weighed in on the case Tuesday, saying that controls on the export of polonium are very tight. "Allegations that someone stole it during production are absolutely unfounded," Kiriyenko told reporters.

Kiriyenko said Russia exports eight grams of polonium-210 monthly, all of it to the United States. He said that Russia used to provide it to British companies but that exports to Britain ended about five years ago.

Kremlin supporters have been fingering Berezovsky as a likely assassin of Litvinenko; they say he gained from Litvinenko's death because he is using it to try to smear Putin's reputation internationally.

Oleg Morozov, a top official of the pro-Kremlin United Russia party, told journalists that "Russia and the Russian authorities had the most to lose from the death. . . . There is a well-known formula: If you cannot figure out what happened, try to understand who could have benefited from it. . . . That is why, from this standpoint, the appearance of traces of polonium-210, which reportedly caused Litvinenko's death, in an office of businessman Boris Berezovsky will help make clear certain things."

Morozov said Litvinenko "was exposed to polonium somewhere. Maybe it happened at this office. I do not know."

Berezovsky visited Litvinenko in the hospital and has said he believed Putin was behind the poisoning. When Litvinenko was a member of the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, he accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky.

Pope Urges Leaders To Renounce Violence (AP)

By Victor L. Simpson

AP, November 29, 2006

Pope Benedict XVI urged leaders of all religions Tuesday to "utterly refuse" to support any form of violence in the name of faith, while Turkey's top Muslim cleric complained to the pontiff of growing "Islamophobia" in the world.

As he began his first visit to a Muslim country — a trip that drew extraordinary security but few onlookers — Benedict sought a careful balance as he extended friendship and brotherhood to Muslims, hoping to end the outcry from many Muslims over his remarks linking Islam to violence.

He expressed support for Turkey's efforts to join the European Union, moving away from opposition he voiced when he was a cardinal.

But the German pope also hammered away at key points of his 18-month papacy, telling diplomats that leaders of all religions must "utterly refuse to sanction recourse to violence as a legitimate expression of faith."

He avoided mention of any specific religion, even as he decried terrorism and the "disturbing conflicts across the Middle East."

Benedict also said guarantees of religious freedom are essential for a just society, and the Vatican said he raised specific issues such as property rights of Turkey's tiny 32,000-member Catholic community during talks with Turkish officials.

His comments could be reinforced later during the four-day visit when the pope meets in Istanbul with Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians.

The pope is expected to call for greater rights and protections for Christian minorities in the Muslim world, including the small Greek Orthodox community in Turkey.

The 79-year-old made reconciliation a priority of his first day, taking on a taxing series of meetings that saw him needing a drink of water after coughing repeatedly while addressing diplomats in the last public appearance in the evening.

Benedict's journey is extraordinarily sensitive, a closely watched pilgrimage full of symbolism that could offer hope of religious reconciliation or deepen what many say is a growing divide between the Christian and Islamic worlds.

Seeking to ease anger over his perceived criticism of Islam, Benedict met with Ali Bardakoglu, who heads religious affairs in Turkey, warmly grasping hands. Benedict sat nearby as the Muslim cleric defended his religion.

"The so-called conviction that the sword is used to expand Islam in the world and growing Islamophobia hurts all Muslims," Bardakoglu said.

The comment appeared to be a reference to Benedict's remarks in a speech in September when he quoted a 14th-century Christian emperor who characterized the Prophet Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by thy sword the faith he preached."

The Vatican described the cleric's speech as "positive, respectful and non-polemical," applauding what the church sees as efforts for a true dialogue between faiths.

On Sunday, more than 25,000 Turks showed up to an anti-Vatican protest in Istanbul, asking the pope to stay at home, but on the streets of Ankara most people went about their usual business and only a tiny protest was held outside the religious affairs office hours before the pope arrived.

"Today we had the sensation he was a welcome guest," said Vatican spokesman the Rev. Federico Lombardi.

"All feel the same responsibility in this difficult moment in history, let's work together," Benedict said during his flight from Rome to Ankara, where more than 3,000 police and sharpshooters joined a security effort that surpassed even the visit of President Bush two years ago.

"We know that the scope of this trip is dialogue and brotherhood and the commitment for understanding between cultures ... and for reconciliation," he said.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan — in a last-minute change of plans — welcomed the pope at the foot of the plane and described the visit as "very meaningful." Erdogan's political party has Islamic roots, though the government is secular.

In his first official act, Benedict visited the mausoleum of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey, and wrote a message in a guest book calling Turkey "a meeting point of different religions and cultures and a bridge between Asia and Europe."

Police monitored the highway leading to Ankara from the airport, where Turkish and Vatican flags waved in a light breeze. Snipers climbed atop buildings and hilltops. In wooded areas along the route, soldiers in camouflage fatigues set up observation points and sniffer dogs passed along bridges.

It was his first visit to a Muslim country as pontiff. The original goal of the pope's trip to Turkey was to meet Bartholomew I, leader of the world's 300 million Orthodox Christians. The two major branches of Christianity represented by Bartholomew and Benedict split in 1054 over differences in opinion on the power of the papacy, and the two spiritual heads will meet in an attempt to breach the divide and reunite the churches.

Benedict leaves Ankara on Wednesday for Ephesus, where the Virgin Mary is thought to have spent her last years, and will then travel to Istanbul.

A closely watched moment of the trip will come Thursday during Benedict's visit to Haghia Sophia, a 1,500-year-old site that was originally a Byzantine church and then turned into a mosque after the Muslim conquest of Istanbul — then known as Constantinople — in 1453. It is now a museum, and Turks would take offense at any religious gestures by the pontiff, who also plans to visit the nearby Blue Mosque.

In 1967, Pope Paul VI fell to his knees in prayer, touching off protests by Turks claiming he violated the secular nature of the domed complex. In 1979, Pope John Paul II made no overt religious signs during his visit.

Pope Calls For Dialogue Between Christians, Muslims In Turkey (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey - Pope Benedict XVI called for an "authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims" and praised his Turkish hosts Tuesday as he began what's surely his most controversial journey since he was elevated to lead the world's 1 billion Roman Catholics in April 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0099437

The pope didn't directly address the anger he set off in September when he quoted a Byzantine Emperor as saying that in Islam, "you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his (the prophet Muhammad's) command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

But it was clear that those words weren't forgotten. Turkey's president of religious affairs, Ali Bardakoglu, bluntly told the pope at a joint appearance that Western leaders were distorting Islam's message as a religion of peace.

"Prejudices are nourished mostly by historical fears and concerns," said Bardakoglu, who in September accused the pope of "having hatred in his heart" for Muslims. "The establishment of universal peace is based on the fact that we, men of religion and religious institutes, should not be the slaves of such prejudices, nourished by such fears and concerns, and we should act with common sense."

Sitting on the stage next to Bardakoglu, Benedict XVI didn't react to the statement.

But he did retract comments he'd made as a cardinal in 2004, when he openly and frequently opposed Turkish membership in the European Union, saying that he now favored it. In a goodwill gesture, he signed the Golden Book at the memorial to modern Turkey's founder, Kemal Ataturk, noting that he was proud to quote Ataturk by writing, "Peace at home, peace abroad."

Later, he tried to calm Muslim anger in remarks to diplomats at the Vatican Embassy: "I wish to reiterate my great esteem for Muslims, encouraging them to continue to work together, in mutual respect, to promote the dignity of every human being and the growth of a society where personal freedom and care for others provide peace and serenity for all."

The pope said the purpose of this trip was "dialogue, brotherhood and reconciliation" after a tumultuous period in Christian-Muslim relations. In addition to his September comments, Muslim sentiments have been bruised by European efforts to ban Islamic religious dress and the rejection of Turkish membership in the European Union.

But the pope's visit drew little attention in a country in which fewer than 100,000 people are Christians and fewer still are Catholic. Unlike Pope John Paul II's trip here in 1979, no well-wishers lined the route, jostling to catch a glimpse of the leader of the world's largest organized religion.

Protesters were few, too.

While Benedict visited the Ataturk Memorial, a small group gathered several blocks away. On the streets of the city, there was some hostility: taxi driver Yilmaz Kulum, 49, said he wished the pope hadn't come.

"I don't want him in Turkey because he criticised the prophet Muhammad," he said. "His words disturbed my conscience."

Kezban Turkoglu, 32, a secretary in a hijab, the head scarf that's the sign of a very religious woman in largely secular Turkey, wished that the pope simply would apologize for his comments in September.

"He mentions common values, but this is not enough," she said.

But just as many people seemed to share the view of businessman Ertan Kuscu, 38: "I don't like him, but he is more than welcome if this serves as an advertisement for Turkey."

While preparing to meet the pope at the airport, before flying to the NATO summit that he'd said would make it impossible to meet, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said it was essential to show hospitality during the pope's four-day visit.

"If we behave improperly, if someone tries to convert this to political rant, we will lose," he said. "We will think and calm down."

Tuesday was the most political day of the visit. On Wednesday, the pope leaves Ankara for Ephesus, which is believed to have once been home to Mary, Jesus' mother. From there, he'll go to Istanbul to meet Patriarch Bartholomew I, the so-called first among equals of leaders in the Eastern Orthodox churches, which split with the Catholic Church 1,000 years ago over theological issues and the power of the pope.

Pope Backs Turkey's Bid To Join European Union (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099438

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 28 — Pope Benedict XVI arrived in Turkey on Tuesday armed with a surprise gesture of good will aimed at blunting Muslim anger toward him: he backed Turkey's long-stalled desire to join the European Union, reversing a statement he made two years ago.

Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, told reporters after a brief meeting with Benedict at the airport here that he had asked the pope to support Turkey in its attempt to become a member of the European Union.

"He said, 'You know we don't have a political role, but we wish for Turkey's entry into the E.U.,' " Mr. Erdogan said the pope told him. "His wish is a positive recommendation for us."

Although the Vatican does not play a formal role in the European Union, or delve publicly into domestic matters of other states, the pope's gesture was nonetheless a piece of political stagecraft at a delicate time both in relations between Muslims and the West and in Benedict's own damaged reputation among Muslims.

Long before he angered the Muslim world two months ago with a speech criticized as equating Islam with violence, Benedict was disliked here because of comments he made, as a cardinal in 2004, opposing Turkish membership in Europe. As the successor to the Ottoman Empire, Turkey had always stood, he said at the time, "in permanent contrast to Europe."

But the 79-year-old pope's concession on Tuesday, at the start of a four-day trip here, seemed to make good on his pledge to heal the wounds between East and West. It may also have the practical effect of tamping down anger here. Security for the pope's visit was extensive, with helicopters hovering at the airport, commandos guarding the pope's plane and sharpshooters on the roofs of buildings.

It is unclear what effect the pope's reversal will have on the fraught debate in Europe over Turkey's membership, especially among conservatives who share the views he expressed as a cardinal two years ago. Much of that opposition is rooted in the increased tension between the West and Islam, including fears of more terrorist attacks in Europe and the already difficult integration of millions of Muslims there.

Some of the tension, though, is tied to the difficulty Turkey has had in meeting Europe's specific demands — and the pope's visit comes at a particularly delicate time in Turkey's talks with European negotiators.

Admission talks, which officially began this year, have hit a snag over the European Union's insistence that Turkey open its ports and harbors to vessels from Greek Cyprus, an internationally recognized state opposed by Turkey. But Turkish officials say they cannot act until an international embargo that has been in place on the Turkish part of the island for more than 20 years is lifted.

Because Benedict did not announce his new position himself on Tuesday, the shift appeared to some degree to be a concession won by Mr. Erdogan — a deft act of diplomacy by the pope that critics said his speech two months ago lacked.

Although Mr. Erdogan's government is rooted in moderate political Islam, he had said until Monday that he would not be able to meet the pope under pressure from his conservative constituency. As the leader of the only Muslim country in NATO, he left immediately afterward to attend a meeting of the Western military alliance in Latvia.

Hours later, the pope's spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, released a brief statement repeating that the Vatican has "neither the power nor the specific political task" of getting Turkey admitted to the European Union.

But Father Lombardi said the Vatican "views positively and encourages the road of dialogue and of moving toward integration of Turkey in Europe on the basis of common values and principles."

It remains to be seen whether the pope's gesture will have a warming effect in Turkey, or in the broader Muslim world.

In Ankara, residents expressed doubts about the pope's sincerity. "It's not support, it's a lie," said Hakan Ozgunaydin, a 29-year-old co-owner of a shoe shop in downtown Ankara. "I would expect him to say, 'those bloody Turks,' when he leaves this country."

Merve Celikkol, a 21-year-old physics student, was just as blunt, calling the pope a hypocrite: "How is it possible that he changed so much?"

"This can be his way of confessing his sins for the wrong he has done to the Muslim world," said Ismail Aytac, a 51-year-old sitting in a luxury watch shop. "After all, he's human, and humans make mistakes."

A number of those interviewed did say they thought that the new support was a decisive achievement for Mr. Erdogan, who has led the push for entry into Europe, at no small political cost to himself.

Benedict's trip here is his fifth outside Italy since he was elected pope last year, and his first outside the European Union and to a predominantly Muslim country. His main aim is to visit leaders of the Orthodox patriarchy here, as part of his goal to mend the 1,000-year rift between the Roman Catholic Church and the 220 million members of the Orthodox Church.

But Christians make up less than half a percent of Turkey's 72 million people, and it was clear that this trip would be far different from those to Christian countries, even before Benedict quoted a Byzantine emperor as referring to Islam as "evil and inhuman" in a speech in Germany in September. The trip to Turkey, though a modern and secular democracy, was loaded with symbolism: here, Christian and Muslim warriors battled for centuries, as the Byzantine Empire, founded by Rome's first Christian emperor, gave way to Muslim Ottoman Turks who established their own empire and pushed deep into Europe.

After his plane touched down, the pope, wearing white robes, was met at the airport with a red carpet and a small honor guard, but with none of the fanfare of his other trips. Rather, small demonstrations protesting Benedict's visit were held here and in Istanbul, which the pope will visit on Wednesday.

In brief comments on his plane, Benedict made clear that one of his chief aims was to stimulate a "dialogue" to bring Christians and Muslims, and West and East, closer.

"The scope of this visit is dialogue, brotherhood, a commitment to understanding between cultures, between religions, for reconciliation," he told reporters before his plane took off from Rome.

Mr. Erdogan, who unexpectedly greeted the pope at his plane, spoke too of the need for greater understanding.

"We are going through a tough period when the culture of violence has been expanding and our world faces disaster scenarios like the clashes of civilizations and polarizations in various directions," Mr. Erdogan told reporters after his 20-minute meeting with the pope. "Therefore, we need mutual understanding among different beliefs and civilizations more than any time in history."

Over the weekend, the Vatican began signaling that it was warming to the idea of Turkey's membership in the European Union. The Vatican has never issued a formal position on Turkish membership. In 2004, when the pope was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he said it would be a "grave error," both he and other church officials described the remarks as his personal opinion.

The stalemate over Turkey's bid to join the European Union has frustrated Turkish officials, who are smoothing their negotiating positions ahead of meetings with union members in December.

"Everything is just stuck," said Namik Tan, spokesman for Turkey's Foreign Ministry, said in an interview on Monday. "How can an elected government with all these restrictions over the Turkish Cypriots open its ports without any restrictions? This government has a public here."

On Tuesday night, officials from the European Union met to set conditions for the future of the talks.

"Look, they said there would be a train crash," Mr. Erdogan said at the news conference. "Now they say there is no train crash, but the train slowed down."

After his meeting with Mr. Erdogan, Benedict visited the grave of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of the secular Turkish state after World War I.

He met later with the nation's chief Muslim religious figure, Ali Bardakoglu, who was among the fiercest critics of the pope's speech two months ago, and Turkey's president, Ahmed Necdet Sezer. Later in the evening, he met with members of the world's diplomatic corps. At every stop, he stressed the need for greater joint efforts to end terrorism, war and misunderstanding.

"I appreciate the efforts of numerous countries currently engaged in rebuilding peace in Lebanon, Turkey among them," he told the diplomats. "In your presence, ambassadors, I appeal once more to the vigilance of the international community, that it not abandon its responsibilities, but make every effort to promote peace and dialogue."

In Turkey, Pope Reaches Out To Islam (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 28 -- Pope Benedict XVI, beginning the most politically precarious journey of his papacy, called Tuesday for an "authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims" to help stanch terrorism and conflicts around the globe.

The pontiff, trying to assuage the hostility he provoked in September when he quoted a medieval Christian emperor who associated Islam with violence, said he wanted to use his visit to Turkey -- his first trip to a Muslim country since becoming pope -- "to reiterate my great esteem for Muslims."

Few papal tours in recent years have been more ambitious in their efforts to patch religious rivalries or more fraught with the danger of inciting deeper divides than Benedict's four-day, three-city Turkish itinerary. The visit comes not only at a diplomatically sensitive moment in Benedict's 19-month-old papacy, but at a critical juncture in Turkey's relations with the West and at a time of internal struggle over the soul of this constitutionally secular republic.

Instead of the crowds of emotional faithful that greet traveling popes on most of their foreign excursions, Benedict was met Tuesday with empty highways lined by soldiers and sharpshooters, and headlines such as the Islamic newspaper Vakit's "Unwanted Guest." On Sunday, an estimated 25,000 people turned out for a protest rally in Istanbul to demand that he cancel the trip.

The Turkish government has deployed thousands of security officers and riot police for the papal tour, a police presence that Turkish officials said is larger than the one used when President Bush attended a NATO summit here two years ago.

Vatican and Turkish officials scrambled to make last-minute schedule changes in an effort to avoid embarrassments or appearances of slights. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who initially said he had no time to see the pope, squeezed in a 20-minute visit at the airport Tuesday afternoon before departing for a NATO summit in Latvia. The pope, who has alarmed some Muslims with his plans to visit Istanbul's Haghia Sophia museum -- built as a church in the 6th century and later converted into a mosque -- added the renowned Blue Mosque to his agenda as an overture to Muslims.

Even so, every visit and meeting on the pope's agenda is heavily laden with symbolism, stark contradictions or the prospect of controversy. In his first public event, the world's most visible religious leader laid a wreath of red and white carnations at the tomb of Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern, secular Turkey and the man who removed Islam as the state religion.

Within hours of his arrival in the Turkish capital, Benedict stood on an auditorium stage with Turkey's chief Islamic cleric, Ali Bardakoglu, who last September accused the pontiff of harboring "hatred in his heart" for Muslims.

Both men wore shimmering, floor-grazing robes -- the pope a simple, caped vestment, Bardakoglu an elaborate, embroidered coat.

Bardakoglu, who heads Turkey's Directorate of Religious Affairs, confronted the pontiff's September remarks head-on.

"We Muslims condemn all types of violence and terror, regardless of whoever commits it against whosever," he said. "However, we all regret to observe that during the recent times Islamophobia has been in escalation promoting such notions that the religion of Islam with its sources and history encourages violence."

Bardakoglu said every Muslim is "deeply touched and offended by such accusations," which he said "only serve to encourage those who perform wrongdoings on behalf of religion." Despite his disagreements with the pope, Bardakoglu described the papal trip as "a positive step toward cultivating a culture of reconciliation."

In his address, Benedict said, "The best way forward is via authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims, based on truth and inspired by a sincere wish to know one another better, respecting differences and recognizing what we have in common."

He also offered up another historical anecdote, one that conveyed a more positive view of Islam. The pontiff cited Pope Gregory VII, who in 1076 praised a Muslim prince who treated Christians with "great benevolence . . . because we believe in one God, albeit in a different manner."

According to Erdogan, the prime minister, the pope also made another conciliatory gesture Tuesday, reversing the position he took in 2004 when, as Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he said Turkey was "in permanent contrast to Europe" and should not be admitted into the European Union.

"I asked the pope for his support on our road to the European Union," Erdogan said after their meeting. "He told me, 'We want Turkey to be part of the E.U.' " The Vatican did not comment on Erdogan's statement.

Over the next two days, the pope will meet in Istanbul with Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians. The Vatican has been attempting to improve relations with the Orthodox church after more than 1,000 years of division, while Turkey has attempted to suppress many activities of the Orthodox church.

The pope acknowledged to reporters traveling on his plane that his agenda in Turkey is ambitious. "Naturally, we should not exaggerate," he said, speaking in Italian. "It is not possible to expect major results in three days. The value, I might say, is symbolic."

The government has banned protests during the pope's visit, and only a small demonstration was held in Ankara on Tuesday. But the government has been unable to change public opinion.

"His words against the Islamic world led to this criticism," said Yetkin Bayer, 40, a physician working in a busy government clinic in one of Istanbul's poorer neighborhoods. "Otherwise, the Turkish people would be neutral about his visit. Now, no matter what he might say, he won't get much sympathy."

Special correspondent Yonca Poyraz-Dogan in Istanbul contributed to this report.

Benedict Goes To Turkey (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

The visit of Pope Benedict XVI to Turkey was bound to be fraught, even before the pontiff's tone-deaf comments about Islam in September. As a high-ranking Vatican official in 2004 — the year before he became pope — Benedict went on record opposing Turkey's entry into the European Union, saying, in effect, that a predominantly Muslim country would never fit into a Christian Europe.

On his trip this week, the pope is being more diplomatic. Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, announced that Benedict had told him it was now the Vatican's wish that Turkey join the European Union. A papal spokesman was less direct, saying the Vatican was encouraging Turkey's "integration" into Europe. We hope that the pope's evolving stance — coupled with his calls for Christian-Muslim dialogue — will soothe popular anger in Turkey and across the Muslim world.

During his papacy, Benedict has repeatedly emphasized what he calls reciprocity, the notion that Christian minorities in Muslim countries should be as free to practice their faith as Muslims are in the West. Turkey's rigid secularism has been a central tenet of the republic since its founding — and all too often has led to repressing minority rights and religious freedom. The rigidity is now giving way — due in large part to the reforms required to meet the membership criteria of the European Union. As the pope champions the rights of Christians in Turkey and other Muslim lands, he should bear in mind that his words will be most effective if he makes clear that the West still has a long way to go in defending the rights of minorities.

The pope and his Turkish hosts are to be commended for going ahead with the trip in the face of so much dissension. Turkey needs to engage in a full debate over minority and religious rights — and how it relates to the West. Benedict's role in furthering that debate and promoting better interfaith relations may prove to be helpful.

More Catholic Than The ... (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

TODAY, POPE BENEDICT XVI will meet in Turkey with a representative of a religious tradition whose sometimes violent differences with the Roman Catholic Church can be traced back to the Crusades. That personage is not, as one might think, a Muslim, but a Christian: Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I of the Eastern Orthodox Church.

Although the Crusades were called to wrest back the Holy Land from Muslims, the Catholic foot soldiers in that "holy war" vandalized the sacred places of Orthodox Christians, looting Hagia Sophia, the Cathedral of Holy Wisdom, in Constantinople. (On Thursday, Benedict will visit Hagia Sophia, which was transformed into a mosque in the 15th century and is now a museum.)

News coverage of the pope's trip has focused on Catholic-Muslim relations, given the outrage in the Muslim world over a lecture in September in which Benedict quoted a medieval emperor who said Muhammad's teachings contained "things only evil and inhuman." The visit also has been shadowed by the pope's opposition as a cardinal to the admission of Turkey into the European Union, a position he repudiated Tuesday.

Yet the religious purpose of the journey is to strengthen relations between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern churches that do not recognize the authority of the bishop of Rome. Benedict's attitude toward these ancient churches could offer as many insights into his view of his role as any of his dealings with Muslims.

Benedict will travel to Istanbul — the former Constantinople — to meet Patriarch Bartholomew, the "first among equals" among Orthodox prelates. After a service in the Orthodox cathedral, the two will sign a joint declaration. It's likely to be more substantive than a conversation in Rome last week between Benedict and Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams. That encounter, while cordial, ended with a communique noting that a reunion between the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches faced "serious obstacles," including the ordination of women as Anglican priests and the acceptance by some Anglican churches of openly gay clergy.

By contrast, the Eastern Orthodox Church, like the Roman Catholic Church, limits its priesthood to men, condemns homosexual relations and values traditional forms of worship. The affinities between the pope and the patriarch are theological, but they could have political consequences. Many of the churches that complain of oppression by Islamic governments (including the Orthodox Church in Turkey) have roots in Constantinople, not Rome. If the pope plans to be their champion, he will need to build bridges to Muslims as well as fellow Christians.

Report Shows Muslims Near Bottom Of Social Ladder (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

NEW DELHI, Nov. 24 — Even those who caution against "illusions of grandeur and power," as the head of India's governing coalition, Sonia Gandhi, did last week, cannot hide their sense of pride at the idea of India as a nation that extends the concessions of secular democracy to its many castes, creeds and faiths.

Yet that notion has come under some strain in recent days, with an official panel having concluded that Muslims, India's largest religious minority, are "lagging behind" on most things that matter.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office, which is reviewing the report, summarized the panel's biting conclusion this way: "The community is relatively poor, more illiterate, has lower access to education, lower representation in public- and private-sector jobs and lower availability of bank credit for self-employment. In urban areas, the community mostly lives in slums characterized by poor municipal infrastructure."

Muslims make up roughly 13 percent of India's population of 1.1 billion, and their numbers are nearly equal to the entire population of Pakistan, which was carved out of British India nearly 60 years ago as the homeland of the subcontinent's Muslims. Soul-searching about Muslim rights and well-being in this country, which has witnessed periodic outbreaks of religious violence, has been a recurrent leitmotif ever since.

The latest findings have prompted fresh debate. In an editorial in The Indian Express, an English-language daily, Pratap Bhanu Mehta, the president of the Delhi-based Center for Policy Research, suggested that the government's panel had revealed "the hollowness of our concept of republican citizenship."

"What is at stake," Mr. Mehta said, "is not just uplifting this or that group, but the very idea of India itself: whether it has the capacity for transcending the cant, indifference and identity traps that have brought us to this pass."

The report is expected to be made public soon, but leaks in the last several weeks have already turned its contents into political fodder. Trial balloons have been floated about extending affirmative action benefits originally devised to uplift low-caste Hindus and others considered "backward," by offering additional set-asides in education and employment for Muslims.

The mark of "backwardness" is a boon in this country, where a government job can lift a family's fortunes forever, just as it is a vital part of political arithmetic: Secure jobs for a group, the reasoning goes, and you secure its loyalty at the polls.

A number of Muslim religious and political leaders have already begun to advocate quotas for Muslims. But the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party has pointed out that Indian law prohibits faith-based quotas.

The secretary of the panel that issued the report, Abusaleh Shariff, said in an interview this week that in some states, education and poverty indicators showed that Muslims had fallen behind even low-caste Hindus. Mr. Shariff said the panel recommended, among other things, free and compulsory education up to age 14, as well as financial support to promote industries in which Muslims are concentrated, like textiles.

The findings of the panel, headed by a retired high court judge, Rajinder Sachar, are expected to add to sparring over the Muslim vote, particularly in the elections to be held next year in India's largest state, Uttar Pradesh, where Muslims are a vital chunk of the electorate. The report will become public when Mr. Singh submits it to Parliament, possibly during its current session.

Among the panel's most damning statistics, as reported by The Indian Express, are that in many states Muslims are significantly overrepresented in prison. In the western state of Maharashtra, for instance, Muslims make up 10.6 percent of the population but 32.4 percent of those convicted or facing trial. In the famed national bureaucracy, the Indian Administrative Service, Muslims made up only 2 percent of officers in 2006. Among district judges in 15 states surveyed, 2.7 percent were Muslim.

Educational disparities were among the most striking. Among Muslims, Mr. Shariff said, the literacy rate is about 59 percent, compared with more than 65 percent among Indians as a whole. On average, a Muslim child attends school for three years and four months, compared with a national average of four years.

Less than 4 percent of Muslims graduate from school, compared with 6 percent of the total population. Less than 2 percent of the students at the elite Indian Institutes of Technology are Muslim. Equally revealing, only 4 percent of Muslim children attend madrasas, Mr. Shariff said.

The gaps in employment are likely to be among the most politically explosive. Muslims appear to be overrepresented in the informal sector of day laborers and street vendors and underrepresented in the public sector. Muslims secured about 15 percent of all government jobs, considerably less than the share filled by "backward" castes and Dalits, those who were considered "untouchables" in the Hindu caste system.

Whatever action the government decides to take, it will have to contend with a peculiar dimension of Muslim identity here. Since they are mostly converts from Hinduism or descendants of converts, Muslims in India are riven by caste. In other words, there are Muslim Dalits, as well as Muslims who are considered "backward."

To ignore those divides and entitle all Muslims to the same affirmative action benefits, Imtiaz Ahmad, a retired professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University argued, would be to reward only those at the upper reaches of the Muslim social ladder.

Many well-to-do Muslims, he said, particularly those with access to education, have benefited from the Indian economic advance in recent years. The Muslim community, he and other scholars point out, is made up of a small elite, vast numbers of poor people and very few people in between.

Whether India can deliver the fruits of economic progress to the many Muslims at the bottom of the ladder remains a crucial question.

At least, Mr. Ahmad argued, India has managed to address Muslim concerns without what he called the "coercive apparatus" that some European countries have adopted. He compared India's approach with that of the Netherlands, which recently banned the wearing of the Muslim burqa, or face-covering veil, in public places.

"There are many things we can say about Indian democracy," Mr. Ahmad said. "But it has given assurances, to minorities included, that things are negotiable."

Building A Democracy (WP)

By Viktor Yushchenko

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Two years ago an authoritarian regime's attempt to hijack the presidential election in Ukraine failed. As official results were announced, disbelief provoked millions of citizens to pour into the streets in protest. They took a stand against those discredited officials who hid behind law enforcement bodies in an attempt to prolong their corrupt hold on power. Those days and weeks are known as Ukraine's Orange Revolution.

In the time since, my main goal as president has been to institutionalize democracy and guarantee that it is irreversible. Many of the wrongs in my country have been corrected. We are maintaining our unwavering commitment to the principles of freedom. We agreed to shift constitutional powers from an authoritarian presidency to a coalition government formed by parliament to end the country's political impasse. And we abolished state censorship of the media, while also forbidding interference in news reporting.

This year free and fair elections were held at national, regional and local levels. Overseeing the peaceful and democratic transition of power was my unique test, as it brought back to office my former political opponents.

But along with our national successes and economic achievements under two "orange" prime ministers, there have been disappointments and miscalculations. Infighting among my political allies has been the biggest disappointment. Some "orange" politicians have ignored their fundamental duty to deliver results for the public good. Instead, gaining political power and seeking the limelight have become their goal. As our country's democracy continues to mature, I am convinced that a young cadre of leaders will rise through the ranks of Ukraine's democratic parties to create a political renewal.

On my watch, the corruption that has historically emanated from the president's office ceased. Thousands of election officials, tax collectors, foot patrols, road police and customs agents were brought to justice for petty corruption. Yet the biggest abusers of public office remain at large because of unreformed prosecutors and corruption in the courts. I have recently initiated a number of anti-corruption bills to reform the criminal justice system and the courts, and I will continue to press parliament for speedy action.

Because we were preoccupied with domestic political reforms this year, we failed to communicate effectively with our international partners. I want to explain where Ukraine stands and where we are heading. Democracy and stability -- two interdependent principles -- form the basis of my agenda. To this end, I will continue constitutional reforms that facilitate the effective work of government and prevent a return to authoritarianism or the usurpation of power.

Today there is a balance of political power between two directly elected democratic bodies: the president and parliament. The prime minister, although not directly elected, represents a majority of the parliamentarians. Bills specifying the role of the governing coalition and the opposition have yet to be passed. But let there be no mistake: Together we share responsibility for shaping, executing and controlling laws and state policies.

Second, constitutional reforms are incomplete, and as a result there is a political asymmetry. We will continue refining a reliable system of checks and balances between the presidency, parliament and coalition government to expedite policy decision making. To meet these objectives, I have commissioned a group of constitutional experts to recommend amendments to strengthen our nascent democratic institutions.

Third, our law on national security promotes participation and membership in pan-European and regional systems of collective security. Membership in the European Union and NATO, as well as good relations and strategic partnerships with Russia and other countries in the Commonwealth of Independent States, are not romantic ideas of the Orange Revolution -- they are founded in Ukrainian law. The president, coalition government and parliament determine the speed with which these goals are reached.

Most important, the democratic debates in Kiev's halls of power are now centered on ideas about competing economic theories, values and worldviews. Our current system of checks and balances requires policy coordination, party coexistence and political compromise for us to move forward. Not everyone likes the new rules of the game, and some are having trouble playing in this new reality -- but Ukraine's democracy is here to stay.

As president, my historic mission is to guarantee that Ukraine's national goals are reached not through political dictates but through an institutionalized democratic process that brings together governing bodies and citizen groups. I am convinced an inclusive democracy is one of the most significant and lasting achievements of the Orange Revolution.

The writer is president of Ukraine.

Back To Beijing (WP)

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

TWO MONTHS after a high-profile visit to China, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. is planning a December return -- this time accompanied by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke as well as a handful of fellow Cabinet members. The visit is the first in a series of biannual meetings and reflects Mr. Paulson's conviction that high-level intergovernment contacts can help promote policy breakthroughs. It's a worthy effort, but there's no certain payoff. U.S. officials have spent the past few years urging China to rein in its trade surplus, which causes an imbalance in the world economy as well as impatience in Congress. But China's surplus has nonetheless ballooned defiantly.

China's trade surplus reflects an extremely high savings rate: The Chinese are saving so hard that they don't buy what they make and instead export it. Taming the trade surplus must involve shifting China's economy from saving to consumption. But despite repeated promises from its top leaders to move in this direction, China has done nothing of the sort. As of 2005, the Chinese consumed only 38 percent of their gross domestic product (GDP) -- less than in the 1990s and less than every other country, according to Nicholas R. Lardy of the Peterson Institute for International Economics. By contrast, India consumes 61 percent of GDP and the United States consumes an excessive 70 percent.

China's policymakers could stoke consumption if they wanted. They have experimented with modest tax cuts and aim to reduce corporate saving by requiring state-owned firms to pay dividends, starting next year. But they have not taken the step that would make the biggest difference: Raising the government's spending on social services, which would directly boost the government's own consumption and have some effect on households, since one reason for high private savings is the absence of a public safety net. Nor has China allowed its currency to rise, a move that would help to ease the trade surplus. Although the yuan has gained modestly against the dollar over the past year, it has fallen against the currencies of other trading partners.

China has an interest in boosting consumption, so in theory Mr. Paulson should be pushing on an open door. The high-savings model depends on foreigners' readiness to buy ever more Chinese exports, but this will eventually trigger a protectionist backlash. It promotes capital-intensive growth, which is not the most effective way to create jobs for Chinese workers. And the path of capital-intensive growth tends to be energy-intensive, which is one reason China's coal consumption has shot up by two-thirds since 2000 and why China is home to 16 of the 20 cities in the world that score worst for air pollution. Yet all these arguments for a more consumption-based growth model have long been understood by Chinese technocrats. Change has been blocked by a combination of vested interests and political caution.

The United States has an interest in seeing the technocrats prevail. The environmental fallout from capital-intensive growth affects global warming, and China's manipulation of its currency and suppression of consumption undermine public faith in the fairness of globalization. Mr. Paulson is right to press these points to the Chinese. The question is whether China takes its global responsibilities seriously enough to listen.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Strikes Down Parts Of Executive Order On Terrorism (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

A Los Angeles federal judge has ruled that key portions of a presidential order blocking financial assistance to terrorist groups are unconstitutional, further complicating the Bush administration's attempts to defend its aggressive anti-terrorism tactics in federal courts.

U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released late Monday, found that two provisions of an executive order signed Sept. 23, 2001, are impermissibly vague because they allow the president to unilaterally designate organizations as terrorist groups and broadly prohibit association with such groups.

The ruling marks a victory for the Humanitarian Law Project and other plaintiffs in the case, who are seeking to provide support for the "lawful, nonviolent activities" of two groups designated terrorist organizations by the U.S. government: the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in Turkey and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), also known as the Tamil Tigers, in Sri Lanka.

They argue that federal anti-terrorism laws put charities and individual donors at risk of prosecution for providing benign assistance to foreign groups that have been added to the government's terrorism list.

David Cole, a Georgetown University law professor who is helping to represent the plaintiffs in the case, said the executive order and a related federal statute improperly allow President Bush to create "blacklists" and engage in "guilt by association."

"The court's decision confirms that even in fighting terror, unchecked executive authority and trampling on fundamental freedoms is not a permissible option," Cole said in a statement.

The ruling is the latest setback for the administration's terrorism and detention policies, in lower courts and at the Supreme Court. In August, a federal judge in Detroit ruled that a National Security Agency warrantless wiretap program is unconstitutional. The government has appealed that ruling.

Collins has previously issued similar rulings in favor of the Humanitarian Law Project, a Los Angeles group that has filed legal challenges to a 1996 anti-terrorism law and to the 2001 USA Patriot Act. Those issues are still being litigated after Congress rewrote parts of the Patriot Act.

The latest case focuses on Executive Order 13224, which is aimed at cutting off financing to alleged terrorist groups and is based on the 1977 International Emergency Economic Powers Act. Twenty-seven groups and individuals were initially named as "specially designated global terrorists" under the order -- including the PKK and the Tamil Tigers -- and hundreds more since have been added to the list.

In her ruling, Collins said the order is unconstitutional because there is "no apparent limit" on presidential authority to designate groups or individuals as terrorists. In addition, the judge ruled, language banning those "otherwise associated" with such groups is "unconstitutionally vague on its face." Collins rejected a number of other claims by the plaintiffs, however, including that the order's definition of a terrorist group is too vague.

The Justice Department said it is too early to decide on an appeal.

"We are pleased that the court rejected many of the constitutional arguments raised by the plaintiffs," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. "However, we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional."

Bruce Fein, a Justice Department official in the Reagan years who has criticized the Bush administration's broad assertions of executive power, said that appealing Collins's ruling may carry more risks for the government than simply changing the executive order's language.

"If they take this up on appeal, they risk another repudiation of this omnipotent-presidency theory that they have," Fein said.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Judge Rules 2001 Listing Of Terrorists Violated Law (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099450

A federal judge in Los Angeles has ruled that President Bush's designation of 27 groups and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" in a Sept. 23, 2001, executive order violated the Constitution because it was made without any announced standards.

The order "provides no explanation of the basis upon which these 27 groups and individuals were designated," the judge, Audrey B. Collins of Federal District Court in Los Angeles, wrote Monday.

"The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion."

That means, Judge Collins wrote, that "the president's designation authority is constitutionally vague."

David Cole, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, said yesterday that Judge Collins had broken new ground.

"It's the first decision to challenge the constitutionality of what is clearly the broadest power to blacklist individuals and groups on the statute books," Mr. Cole said.

The designation blocks financial and other interactions with the specified groups.

The challenge was brought by the Humanitarian Law Project, a human rights organization, and by groups of Tamil immigrants and people associated with them.

The plaintiffs said they wanted to provide lawful and nonviolent support to two of the organizations designated by Mr. Bush as terror organizations, the Kurdistan Workers' Party and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

Mr. Bush's order was based on a 1977 amendment to the Trading With the Enemy Act, which gave the president broad power to block transactions when the nation faces an "unusual and extraordinary threat."

In addition to designating the 27 groups and individuals, the order authorized the Treasury secretary to add more people or groups who provided services to or were "otherwise associated with" the original ones.

The plaintiffs said they feared being designated as terrorists given the breadth of the authority granted to the Treasury Department. The chilling effect of the possibility of being designated a terrorist organization, they said, impinged on their First Amendment right to freedom of association.

Judge Collins enjoined the government from designating the plaintiffs as terrorists based on their association with the two groups they sought to support but said the ban on providing services to them was not unconstitutionally vague.

Tasia Scolinos, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the government was pleased that Judge Collins upheld the ban on providing services to terrorist organizations.

"However," Ms. Scolinos said, "we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional."

The government initially responded by saying it had never used the "otherwise associated with" provision as the sole basis for a designation. It later revised its statement, saying it had done so in at least 2 of 375 further designations.

"It is axiomatic," Judge Collins ruled, "that the Constitution prohibits punishing a person for mere association."

She added that nothing in the executive order "limits its application only to those instances of association involving activity, let alone activity that furthers or advances an organization's illegal goals."

Like Mr. Bush's own authority under the 1977 law, the authority he delegated to the Treasury Department, Judge Collins wrote, "contains no definable criteria" and so "is unconstitutionally vague on its face."

Order Freezing Alleged Terrorist Funds Ruled Down (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in Los Angeles has ruled that the Bush administration violated the Constitution when it froze the assets of more than two dozen alleged terrorist groups after the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a ruling released Monday, held that an executive order Bush issued Sept. 24, 2001 — designating 27 groups and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" — was "unconstitutionally vague."

Collins said the order was flawed because it failed to explain the criteria used to make the designations and because it included no process to challenge the decision.

"The president's designation authority is subject only to his unfettered discretion," the judge said.

The ruling came in a long-running lawsuit before Collins in which humanitarian groups are seeking to support the nonviolent work of two groups that the secretary of State has designated as terrorist: the Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey; and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka.

Earlier in the case, Collins struck down portions of a law that made it a felony to provide "material support" to terrorists, saying that language in the Patriot Act, which had amended the law, was ill-defined. The Justice Department has often used the material support law in prosecuting terrorist cases.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency believed that the judge erred in her decision.

Collins' latest ruling could affect another one of the administration's most widely used authorities in its war on terrorism, although the full import of the ruling was not immediately clear.

U.S. officials have used the power to freeze the assets of hundreds of organizations and individuals around the world to try to choke off financing for what it views as illicit operations.

But Collins also said that many of the designations, especially those made by the Treasury Department rather than by Bush, were valid because they followed detailed procedures.

The executive order "was as sweeping as any in the government's post-9/11 arsenal, as it allowed the president to designate groups and individuals without finding that they fit any criteria whatsoever," said David Cole, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center. Cole was the lead counsel in the case, along with the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York civil liberties group.

Cole said Collins' ruling was limited to protecting the humanitarian groups in the pending suit from being declared terrorist groups by Bush without a fair hearing or adequate notice. But he said her reasoning did "call into question the validity of many of the existing designations." He said it remained to be seen whether those designated would file legal challenges.

Controls On Bank-Data Spying Impress Civil Liberties Board (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A civil liberties panel appointed by the White House received a classified briefing Tuesday on the Bush administration's program to monitor international banking transactions, and several members said they had come away impressed with the privacy controls in place to prevent abuses against Americans.

The program, which gives American intelligence officials access to large volumes of banking data through a Brussels consortium known as Swift, has been attacked by regulators in Europe, who view it as illegal and have threatened sanctions. But the administration gave no indication at Tuesday's briefing that it was rethinking the program, defending it as a vital tool in tracking terrorist financing.

The briefing, lasting nearly two hours, was held at the Treasury Department for the five members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, created at Congress's direction in 2004 to examine privacy issues related to the war on terror. The board received a similar classified briefing last week on the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program, created by President Bush soon after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The board's only Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, who was a senior aide to President Bill Clinton, said that before the latest briefing he had had doubts about the Swift banking program. But "I was impressed with the lengths to which these people have gone to avoid infringing on people's civil rights," Mr. Davis said in an interview. "It was less of a concern than I expected."

Democrats in Congress, however, have questioned the independence and resources of the board and its ability to inquire deeply into highly classified programs. Until last month the White House had resisted allowing the board to be briefed on the Swift and N.S.A. programs.

The White House has now allowed security clearances for the board to look at both, and for the Justice Department's inspector general to examine the N.S.A. program. Democrats have suggested that the election victory giving them imminent control of Congress spurred the White House's change of heart, an assertion that administration officials deny.

On Monday, the board gave Congressional aides a briefing on its work, and Democratic staff members raised questions about its independence, according to four officials who were present. Democratic aides said they were troubled to learn at the briefing that any final report produced by the board would be vetted by the White House and that the panel would not examine issues related to civil liberties outside American borders — for instance, at the Guantánamo Bay detention center.

Alan C. Raul, a Reagan White House adviser who is vice chairman of the panel, said that given what he heard at Tuesday's briefing, the government appeared to have tight controls to ensure that only people with clear terrorist links were made targets of the banking program.

"When you hear program operators tell you how carefully they make these judgments, it's striking, and you'd have to say impressive," Mr. Raul said. "The execution seems to be done with scrupulous attention to the privacy and civil liberties implications."

Mr. Davis, the board's Democratic member, echoed that assessment. "Based on what I've seen so far in both programs," he said of the banking and N.S.A. efforts, "I think they have struck the right balance" between detecting terrorist threats and ensuring Americans' civil liberties.

"But there's a big caveat," he added. "I don't know what I don't know, and we are looking forward to getting more information."

Man Mistakenly Abducted By C.I.A. Seeks Redress (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Nov. 28 — A lawyer for a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured while in C.I.A. custody in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons.

In May, a federal trial judge threw out the suit brought by Khaled el-Masri, who said he was an innocent victim of the Central Intelligence Agency's program of transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation. Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets.

Benjamin Wizner, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened.

Mr. Wizner said the government had not plausibly explained how national security interests might be harmed by a trial. He said President Bush acknowledged the C.I.A.'s program, known as extraordinary rendition, this summer, and it is widely known that other governments have been involved. A trial would not disclose state secrets but would merely involve "confirmation of a fact the entire world already knows," he said.

Gregory G. Katsas, a senior Justice Department lawyer, told the judges that courts must defer to the executive branch when it invokes the state secrets doctrine, which was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953.

Mr. Katsas said Porter J. Goss, who was the C.I.A. director when the suit was brought, filed a secret statement with the court outlining the agency's case against a trial. Mr. Katsas said the statement provided a detailed account of how seemingly innocuous disclosures "will have a cascading effect that will have devastating consequences" for national security.

Mr. Masri sat stolidly in the first row of the courtroom during the 50-minute argument. A large man with graying hair cinched in a ponytail, he said in an interview later that he was infuriated with Judge Ellis's view that there might be no remedy for the injustice apparently done to him.

Mr. Masri, who was born in Kuwait, was arrested in Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003, and flown to a prison in Afghanistan, where he was held for five months. During his incarceration, he has said, he was shackled, beaten and injected with drugs.

On Tuesday, he said through an interpreter that he was kept in deplorable conditions "not fit for a human being at all." Upon arrival in Afghanistan, he said, he was told that he was in a place where he had no right to recourse for what happened to him.

"I would like an explanation for what happened," he told reporters. "I would like an apology."

Mr. Wizner, his lawyer, said that although he believed Mr. Masri was entitled to financial compensation, he was not necessarily seeking anything beyond some official expression of remorse.

United States officials have been quoted anonymously in news reports as saying that Mr. Masri's case was one of mistaken identity; intelligence authorities may have confused him with an operative for Al Qaeda with a similar name.

The officials said Mr. Masri was released in May 2004 on the orders of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, after she learned he had been mistakenly identified as a terrorism suspect. He was freed in Albania, where he was left to make his way home to Germany, which he likened to being treated "like a piece of luggage."

Mr. Masri, who had earlier been denied permission to come to the United States to attend the hearing, said he has not been able to find a job since his return to Germany. "Both my Arab and German friends keep their distance," he said.

On Wednesday, he is scheduled to meet with some Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who are exploring the rendition program and the Bush administration's increasingly frequent invocation of the state secrets doctrine to block lawsuits.

Federal Judges Consider Torture Case In Richmond Courtroom (WWVT)

By Mike Garrity

WWBT-TV, NBC 12, Richmond, VA, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099453

Journalists from around the world packed a Richmond courtroom today, as three federal judges considered whether a German man who says he was tortured by the CIA should have his case heard in U.S. Court. Today, attorneys representing the German man named Khaled El-Masri, argued the U.S. government made a mistake that it now does not want to admit.

Khaled El-Masri used an interpreter to speak to a crowd of journalists from as a far away as Russia and Germany outside Richmond's U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "I was humiliated, I was beaten, and I was drugged, and I was taken to Afghanistan against my will," says El-Masri through his interpreter.

Attorney's representing El-Masri claim that back in December 2003, the CIA kidnapped him while he was on vacation in Macedonia. They say the CIA mistook El-Masri for a terrorist with a similar name. They say the CIA flew El-Masri to Afghanistan, tortured him, and held him in a prison for months. Eventually, they say El-Masri was released and left stranded on a mountain top in Albania, a country he had never been to.

But when El-Masri tried to bring a case against the CIA in U.S. District Court this May, a judge dismissed his case. So today, El-Masri's lawyers asked for an appeal.

But both today and back in May, attorneys with the U.S. Justice Department argued that simply hearing the facts of El-Masri's case could jeopardize U.S. National Security. The government says the facts in the case could expose things like secret interrogation methods or the names of CIA operatives, but El-Masri's attorney, Ben Wizner, thinks otherwise. "That argument is not plausible. It's being used not to protect national security, but to avoid embarrassment and accountability," says Wizner.

Today U.S. Justice Department attorneys would not comment on the case. In the meantime, El-Masri says he's not looking for money, but an apology and explanation from the U.S. government. It could be months before the court of appeals rules whether to hear the case.

Unjustly Imprisoned and Mistreated, Khaled al-Masri Wants Answers the U.S. Government Doesn't Want to Give

RICHMOND, Nov. 28

Khaled al-Masri was supposed to have been disappeared by black-hooded CIA paramilitaries in the dead of night. One minute he was riding a bus in Macedonia, the next -- poof -- gone. Grabbed by Macedonian agents, handed off to junior CIA operatives in Skopje and then secretly flown to a prison in Afghanistan that didn't officially exist, to be interrogated with rough measures that weren't officially on the books. And then never to be heard from again -- one fewer terrorist in the post-9/11 world.

Instead, on Tuesday, Masri finds himself sitting in an American courtroom so elegant that even his experienced lawyers are commenting on its beautiful dark wood and graceful chandeliers. Dressed in white shirt sleeves and a modest maroon vest, Masri is waiting to see if the judges will allow the CIA to disappear him again.

This time, it's not the physical, flesh-and-blood, burly, ponytailed German citizen with six kids whom the U.S. government wants to make vanish from the face of the Earth. It's his legal case, his very right to have his argument heard in open court, that the CIA is seeking to have disappeared. They argue, citing the state-secrets privilege, that to proceed with the case would damage national security and that this damage outweighs any legal rights Masri may have.

The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District agreed with the government in May.

If they have their way this time, the pale Justice Department lawyers swaying back in their chairs before the three judges of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit would prohibit any judge and any jury anywhere from ever hearing the arguments in Masri's six legal pleadings and 40 exhibits, more than 1,000 pages in all. Much of the evidence was unearthed by German prosecutors and European Parliament investigators.

There are also the eight U.S. officials who confirmed to at least one American reporter that Masri spent months in a dank Afghan cell because a couple of CIA officials in Washington had a hunch he was someone he was not and that they just didn't move fast enough when they found out he wasn't. Countless other reporters in the United States and Europe have been told the same by unnamed government officials.

So basically, "the entire world can discuss this case . . . but not the U.S. courts?" Masri's lawyer Ben Wizner will momentarily ask the panel.

But for now, the first Invisible Man to appear on U.S. soil is listening intently to the other cases the judges have to consider before his, including one about an Internet user's First Amendment free-speech rights. Masri's translator, Ulrike Wiesner, whispers in his ear: "They can even burn the American flag here." Burning a German flag is illegal in Germany. Those crazy Americans.

Masri whispers back: "Well, let's see if that applies to us Indians." They laugh quietly.

Much of Masri's ordeal has been confirmed by the German government. He fled the civil war in Lebanon in 1985 when he was 21 and married a German woman. He was divorced 10 years later and then married a Lebanese woman. He worked as a carpenter, then truck driver, then car salesman. Since 2004 he has been unemployed and living with his children and wife in a one-room apartment.

His deteriorating living conditions were a stress on his marriage. On Dec. 30, 2003, he decided to get away, to take a bus trip to Macedonia to clear his head. To make a very long story shorter, Macedonian police took him off the bus and interrogated him at the Skopski Merak Hotel for 23 days.

This being the Internet age, Masri says in one legal declaration: From the hotel Web site "I can identify the actual room where I was held. . . . I even recognize one of the waiters who served me food during my detention there."

At some point a couple of people who sounded American showed up. On Jan. 23, 2004, things took a bad turn. Current and former CIA officials say Masri was believed to have a fake passport and the same name as someone else they were looking for.

He was eventually brought to another room where, according to his affidavit, "I felt two people violently grab my arms. . . . I then felt someone else grab my head with both hands so I was unable to move. . . . Finally they stripped me completely naked and threw me to the ground. . . . I felt a boot in the small of my back. I then felt a stick or some other hard object being forced in my anus. I realized I was being sodomized. Of all the acts these men perpetrated against me, this was the most degrading and shameful."

For his flight to Afghanistan, Masri was blindfolded, "my ears were plugged with cotton, and headphones were placed over my ears. A bag was placed over my head and a belt around my waist. They put something hard over my nose. Because of the bag, breathing was getting harder and harder for me. . . . I began to panic."

He spent five months in a filthy secret prison set up by the CIA and guarded by Afghans. He was made to drink water so putrid it made him vomit. He slept on a single blanket, shivered through the cold months and was fed chicken bones and skin. He was beaten and interrogated many times, sometimes by people he believes to be Americans. He went on a hunger strike, lost 60 pounds.

Eventually the CIA caught up with its mistake. They argued with the State Department over whether to tell the Germans and eventually agreed they could not lie to such a close ally. So they chose to tell then-Interior Minister Otto Schily because he was thought to be Washington-friendly.

Masri was released in Albania, then flown to Germany, where he made his way home to Ulm. There, he contacted a lawyer and then the German authorities. "What I really want is for them to admit that injustice was done. I'd like an explanation and I'd like an apology," he said.

Is a state secret still a secret if everyone knows it? That's what the court case boils down to at this point.

Masri's lawyers say no.

They point to President Bush's Sept. 6, 2006, disclosure that the CIA ran secret prisons abroad and conducted covert rendition flights as part of its counterterrorism campaign.

They point to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's statement that if there were injustices in these programs, they can be remedied in U.S. courts.

They point to the testimony of Schily before the German Parliament just last week in which he said that then-U.S. Ambassador Daniel R. Coats had told him that the CIA had mistakenly imprisoned Masri and offered an apology -- not to Masri, but to the German government. They point to reams and reams of official German evidence.

The CIA and Justice Department lawyers strongly disagree. They argue that allowing a case to go forward could lead to a "cascading" of disclosures, many unforeseen, and that foreign governments would refuse to work in secret with the CIA for fear they could end up in court.

"Just because some facts are in the public domain doesn't eliminate the need to keep others secret," Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas argued Tuesday. The president's announcement, he added, has "zero overlap" with Masri's allegations. "Even disclosures to judges carry risks," he reminded them.

Before all this happened, "I was a very simple person with not many problems," Masri says, straining and pausing to find words, or gather his thoughts. "I had lots of friends. My head was not burdened with so many things. I felt more safe."

Today's Masri "has less freedom. . . . This Khaled stays mostly at home. There's too much stress. And my interests have changed. I am reading a lot now, about politics and prisoners."

He has testified before government panels in Spain, Germany and to the European Parliament investigating the CIA's covert activities. He is in the news constantly, often with allegations of alleged ties to terrorist groups. Still unemployed and reconciled with his wife, he hates the limelight. He hates the stares on the streets and the Germans who call out to him, as one did recently in the supermarket: "You are a bad man!"

He has flashbacks, too. And his mood turns bad whenever he sees war news, especially from the recent war in Lebanon, where he still has family. "I get in a bad mood and just want to be left alone in my room," he says, "to withdraw."

Today, 10 cameras are waiting for him to finish his omelet and coffee and walk into the courthouse. "I am very nervous inside," he says.

The last time Masri tried to come to the United States to listen to his court case, he and his attorney had walked off the plane in Atlanta and found 20 security guards waiting for them, both men said. He didn't have a visa because German citizens don't need visas to enter the United States. Instead of letting him in, one of officers drew his gun and threatened to shoot the lawyer if he did not put away his cellphone.

Flying back to the United States this week, Masri expected another hostile airport scene: "I had a funny feeling. I always thought they would take me and send me back to somewhere other than home."

This time immigration authorities were polite, looked through his luggage, asked him some questions, even spoke a little German. Eventually, one of them said "Welcome to America" and let him pass to the other side.

"I think it's really good I've gotten this far," he says with a slight smile.

Asked how he feels toward the United States after all this, he shrugs.

"I never thought badly of the United States. I do think badly of the foreign policy aspects and the sitting government."

Nudge a little further and he'll say he'd like "an America without Bush."

And a little further:

"I'd like to drive with the top down in a fancy car through New York City and to look up at all the tall buildings," he laughs, looking up to the ceiling and throwing open his arms. "You've got a real view of the whole thing from a car without a top."

Democrats Seek Republican Backing To Limit Bush's Surveillance (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Nov. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats, about to take control of Congress, say they will forge a bipartisan compromise to put limits on President George W. Bush's program of domestic eavesdropping of suspected terrorists.

Democrats say they already have a starting point for a compromise, noting that bipartisan proposals this year require court warrants for eavesdropping. At the same time, party leaders will be treading carefully in an effort to assure Americans that they can protect privacy without sacrificing vigilance, and to discredit Republican charges they are weak on national security.

``How will the Democrats proceed? I think gingerly," said Steven Aftergood, who directs a government secrecy project for the Federation of American Scientists in Washington. ``They can no longer function as a protest group."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without getting court warrants on communications between suspected al-Qaeda operatives in the U.S. and overseas.

While disclosure of the program triggered criticism from both parties, there is practically no chance the Republican-controlled Congress that returns to Washington next week will act on the issue, leaving it for the next Congress that convenes in January.

Rockefeller's Timetable

West Virginia Democrat Jay Rockefeller, who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in an interview Congress may be able to pass bipartisan legislation in six months.

Rockefeller said he supports ``collection of conversations where that is necessary for national security" but is disturbed by ``blanket" eavesdropping.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, the next Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, said the administration needs to provide more information to lawmakers about the program; Congress has been asked to ``legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge."

To pass legislation next year, Democrats will have to bridge a gap between lawmakers who favor requiring a search warrant in each case of surveillance, and those who would permit broad court authorization.

Democrats such as California Senator Dianne Feinstein have made individual warrants a prerequisite. Republicans say that would hobble the NSA's ability to move quickly.

Special Court

Bush agreed in negotiations with Republican Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter to authorize a special court that oversees intelligence and operates in secret to decide whether the eavesdropping was legal. The court was created under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to review, behind closed doors, requests for eavesdropping on suspected spies, terrorists and other foreign agents.

Specter's measure stalled this year, as did a House-passed bill to permit surveillance on condition that the president brief leaders of Congress.

Most Democrats opposed both measures, arguing that they failed to protect privacy and insisting that the 1978 law remain the exclusive means for authorizing surveillance. At the same time, no one in Congress has called for Bush to halt the program.

Democrats risk a political backlash ``if they tie the president's hands and if there are more attacks," said Robert Turner, who directs the center for national security law at the University of Virginia law school in Charlottesville. Any legislation must not ``require unplugging the headphones for a period of hours, days or weeks while some judge finds time to look at the paperwork," said Turner, who supports the president's program.

Specter's Support

Feinstein, a member of the Intelligence and Judiciary committees, would require the NSA to submit requests to the special court created under the 1978 law. Her legislation would permit emergency eavesdropping for seven days while a warrant is sought. Specter supports her proposal as an alternative to his own.

A separate House measure proposed by California Democrat Adam Schiff and Arizona Republican Jeff Flake would also require specific warrants and force Bush to tell congressional committees who is being wiretapped and why.

The measure ``has broad bipartisan support and would probably be a starting point" for debate next year, said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi of California.

Bush's allies say it is impractical to force the NSA to seek warrants because it must act quickly to sift through a large volume of messages. ``Something like that simply would not work," Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, a Kansas Republican, said in an interview.

Civil Libertarians

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, urged congressional hearings to ``grapple with this immediately."

A U.S. appeals court is reviewing a ruling by a federal judge in Detroit declaring that the NSA program is illegal. Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine told Congress this week he will investigate the agency's ``compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

Civil libertarians say that, with the midterm congressional elections over, they may pick up support from such Republicans as Senators Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and John Sununu of New Hampshire, who have voiced concern about the surveillance.

``The limited-government types and the strong-executive types" are split, increasing chances some Republicans will support constraints on the spying program, said Richard Epstein, a University of Chicago law school professor who favors court supervision of the surveillance.

The longer Congress waits, he said, ``the longer becomes the implied ratification that the president is within his rights." Last Updated: November 29, 2006 00:12 EST

Watching The Watchers (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard column, November 29, 2006

The Bush administration would deny it, but the impending Democratic takeover of Congress seems to be already affecting how it does business.

After a year of refusing to do so, the Justice Department has announced a narrow review of President Bush's secret domestic eavesdropping program. The surveillance program, which monitors international communications to and from the United States, has been controversial since it was first disclosed _ and the subject of a preliminarily successful court challenge _ because the president had decreed that the National Security Agency need not obtain warrants.

Congressional Democrats had asked the department to review the program a year ago, but plans for even a preliminary investigation were derailed when Bush blocked security clearances for Justice investigators. Now, the White House has told the department it will approve the required clearances.

The review will be headed by Justice's respected watchdog, Inspector General Glenn Fine. But the review will be confined to examining whether department lawyers met all the legal requirements in dealing with the NSA and making use of any information obtained from intercepts. Fine will not weigh in on the key issue _ whether the warrantless eavesdropping is legal and constitutional.

The Democrats have promised congressional investigations into precisely that point when they take over next year.

Also, after only grudgingly acquiescing in its creation and then stalling it off for a year, the Bush administration allowed the NSA to brief the congressionally created and presidentially appointed Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board. In guarded comments to reporters later, several board members said they were surprised and impressed by the NSA's privacy safeguards.

The administration has been notoriously hostile to any questioning, criticism or skepticism of its national-security initiatives, and for six years a compliant Republican-run Congress neglected its vital oversight function.

Better late than never _ that seems about to change, although it took a political earthquake to do it.

Report Rejects European Denial Of C.I.A. Activity (NYT)

By Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A new report by the European Parliament bluntly rejected the assertions by several European countries that they were unaware of a C.I.A. program to secretly abduct, transport and detain terror suspects.

"Many governments cooperated passively or actively" with the Central Intelligence Agency, said Giovanni Claudio Fava, who led a special inquiry. "They knew." The report said that 11 European countries, including Britain, Italy and Germany, knew of the agency's activities.

The report, issued Tuesday in Brussels, offered new confirmation of the United States' practice of so-called extraordinary renditions, in which suspects were abducted, then transported, with European complicity, to third countries where they might face harsh interrogation methods.

Mr. Fava's report followed an inquiry conducted for the Council of Europe, the European human rights watchdog organization. That report, written by Dick Marty, a member of the Swiss Parliament, described what the council called a "reprehensible network" created by the C.I.A., one that was allowed to exist through the "intentional or grossly negligent collusion of the European partners."

Mr. Marty's report was based largely on news reports, legal proceedings and other public information. But Mr. Fava asserted that his committee had obtained, from a confidential source, records of an informal meeting of European Union and NATO foreign ministers on Dec. 7, 2005, "confirming that member states had knowledge of the program of extraordinary rendition and secret prisons." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was among the participants, it said.

President Bush confirmed on Sept. 6 that the C.I.A. had been operating a secret detention program, and said 14 prisoners held abroad were being sent to the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The European Union-NATO meeting came just over a month after The Washington Post reported that the C.I.A. had been holding its "most important Al Qaeda captives at a Soviet-era compound in Eastern Europe." It did not name the country involved, though the group Human Rights Watch subsequently named Poland and Romania as leading possibilities.

Mr. Fava's draft report asserted that at least 1,245 C.I.A.-operated flights flew through Europe's airspace or stopped at its airports, and listed Poland as among the countries least cooperative with its inquiry.

The committee said that when it asked the Polish authorities for copies of the flight logs of 11 C.I.A.-operated flights, it was told that these were "said not to have been retained, then said to have been faxed and destroyed, and finally said to have been saved in an unspecified place." The report quoted Szymany airport employees as describing what it said transpired there in 2002 and 2003, when six Gulfstream jets with civilian registration numbers parked at the edge of the airport, not entering customs clearance.

Quoting a former senior airport official, it said that the authorities had been directly ordered not to approach the aircraft and that vehicles, bearing military registration numbers associated with the intelligence training base in nearby Stare Kiejkuty, would await each aircraft.

Zbigniew Gniatkowski, a spokesman for the Polish mission to the European Union, said Tuesday that Poland stood by its previous denials of any involvement.

European Report Details Flights By CIA Aircraft (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

BRUSSELS, Nov. 28 -- Most days, the skies are quiet over the Szymany airport, a mothballed runway in rural Poland. So the airport director took note when strangers showed up on at least six occasions in 2002 and 2003, offering to pay large sums of cash to land planes from faraway places such as Afghanistan.

When the chartered civilian planes arrived, they followed the same secretive drill, Mariola Przewlocka, former director of the airport, told investigators from the European Parliament last week. To avoid prying eyes, she said, the aircraft would sit at the end of the runway and wait for unmarked minivans to arrive. In the dark, it was hard to tell whether people got on or off. But in at least one case, a flight took off with several passengers for Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, records show.

"More money was being paid for these landings than any other landings," Przewlocka told the investigators, adding that the people who brought the money spoke excellent Polish but that the invoices indicated the jet owners were from the United States. "The landings of these aircraft were part of the work of secret services, as we understood it," she recalled.

Details of the flights and testimony from airport employees constitute "serious circumstantial evidence" that Szymany was the transfer point for a nearby secret prison run by the CIA, according to a report released Tuesday by a European Parliament committee that is investigating CIA counterterrorism operations in Europe.

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, called the European Parliament report "hysterical in its hyperbole." He said the committee was leaping to conclusions about the missions of the CIA flights and improperly assuming that they all had a "nefarious" intent.

"There are numerous, numerous reasons for CIA flights to Europe," he said in a telephone interview. "By and large, they are a symbol of cooperation between our countries and the sharing of information, not illegal activity."

The committee said that it had found records of 1,245 CIA-operated flights landing at European airports or passing through European airspace, though it found evidence of only a handful of cases in which prisoners were transported.

The investigative committee said it suspected that the prison held captured al-Qaeda leaders and that it was housed in a nearby Polish intelligence training center at Stare Kiejkuty, in northeastern Poland. Although the committee acknowledged that it lacked proof, it cited testimony of airport employees that they were kept away from the mysterious flights by Polish military officials and were prohibited from conducting passenger checks or customs inspections.

The CIA declined to comment Tuesday on the parliamentary findings. The government of Poland has repeatedly denied allowing the CIA to operate a prison on its territory.

"The committee's report, from what we know so far, is not based on any strong proof but only commonly repeated assumptions, suspicions and probabilities," Krzysztof Lapinski, spokesman for Poland's minister for special services, told the Associated Press in Warsaw.

The European Parliament accused Poland of blocking the probe, saying that high-ranking Polish officials refused to meet with the panel. It also accused the Polish government of withholding or destroying flight logs pertaining to CIA flights at Szymany and other airports.

Also Tuesday, the Polish newspaper Gazeta Wyborcza reported that international flight logs showed that a single Gulfstream jet used by the CIA landed five times in Warsaw, the capital, and once at Szymany between February and July 2003. Four of the flights originated in Afghanistan, the paper reported.

In November 2005, The Washington Post first reported the presence of clandestine CIA prisons in Eastern Europe. The Post withheld the exact locations at the request of the White House, which argued that divulging such details could jeopardize active counterterrorism operations and subject the host countries to retaliation from al-Qaeda and its sympathizers.

In September, President Bush acknowledged the existence of the CIA's overseas prison network for the first time. He said that 14 inmates had been transferred to the U.S. Navy prison at Guantanamo Bay and that the "black sites" had been emptied, although he did not rule out using them again.

No European country has admitted allowing the CIA to run secret prisons on its territory. But the parliamentary committee said it had obtained records describing an "informal" Dec. 7, 2005, meeting of foreign ministers from the European Union and NATO "confirming that member states had knowledge" of the secret prisons. The meeting was attended by Rice and other U.S. officials, according to the report.

"The decision has been to keep mum and shroud decisions in secrecy," said Giovanni Claudio Fava, an Italian member of the European Parliament who led the investigation. "Many of our governments have cooperated actively and passively."

The committee report also cited evidence that the CIA may have operated a prison in Romania and said it "cannot exclude," based on testimony by Romanian officials, "the possibility that US secret services have operated in Romania on a clandestine basis."

The panel said it "expresses serious concern" about 21 stopovers by CIA-operated aircraft landing in Romania, including a crash landing by a Gulfstream jet in Bucharest on Dec. 6, 2004.

Although no one was reported injured, seven passengers on board the flight "disappeared" after the accident, and Romanian air transport investigators never learned their identities, according to the report. The plane had started its journey at Bagram air base, the site of a U.S. prison in Afghanistan.

Man Pleads Guilty In Plan To Aid Taliban (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0099459

By Joe Stinebaker

The AP, November 28, 2006

HOUSTON -- A Houston man pleaded guilty after he and a Pakistani living illegally in the United States were charged with conspiring to join the Taliban and fight against U.S. forces, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Kobie Diallo Williams, 33, and Adnan Babar Mirza, 29, underwent training in guns and reconnaissance in the Houston area in preparation for joining up with the Taliban, prosecutors said.

The two men were charged with conspiracy. Mirza, a Pakistani who overstayed a student visa, also was charged with violating federal gun laws.

Williams, a U.S. citizen and a student also known as Abdul Kabir, surrendered Tuesday to members of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to the conspiracy charge. Mirza was already in custody on immigration violations.

"While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with the 9-11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," said Roderick Beverly, the head of the FBI's Houston office.

Federal prosecutors also said Williams had provided about $350 to Taliban members or their families.

Williams' attorney, Alamdar S. Hamdani, said Williams chose not to fight the charges.

"He made a grave mistake," said Hamdani. "And he has come forward to own up to that."

Prosecutors could not say on Tuesday whether Mirza had an attorney.

Williams and Mirza were held without bail. Williams could get up to five years in prison, Mirza 35 years.

The indictment said Williams and Mirza viewed U.S. and coalition forces in Afghanistan and Iraq as "invaders" and decided in April 2005 that they should travel to the Middle East to fight with the Taliban in Afghanistan.

U.S. Citizen Wanted To Join The Taliban, Officials Say (ABC)

By Brian Ross

ABC News' The Blotter, November 29, 2006

A United States citizen and a Pakistani national who overstayed his visa have been charged with planning to provide aid and financial support to the Taliban.

The two Houston-area men, Kobie Diallo Williams and Adnan Babar Mirza, have been indicted by a federal grand jury and have been charged with attempting to obtain firearms and training so they could join the Taliban and fight against U.S. and coalition forces.

According to the indictment, in April 2005, Williams and Mirza agreed that they should travel to the region and fight with the Taliban because they viewed U.S. and coalition forces as invaders.

The two allegedly sought firearms training in the Houston area on at least eight occasions between May 2005 and June 2006. Mirza was in possession of an Armalite M15A4 rifle, a .308 rifle and a 12-gage shotgun, the indictment states. Since he had entered the U.S. in August 2001 on a student visa that expired on Dec. 12, 2005, Mirza, under U.S. law, was prohibited from possessing any firearms. According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, the men were also in possession of a Glock pistol and other weapons.

The indictment unsealed today states, "Williams and Mirza would and did meet at various shooting ranges and camp sites in the Southern District of Texas for the purpose of conducting firearms and paramilitary training to hone their skills with weapons to assist fighters engaging United States forces in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq."

In addition to the alleged firearms training, the men also agreed to provide financial support to the Taliban and their families, the indictment alleges. According to the indictment, Williams sent $350 to Taliban members and their family members on two occasions.

"The expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Roderick Beverly.

Since it has been deemed a terrorist organization, federal law prohibits any financial or other support to the Taliban, the violation of which carries a maximum sentence of five years. In today's arraignment, Williams pleaded guilty while Mirza, who was arrested last Wednesday by federal agents for overstaying his visa, is scheduled to have his detention hearing in the next several days.

Two Houston men have been charged with planning to aid the Taliban.

One of the terror suspects attended U of H downtown and the other attended classes at several HCC campuses.

Currently, they are both being held without bond in the federal detention center downtown.

Federal authorities say Kobie Williams is one of two men who had been training to use firearms with hopes of leaving Houston and joining the Taliban.

"And to fight the Jihad against American and Coalition forces overseas in the battle that is going on now," said U. S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

The other suspect is Adnan Mirza, a Pakistani citizen, who had overstayed his student visa and was living in a westside Houston apartment complex.

Mirza was attending Houston Community College and working as an accountant at a small business.

Kobie Williams, also known as Abdul Kabeer, lived in an apartment in the Galleria area.

He attended U of H downtown and was working part time at Rice University in its engineering department.

Both men were seen on several occasions practicing with firearms at the American Shooting Center off Westheimer. How did the government learn about them?

"It was a referral from the border patrol as far as suspicious activity that they noted," said Rod Beverly, head of the Houston FBI office.

Beverly would not get into specifics, but Senator John Cornyn was quick to point out to us that Mirza was here illegally.

"Whether you provided aid to the Taliban or simply overstayed your visa, we ought to be enforcing our immigration laws," said Sen. Cornyn.

The United States government says Williams, who is an American, provided financial support of $350, money he thought was going to the Taliban and their families.

His attorney John Floyd said his client pleaded guilty today and is remorseful.

"I can tell you that he has expressed to us that this all began with frustration with what's going on with the war in Iraq. This was due to his frustration that he acted out in a way that now he sees was improper," said Floyd.

Houston Pair Are Accused Of Aiding Taliban (HC)

By Cindy George, Anita Hassan And Dale Lezon, Houston Chronicle

One who made a 'donation' pleads guilty; officials say both men trained to fight U.S. forces

Kobie Williams left Ramadan baskets packed with chocolate-laced trail mix on his neighbors' doorsteps and wistfully spoke of going to Egypt to study the Quran. Adnan Mirza was active in Muslim groups and spent his Sundays at a Houston soup kitchen feeding the homeless.

To their friends and families, Williams, 33, and Mirza, 29, were enthusiastic college students dedicated to God and family.

But Justice Department officials presented a shockingly different view of the men Tuesday, branding both as Taliban supporters — one contributing $350 to terrorists — who conspired to train with weapons with the goal of fighting U.S.-led forces in the Mideast.

Williams, a University of Houston-Downtown student also known as Abdul Kabeer or Abdul Kabir, pleaded guilty to the accusations Tuesday before U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. Scheduled for sentencing on Feb. 23, he faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Mirza, a Pakistani national who was in the country on an expired student visa, faces the same potential penalty if convicted. Additionally, he has been indicted on three firearms charges, each of which could bring a 10-year sentence and a $250,000 fine upon conviction.

"While these subjects did not operate at a high level of sophistication in comparison with Sept. 11 hijackers, the expressed goal was to aid the Taliban by training to carry out jihad against coalition troops in the Middle East," FBI Special Agent in Charge Roderick Beverly said in a statement.

"In this post 9/11 era," U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle said, "threats against our international security efforts are taken most seriously."

Late Tuesday, authorities took into custody a cousin of Mirza, searching the cousin's home and confiscating documents, receipts, and anything in Arabic they couldn't understand, relatives said.

The indictments unsealed Tuesday came five months after federal authorities in Miami said they had uncovered an Islamist plot to attack U.S. targets including the 110-story Sears Tower in Chicago. Seven people were apprehended in that investigation.

Firearms training allegedIn the Houston case, authorities contended Williams, a U.S. citizen, and Mirza engaged in firearms training on at least eight occasions in the past 18 months. Investigators said the sessions took place in Harris and nearby counties.

DOJ_NMG_0099461

Additionally, Williams provided $350 in support to Taliban members or their families.

In Tuesday's court session, Williams told the judge that "We knew that you couldn't get money to the Taliban." He added that he gave $350 to a "gentleman."

"Adnan informed us that there was a hospital that most of the families go to," Williams said.

"What families?" Werlein asked.

"Widows and children," Williams responded.

Williams, a thick-bearded man dressed in a white shirt and black trousers, spoke in a firm voice as he confirmed the prosecutor's allegations of firearms practice at shooting ranges and area campgrounds. He also admitted that he considered coalition forces fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq invaders.

He told Werlein he was studying computer science at UH-Downtown after receiving an associate's degree in electrical engineering technology. Williams also was listed as a technician on Rice University's civil engineering Web site, but his connection with that institution could not be confirmed Tuesday night.

'Not a crazy dude'

Residents at the southwest Houston apartment complex where Williams lived with his wife expressed shock at the arrests.

"He was not a crazy dude," said Joshua White, who noted that last year the couple had organized the neighborhood's crime-fighting National Night Out.

Williams was "very into his religion," White said, but didn't seem fanatical. White, who had known Williams about 18 months, said they occasionally debated religion.

When Williams spoke of a desire to travel to Egypt to study the Quran, White admonished his neighbor "not to go crazy over there." Williams laughed.

Another neighbor, Taylor Cole, described Williams as "a real nice guy."

At Ramadan, he said, Williams and his wife left a basket of treats on his doorstep along with a booklet explaining the religious observance.

Shock and dismay also were expressed by Mirza's uncle, aunt and cousin, with whom he shared a two-bedroom townhome on the southwest side.

"We know these are false charges," the cousin, Ali Qazi, 22, said.

Five years in Houston

Qazi said Mirza, a Kuwait-reared Pakistani, is studying biomedical technology at Houston Community College's Town and Country campus. Mirza, he said, has lived in Houston for five years. Qazi said the accused man has been very active with Islamic community groups, and routinely collects spare food from restaurants to feed the homeless.

In the past year, Qazi said, Mirza had developed an interest in hunting. Authorities said that individuals in the United States on student visas — or illegally — may not legally own firearms. He said authorities confiscated a shotgun and ammunition when they raided the home last week.

As Qazi spoke with a reporter about the case, Mirza's aunt, who asked not to be identified, prayed and wept.

"He's almost 30 years old, so he does everything on his own," Qazi said. "We don't ask questions about how he lives."

Late Tuesday, Qazi said authorities had taken his brother into custody. Qazi said he did not know why.

Qazi said his brother's wife called relatives about 8 p.m., saying that either or both the FBI or immigration agents arrived at her southwest Houston apartment. Authorities took anything in Arabic they couldn't understand, the wife told Qazi, including her Quran.

A local FBI spokeswoman said she could not comment because she was not aware of an arrest.

At the nearby Masjid Lel-Farouq mosque that Mirza attended, members Tuesday night expressed surprise at the federal accusations.

"He's the kindest, sweetest person," said one, who identified himself only as Mohamad because he feared retaliation from authorities. "He would not harm a fly."

Another, who identified himself as Ali, called the suspect "a very decent person."

"Just because you have a beard and you like to go hunting," he said, "doesn't mean that you are a terrorist."

Chemical Weapons Plot: Man Sentenced (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, November 29, 2006

Federal authorities say a white supremacist will spend the next three decades behind bars for attempting to acquire nerve gas and explosives in a plot to destroy government buildings. A judge sentenced Demetrius “Van” Crocker to 30 years in prison and lifetime supervised release.

Crocker was arrested in 2004 after he tried to buy the weapons from undercover agents. The 40 year-old told agents his dream was to set off a dirty bomb in Washington, D.C. while the House and the Senate were in session. A federal jury convicted him in April of 2006.

Investigators say Crocker became involved with neo-Nazi groups as a teenager in Jackson, Tennessee. The TBI and the FBI started investigating him after an informant alerted the agencies to his anti-government rants.

Marshals Decry Imams' Charges (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Air marshals, pilots and security officials yesterday expressed concern that airline passengers and crews will be reluctant to report suspicious behavior aboard for fear of being called "racists," after several Muslim imams made that charge in a press conference Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport.

Six imams, or Muslim holy men, accused a US Airways flight crew of inappropriately evicting them from a flight last week in Minneapolis after several passengers said the imams tried to intimidate them by loudly praying and moving around the airplane. The imams urged Congress to enact laws to prohibit ethnic and religious "profiling."

Federal air marshals and others yesterday urged passengers to remain vigilant to threats.

"The crew and passengers act as our additional eyes and ears on every flight," said a federal air marshal in Las Vegas, who asked that his name not be used. "If [crew and passengers] are afraid of reporting suspicious individuals out of fear of being labeled a racist or bigot, then terrorists will certainly use those fears to their advantage in future aviation attacks."

But Rabiah Ahmed, spokeswoman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Muslims "have to walk around on eggshells in public just because we don't want to be misconstrued as suspicious. You have to strike a balance between legitimate fears which people may have, but not allow passengers to have so much discretion that they can trigger a process that would violate a traveler's basic civil rights."

"Because one person misunderstood the actions of other law-abiding citizens, they were able to trigger a very long and daunting process for other travelers that were pulled off the plane in handcuffs and detained for many hours before they were cleared."

The imams say they were removed from the Phoenix-bound flight because they were praying quietly in the concourse. They had been in Minnesota for a conference sponsored by the North American Imams Federation.

But other passengers told police and aviation security officials a different version of the incident. They said suspicious behavior of the imams led to their eviction from the flight. The imams, they said, tested the forbearance of the passengers and flight crew in what the air marshal called a "[political correctness] probe."

"The political correctness needs to be left at the boarding gate," the marshal said. "Instilling politically correct fears into the minds of airline passengers is nothing less than psychological terrorism."

The passengers and flight crew said the imams prayed loudly before boarding; switched seating assignments to a configuration used by terrorists in previous incidents; asked for seat-belt extensions, which could be used as weapons; and shouted hostile slogans about al Qaeda and the war in Iraq.

Flight attendants said three of the six men, who did not appear to be overweight, asked for the seat-belt extensions, which include heavy metal buckles, and then threw them to the floor under their seats.

Robert MacLean, a former federal air marshal, expressed the fear yesterday that the situation "will make crews and passengers in the future second-guess reporting these events, thus compromising the aircraft's security out of fear of being labeled a dogmatist or a bigot, or being sued."

Flight attendants said they were concerned that the way the imams took seats that were not assigned to them -- two seats in the front row of first class, exit seats in the middle of the plane and two seats in the rear -- resembled the pattern used by September 11 hijackers, giving them control of the exits.

A Minneapolis police officer and a federal air marshal who were called to the plane after the imams refused to leave the plane for questioning said "the seating configuration, the request for seat-belt extensions, the prior praying and utterances about Allah and the United States in the gate area ... was suspicious."

One pilot for a competing airline said the incident would have a chilling effect on the flight crews.

"The flight crew may be a little more gun-shy about approaching people, they may have a higher standard for the next few weeks for screening unusual behavior. I hope that's not the case, because I do think US Airways did the proper thing."

Andrea Rader, spokeswoman for US Airways, said its employees "are going to do what is appropriate" to ensure that airplanes are safe and will not be dissuaded by uproar over last week's incident.

"I don't think people will be less vigilant as a result of this, and I think that's appropriate. There is a balance, and I think we will continue to achieve that. Our crews and people on the airplanes are going to watch for behavior that raises concerns."

Many airports offer private rooms for prayer, but CAIR's Miss Ahmed said travelers required to arrive at airports two hours in advance to go through security inspections are too exhausted and must pray at the gate.

"It's convenient to check in then get to the gate and pray there," she said.

Plane Prayers (WP)

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

AUS AIRWAYS CREW invited controversy -- and a bevy of unanswered questions -- last week when it kicked six Muslim imams off a flight. That decision led to, among other things, a "pray-in" protest at Reagan National Airport on Monday. There's a disturbing possibility that innocent passengers were removed from their flight, handcuffed, detained and denied the opportunity to purchase another ticket home just because of a preflight expression of faith.

Many facts of the case are still the subject of debate, but we know this much: Last week, six imams heading home from a conference in Minnesota unrolled rugs before boarding a US Airways flight to Arizona and said their evening prayers. When they boarded, they sat in different sections of the aircraft. Another passenger passed a note to a flight attendant expressing discomfort that Arabic men were moving around the airplane. The captain threw them off, and the local police and the FBI detained them for questioning. The imams were later cleared for flying.

According to some accounts, the imams declined to sit in their assigned seats, instead choosing to occupy different sections of the plane in a manner akin to that of the Sept. 11 hijackers. While boarding, they may have expressed disdain for the American effort in Iraq and spoken favorably of former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. A US Airways spokeswoman notes that they asked for seat-belt extenders, which some say could have been used to hit or strangle others, even though they are not obese. Another airline employee indicated that three of the men had one-way tickets and checked no baggage. The imams, however, say that they carried round-trip tickets and didn't talk politics on the jetway. A representative also said that any seat switching they did was innocent.

US Airways stands by its decision to boot the men from the plane, saying that, taken as a whole, their behavior after boarding was suspect. But the airline and the authorities who detained the imams have questions to answer publicly about the incident. Were they switching seats suspiciously? Did the imams have round-trip or one-way tickets? Did the men ask for seat-belt extenders, and if so did they give any reason?

Answers to these questions might help explain the airline and official actions, even if they do not end up justifying those actions. Pilots and others have to make difficult decisions when time is short and evidence tough to verify. But complete information on this case also could demonstrate that it stemmed from nothing more than a nervous passenger fueling unfair suspicion after seeing the men at prayer. And that's a scary possibility. America can't become a country so locked by fear that those who unfurl a prayer rug automatically become suspects.

Chertoff: First Responders Done By End Of '07 (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099464

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Tuesday that the nation's 35 highest-risk cities must have systems enabling first responders to communicate in a disaster by the end of next year. Every state must have such a system by the end of 2008, he said.

New York City has already achieved that goal, officials said, but will be expected to continue to improve communications with first responders in Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester.

"The bottom line is we have to be able to communicate during a disaster," Chertoff told more than 1,000 state and local homeland security officials assembled at the Washington Hilton Tuesday. "We're going to get it done."

The lack of interoperable communications among first responders, and the poor functioning of fire radios in the World Trade Towers, were contributing causes in the scores of firefighters' deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks. Hampered communication also slowed rescue and recovery after Hurricane Katrina.

Chertoff announced those deadlines five weeks before the start of a new Congress controlled by Democrats, many of whom have expressed frustration about the slow pace of progress on first-responder communications and pledged tougher oversight of his department.

The secretary said public scorecards would be issued in the next few weeks to the highest-risk cities -- including Boston, Houston and Chicago -- to help them prioritize needed improvements. The focus, he said, would be regional because "threats are region-based."

So the scorecard for New York City would assess communication not just among the city's first responders, but also among police, fire and emergency management groups in Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester.

The baseline goal is for incident command managers to be able to communicate with one another within one hour.

Local officials said they expect to do well in the ratings.

"Communications are vastly improved from what they were on Sept. 11," said New York Deputy Fire Commissioner Frank Gribbon. "We have radios where we share frequencies. We have an NYPD videofeed to our operations center."

Beyond hardware, Gribbon said the city has revamped protocols that set out who is in charge under what circumstances.

Chertoff also pledged Tuesday that next year's allocation of anti-terror grants would be more transparent. While continuing to allocate the lion's share of money to high-risk areas, he said, decisions would be based more on "common sense" than on "bean counting." This year's grants, which included 40-percent funding cuts to New York City and Washington, D.C., were widely criticized.

Changes to the program, he said, would include an extended timeline that will enable municipalities to fine-tune their proposals after getting feedback.

Chertoff also said that a comprehensive alert system is being developed with the goal of reaching 85 percent of Americans within 10 minutes.

"Those of you who grew up in the '50s remember that they used to break into television programing ... ," he said. "But we're in the 21st century. We have text messaging. We have the Internet. We have digital cable. We have satellite television. We have to upgrade the current patchwork system and build one that is national in scope for the 21st century."

Diplomacy Ain't What It Used To Be (column) (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The Federal National Agency Association

Is the Federal Emergency Management Agency in line for a makeover? Seemed like it, judging from a press schedule issued Monday by FEMA's parent, the Department of Homeland Security.

At 12:30 p.m. tomorrow Undersecretary R. David Paulison, head of FEMA, the schedule said, will "participate in a press conference with the National Emergency Management Agency to announce a new emergency management tag logo and moniker."

Rebranding FEMA might make sense after last year's failed hurricane response and was in fact suggested by Senate investigators, among other changes.

Not to worry. FEMA's stationery, jackets and vehicle decals appear safe, at least for now.

Turns out that public-affairs staffers conflated two Paulison appearances: one to talk about his vision for a reorganized agency, and another to announce a new logo for the National Emergency Management Association, an organization of the top emergency officials from the 50 states.

FEMA? NEMA? Let's call the whole thing off.

A Deputized FEMA Director?

DOJ_NMG_0099465

On the bright side for Paulison, buzz at the agency is that he will be nominated by President Bush for promotion to the deputy secretary level. Congress recently passed legislation raising the status of the FEMA administrator, effective March 31, mandating that he report directly to the secretary of the Homeland Security Department and advise the president and the White House Homeland Security Council during disasters.

Judge Upholds Policyholders' Katrina Flood Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A federal judge offered a glimmer of hope to the tens of thousands of people whose homes and businesses in New Orleans were flooded in Hurricane Katrina, ruling that insurance companies should pay for the widespread water damage.

If upheld, the ruling late Monday by Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans could cost the insurers billions of dollars more than the $41 billion they have already paid to storm victims. But the insurers insist that their policies do not cover flooding, and they said yesterday that they expected an appeals court to reverse the decision. A final ruling could take months, if not years.

Judge Duval's decision centered on the distinction between flooding caused by high winds and heavy rains and flooding caused by human error. Much of the destruction in New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in August 2005 was a result of levee failures.

He said the language in the insurance policies on flood coverage was ambiguous because it did not "clearly exclude man-made" flood disasters. Since the insurers provided the wording for the policies, he said he felt "constrained to interpret it against the insurers."

He made an exception for State Farm and the Hartford Insurance Company, whose policies do not provide coverage for flooding "regardless of cause."

Lawyers for more than a dozen homeowners and Xavier University, which had business insurance, hailed Judge Duval's decision as a victory.

"This is a major breakthrough," said John N. Ellison, a member of the team of lawyers representing storm victims and a partner at Anderson Kill & Olick in New York. "Our hope is that this ruling may help get the redevelopment of the houses and the city going so the city can come back to life."

The ruling was the first by a court in Louisiana on damage from Hurricane Katrina. It ran counter to rulings by a federal judge in Mississippi that supported the industry's contention that most property insurance policies do not provide coverage for flooding.

But the judge in Mississippi, L. T. Senter of Federal District Court, disagreed with the insurers' contention that any damage due to flooding nullified the coverage. He cleared the way for trials early next year to determine how much damage to flooded homes and businesses resulted from high winds.

The rulings differ, in part, because the nature of the flooding was different. In Mississippi, the storm drove water from the Gulf of Mexico ashore and wiped out tens of thousands of homes unprotected by artificial barriers. In New Orleans, flood waters breached some levees and poured into the city as the storm was moving away. The water lingered in parts of the city for weeks.

Mr. Ellison, the lawyer for the homeowners, said he believed that the New Orleans case would go to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit "on an expedited basis" and that deliberations could begin in the spring.

More than 200,000 homes and thousands of businesses were damaged or destroyed by the flooding in New Orleans. The insurers have refused to pay claims for water damage and the relatively small amounts that homeowners and businesses received for wind damage have been far from enough for most people to rebuild. The federal government has stepped in with promises of several billion dollars in assistance, but little of the money has reached the people who need it.

The insurers said that Judge Duval's decision was contrary to decades of case law and state insurance regulation and would turn out to be a short-lived loss for their side.

"The judge reached the wrong conclusion," said Robert P. Hartwig, the chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York. "The policies clearly exclude flood-related damage under any and all circumstances. We don't believe the decision will be upheld."

Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, including several of those in the New Orleans lawsuit, said Judge Duval appeared to be overreaching to solve the social and economic problems caused by Hurricane Katrina.

"Here is a phenomenon for which there is no insurance, and the court isn't going to allow that to exist," Mr. Maniloff said.

"The court is finding who is in a better position to bear the loss, and it is coming out in favor of the individual, the policyholder," he said. "This is an aberration."

DOJ_NMG_0099466

Judge Duval, who was appointed to the federal court by President Bill Clinton in 1994, said in an 85-page decision that the insurers could have made clear "that 'flood' means water damage caused by negligent acts or omissions." But, he said, they "chose not to do so."

Nearly a dozen insurance companies had sought dismissal of the lawsuits over flood losses. But Judge Duval ruled in favor of only two, State Farm, the largest home insurer in Louisiana, with about 20 percent of the market; and Hartford, a unit of the Hartford Financial Services Group, which has a much smaller share.

Judge Duval said he cleared the way for an immediate appeal because "there is a substantial ground for a difference of opinion."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Adviser's Memo Cites Doubts About Iraqi Leader (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A classified memorandum by President Bush's national security adviser expressed serious doubts about whether Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had the capacity to control the sectarian violence in Iraq and recommended that the United States take new steps to strengthen the Iraqi leader's position.

The Nov. 8 memo was prepared for Mr. Bush and his top deputies by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and senior aides on the staff of the National Security Council after a trip by Mr. Hadley to Baghdad.

The memo suggests that if Mr. Maliki fails to carry out a series of specified steps, it may ultimately be necessary to press him to reconfigure his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by providing "monetary support to moderate groups," and by sending thousands of additional American troops to Baghdad to make up for what the document suggests is a current shortage of Iraqi forces. (Text of Memo)

The memo presents an unvarnished portrait of Mr. Maliki and notes that he relies for some of his political support on leaders of more extreme Shiite groups. The five-page document, classified secret, is based in part on a one-on-one meeting between Mr. Hadley and Mr. Maliki on Oct. 30.

"His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change," the memo said of the Iraqi leader. "But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

An administration official made a copy of the document available to a New York Times reporter seeking information on the administration's policy review. The Times read and transcribed the memo.

The White House has sought to avoid public criticism of Mr. Maliki, who is scheduled to meet with Mr. Bush in Jordan on Wednesday. The latest surge of sectarian violence in Baghdad and the Democratic victories in the midterm elections are prompting calls for sharp changes in American policy. Such changes are among options being debated by the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

A senior administration official discussed the memorandum in general terms after being told The New York Times was preparing an article on the subject. The official described the document as "essentially a trip report" and not a result of the administration's review of its Iraq policy, which is still under way.

He said the purpose of the memo "was to provide a snapshot of the challenges facing Prime Minister Maliki and how we can best enhance his capabilities, mindful of the complex political and security environment in which he is operating."

The American delegation that went to Iraq with Mr. Hadley included Meghan L. O'Sullivan, the deputy national security adviser, and three other members of the National Security Council staff. The memo, prepared after that trip, has been circulated to cabinet-level officials who are participating in the administration's review of Iraq strategy.

There is nothing in the memo that suggests the Bush administration is interested in replacing Mr. Maliki as prime minister. But while Mr. Bush has stated that he has confidence in the Iraqi leader, the memo questions whether Mr. Maliki has the will and ability to establish a genuine unity government, saying the answer will emerge from actions he takes in the weeks and months ahead.

"We returned from Iraq convinced we need to determine if Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others," the memo says. "Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? If so, is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power? The answers to these questions are key in determining whether we have the right strategy in Iraq."

In describing the Oct. 30 meeting between Mr. Hadley and Mr. Maliki, it says: "Maliki reiterated a vision of Shia, Sunni and Kurdish partnership, and in my one-on-one meeting with him, he impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so." It said the Iraqi leader's assurances seemed to have been contradicted by developments on the ground, including the Iraqi government's approach to the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia known in Arabic as Jaish al-Mahdi and headed by Moktada al-Sadr.

"Reports of nondelivery of services to Sunni areas, intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones, removal of Iraq's most effective commanders on a sectarian basis and efforts to ensure Shia majorities in all ministries — when combined with the escalation of Jaish al-Mahdi (JAM) killings — all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad."

Among the concerns voiced in the memo was that Mr. Maliki was surrounded by a small group of advisers from the Shiite Dawa Party, a narrow circle that American officials worry may skew the information he receives.

The memo outlines a number of short-term steps Mr. Maliki could undertake to establish control. The Iraqi leader has recently indicated his intention to take some of those steps, like announcing his intention to expand the size of the Iraqi Army and declaring that Iraq will seek an extension of the United Nations mandate that provides for the deployment of the American-led multinational force in Iraq. The United Nations Security Council voted on Tuesday to extend that mandate.

The memo also lists steps the United States can take to strengthen Mr. Maliki's position. They include efforts to persuade Saudi Arabia to use its influence with the Sunnis in Iraq and encourage them to turn away from the insurgency and to seek a political accommodation.

Addressing Mr. Bush, the memo said one option was for the president to "direct your cabinet to begin an intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S. action." Although the memo did not offer specifics, this appeared to be an allusion to a more active American role in the Arab-Israeli peace process. Recently, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has reached out to the Palestinians and has said he wants to move ahead with peace talks. But the memo's authors also contemplate the possibility that Mr. Maliki's position may be too tenuous for him to take the steps needed to curb the power of Shiite militias, to establish a more diverse and representative personal staff and to arrest the escalating sectarian strife.

In that case, the memo suggests, it may ultimately be necessary for Mr. Maliki to recast his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by pressing moderates to align themselves with the Iraqi leader and providing them with monetary support.

The memo refers to "the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad," a seeming acknowledgment that there is a substantial shortfall of troops in the Iraqi capital compared with the level needed to provide security there, in part because the Iraqi government has not dispatched all the forces it has promised. An American brigade generally numbers about 3,500 troops, though Iraqi units can be smaller. While Democrats have advocated beginning troop withdrawals as a means of putting pressure on Mr. Maliki, the memo suggests that such tactics may backfire by stirring up opposition against a politically vulnerable leader.

"Pushing Maliki to take these steps without augmenting his capabilities could force him to failure — if the Parliament removes him from office with a majority vote or if action against the Mahdi militia (JAM) causes elements of the Iraqi Security Forces to fracture and leads to major Shia disturbances in southern Iraq," the memo says.

The memo lists a number of possible steps to build up Mr. Maliki's capability. They include asking Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander, to develop a plan to strengthen the Iraqi leader.

This could involve the formation of a new National Strike Force, significantly increasing the number of American advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, a force that has been infiltrated by Shiite militias, and putting more Iraqi forces directly under Mr. Maliki's control.

In addition, the memorandum suggests that Mr. Bush ask the Pentagon and General Casey "to make a recommendation about whether more forces are needed in Baghdad."

The administration appears to have already begun carrying out some of the steps recommended in the document. Among them were a trip over the weekend by Vice President Dick Cheney to Saudi Arabia as part of an effort to seek help from Sunni Arab powers in encouraging Sunni groups in Iraq to seek a political compromise with Mr. Maliki.

The senior administration official who agreed to discuss the memo would do so only on condition of anonymity. The official said some of the steps projected in the document were being carried out.

The official also stressed that the administration retains confidence in the Iraqi leader. "What we are seeing is that he had the right intentions and is willing to act," the senior official said. "Our own review has opened a consultative process on where Maliki wants to take the government. A successful strategy has to be one that is driven by the Iraqis."

Text Of U.S. Security Adviser's Iraq Memo (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Following is the text of a Nov. 8 memorandum prepared for cabinet-level officials by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and his aides on the National Security Council. The five-page document, classified secret, was read and transcribed by The New York Times.

We returned from Iraq convinced we need to determine if Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others. Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? If so, is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power? The answers to these questions are key in determining whether we have the right strategy in Iraq.

Maliki reiterated a vision of Shia, Sunni, and Kurdish partnership, and in my one-on-one meeting with him, he impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so. Maliki pointed to incidents, such as the use of Iraqi forces in Shia Karbala, to demonstrate his even hand. Perhaps because he is frustrated over his limited ability to command Iraqi forces against terrorists and insurgents, Maliki has been trying to show strength by standing up to the coalition. Hence the public spats with us over benchmarks and the Sadr City roadblocks.

Despite Maliki's reassuring words, repeated reports from our commanders on the ground contributed to our concerns about Maliki's government. Reports of nondelivery of services to Sunni areas, intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones, removal of Iraq's most effective commanders on a sectarian basis and efforts to ensure Shia majorities in all ministries — when combined with the escalation of Jaish al-Mahdi's (JAM) [the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army] killings — all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad.

While there does seem to be an aggressive push to consolidate Shia power and influence, it is less clear whether Maliki is a witting participant. The information he receives is undoubtedly skewed by his small circle of Dawa advisers, coloring his actions and interpretation of reality. His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change. But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action.

Steps Maliki Could Take

There is a range of actions that Maliki could take to improve the information he receives, demonstrate his intentions to build an Iraq for all Iraqis and increase his capabilities. The actions listed below are in order of escalating difficulty and, at some point, may require additional political and security resources to execute, as described on Page 3 of this memo. Maliki should:

¶Compel his ministers to take small steps — such as providing health services and opening bank branches in Sunni neighborhoods — to demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities;

¶Bring his political strategy with Moktada al-Sadr to closure and bring to justice any JAM actors that do not eschew violence;

¶Shake up his cabinet by appointing nonsectarian, capable technocrats in key service (and security) ministries;

¶Announce an overhaul of his own personal staff so that "it reflects the face of Iraq";

¶Demand that all government workers (in ministries, the Council of Representatives and his own offices) publicly renounce all violence for the pursuit of political goals as a condition for keeping their positions;

¶Declare that Iraq will support the renewal of the U.N. mandate for multinational forces and will seek, as appropriate, to address bilateral issues with the United States through a SOFA [status of forces agreement] to be negotiated over the next year;

¶Take one or more immediate steps to inject momentum back into the reconciliation process, such as a suspension of de-Baathification measures and the submission to the Parliament or "Council of Representatives" of a draft piece of legislation for a more judicial approach;

¶Announce plans to expand the Iraqi Army over the next nine months; and ¶Declare the immediate suspension of suspect Iraqi police units and a robust program of embedding coalition forces into MOI [Ministry of the Interior] units while the MOI is revetted and retrained.

What We Can Do to Help Maliki

If Maliki is willing to move decisively on the actions above, we can help him in a variety of ways. We should be willing to:

¶Continue to target Al Qaeda and insurgent strongholds in Baghdad to demonstrate the Shia do not need the JAM to protect their families — and that we are a reliable partner;

¶Encourage Zal [Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador] to move into the background and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments. (We want Maliki to exert his authority — and demonstrate to Iraqis that he is a strong leader — by taking action against extremists, not by pushing back on the United States and the Coalition.);

¶Continue our diplomatic efforts to keep the Sunnis in the political process by pushing for the negotiation of a national compact and by talking up provincial council elections next spring/summer as a mechanism for Sunni empowerment;

¶Support his announcement to expand the Iraqi Army and reform the MOI more aggressively;

¶Seek ways to strengthen Maliki immediately by giving him additional control over Iraqi forces, although we must recognize that in the immediate time frame, we would likely be able to give him more authority over existing forces, not more forces;

¶Continue to pressure Iran and Syria to end their interference in Iraq, in part by hitting back at Iranian proxies in Iraq and by Secretary Rice holding an Iraq-plus-neighbors meeting in the region in early December; and

¶Step up our efforts to get Saudi Arabia to take a leadership role in supporting Iraq by using its influence to move Sunni populations in Iraq out of violence into politics, to cut off any public or private funding provided to the insurgents or death squads from the region and to lean on Syria to terminate its support for Baathists and insurgent leaders.

Augmenting Maliki's Political and Security Capabilities

The above approach may prove difficult to execute even if Maliki has the right intentions. He may simply not have the political or security capabilities to take such steps, which risk alienating his narrow Sadrist political base and require a greater number of more reliable forces. Pushing Maliki to take these steps without augmenting his capabilities could force him to failure — if the Parliament removes him from office with a majority vote or if action against the Mahdi militia (JAM) causes elements of the Iraqi Security Forces to fracture and leads to major Shia disturbances in southern Iraq. We must also be mindful of Maliki's personal history as a figure in the Dawa Party — an underground conspiratorial movement — during Saddam's rule. Maliki and those around him are naturally inclined to distrust new actors, and it may take strong assurances from the United States ultimately to convince him to expand his circle of advisers or take action against the interests of his own Shia coalition and for the benefit of Iraq as a whole.

If it is Maliki's assessment that he does not have the capability — politically or militarily — to take the steps outlined above, we will need to work with him to augment his capabilities. We could do so in two ways. First, we could help him form a new political base among moderate politicians from Sunni, Shia, Kurdish and other communities. Ideally, this base would constitute a new parliamentary bloc that would free Maliki from his current narrow reliance on Shia actors. (This bloc would not require a new election, but would rather involve a realignment of political actors within the Parliament). In its creation, Maliki would need to be willing to risk alienating some of his Shia political base and may need to get the approval of Ayatollah Sistani for actions that could split the Shia politically. Second, we need to provide Maliki with additional forces of some kind.

This approach would require that we take steps beyond those laid out above, to include:

¶Actively support Maliki in helping him develop an alternative political base. We would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc;

¶Consider monetary support to moderate groups that have been seeking to break with larger, more sectarian parties, as well as to support Maliki himself as he declares himself the leader of his bloc and risks his position within Dawa and the Sadrists; and ¶Provide Maliki with more resources to help build a nonsectarian national movement.

· If we expect him to adopt a nonsectarian security agenda, we must ensure he has reasonably nonsectarian security institutions to execute it — such as through a more robust embedding program.

· We might also need to fill the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad with coalition forces if reliable Iraqi forces are not identified.

Moving Ahead

We should waste no time in our efforts to determine Maliki's intentions and, if necessary, to augment his capabilities. We might take the following steps immediately:

¶Convince Maliki to deliver on key actions that might reassure Sunnis (open banks and direct electricity rebuilding in Sunni areas, depoliticize hospitals);

¶Tell Maliki that we understand that he is working his own strategy for dealing with the Sadrists and that:

· you have asked General Casey to support Maliki in this effort

· it is important that we see some tangible results in this strategy soon;

¶Send your personal representative to Baghdad to discuss this strategy with Maliki and to press other leaders to work with him, especially if he determines that he must build an alternative political base;

¶Ask Casey to develop a plan to empower Maliki, including:

· Formation of National Strike Forces

· Dramatic increase in National Police embedding

· More forces under Maliki command and control

¶Ask Secretary of Defense and General Casey to make a recommendation about whether more forces are need in Baghdad;

¶Ask Secretary of Defense and General Casey to devise a more robust embedding plan and a plan to resource it;

DOJ_NMG_0099470

¶Direct your cabinet to begin an intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S. action;

¶If Maliki seeks to build an alternative political base:

· Press Sunni and other Iraqi leaders (especially Hakim) [Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Maliki rival] to support Maliki

· Engage Sistani to reassure and seek his support for a new nonsectarian political movement.

Bush To Press Iraqi Premier On Security (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 28 -- President Bush signaled plans to both reassure and pressure Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki over deteriorating conditions in Iraq, as the White House prepared for an unusual summit Wednesday in Jordan aimed at arresting the slide in security.

Speaking with reporters Tuesday in Tallinn, Estonia, before flying here for a NATO summit, Bush hinted at the U.S. government's growing impatience with Maliki when he said he would query the prime minister about his "strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself."

"My questions to him will be: What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?" Bush said. Despite his pointed emphasis on the Iraqi government's role in controlling the violence, Bush also made clear his view that Iraq has not yet fallen into civil war and voiced determination to keep U.S. troops there despite growing pressure to bring them home.

"We will continue to be flexible, and we'll make the changes necessary to succeed. But there's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," Bush said later, in a speech here in the Latvian capital. "We can accept nothing less than victory for our children and our grandchildren."

With violence in Baghdad reaching levels not seen since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, both Bush and Maliki face increasing pressure to accelerate a turnover in responsibility for security to Iraqis and to begin withdrawal of more than 140,000 U.S. ground troops. The White House is conducting an internal review of Iraq policy, and the commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana representative Lee H. Hamilton is finishing its deliberations on what the U.S. government should do.

In a classified memo written earlier this month, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley expressed the administration's private frustration with Maliki's performance, questioning whether "Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others." The secret five-page memo, obtained by the New York Times and posted on its Web site Tuesday night, outlined a series of proposed steps for the United States and Iraq to take.

Among other things, the Nov. 8 memo suggested that Maliki should be pressured to distance himself from anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and "bring to justice" figures in Sadr's militia who "do not eschew violence"; shake up his cabinet to include more nonsectarian technocrats; expand the Iraqi army; and declare the immediate suspension of Iraqi police units suspected of involvement in sectarian conflict.

Hadley proposed that the United States help Maliki build a new political coalition within the Iraqi parliament that would rely more on moderate, less sectarian elements rather than harder-line Shiite representatives. To accomplish this, Hadley said, money could be provided to Maliki's political operation and moderate parties. The memo also raised the possibility of sending more forces to Iraq and recommended that U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad take a lower profile "and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments."

The memo laid bare the doubts about Maliki. Written shortly after Hadley met with the Iraqi prime minister, it noted concerns about various actions, including intervention to stop military action against Shiite targets, efforts to stack ministries with Shiite majorities and reported nondelivery of services to Sunni areas.

These actions "all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad," Hadley wrote. "While there does seem to be an aggressive push to consolidate Shia power and influence, it is less clear whether Maliki is a witting participant." Hadley wrote that Maliki "impressed me as a leader who wanted to be strong but was having difficulty figuring out how to do so." A White House spokeswoman Tuesday night had no comment on the memo.

Briefing reporters traveling with the president earlier Tuesday, Hadley said the broader White House Iraq review is not yet complete, suggesting that Bush's meetings with Maliki, scheduled for Wednesday evening and Thursday morning, will not produce any major developments -- at least publicly. But the meetings, the third between the two leaders since Maliki took office in May, will offer an opportunity to resolve tensions between the two governments over how to proceed.

The Bush-Maliki relationship had started with high hopes among White House officials that the prime minister would prove a more effective leader than his predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jafari. After a quick trip to Baghdad in June, Bush declared he had determined that Maliki was dedicated to a free Iraq.

But the relationship has grown fractious as repeated efforts to curb violence in Baghdad have failed. Administration aides have expressed frustration that Maliki has not moved more aggressively against Shiite Muslim militias, while he has bristled at pressure from Washington.

Sadr, the leader of one of those militias, is a key supporter of Maliki's government and a growing political power in the country. Curbing militias such as Sadr's Mahdi Army and bringing sectarian fighting under control are considered critical tests of Iraq's ability to govern itself -- and of the ability of U.S. forces to withdraw without leaving behind a chaotic situation.

Hadley, speaking Tuesday afternoon with reporters in Riga, offered a sober assessment of the Maliki government. He said efforts to secure Baghdad by U.S. and Iraqi forces have "not produced adequate progress in an acceptable time frame." He said Maliki had taken steps to reconcile warring religious and political factions but "obviously they have a long way to go."

Contrary to the doubts expressed in his memo, Hadley told reporters he was not criticizing Maliki, adding that he disagreed with the view in Iraq that Maliki is ineffectual. "We think that this unity government is doing pretty well in a very difficult situation," he said. "Maliki has been impatient and has said that his government has not produced the results they seek. And he's got some ideas about how to enhance their capabilities to do so."

Maliki faces criticism at home for going ahead with his meetings with Bush. Sadr's faction has threatened to bolt the government if the meetings take place, though it was unclear whether the threat would be carried out.

"We don't want or like this meeting, particularly at this time, because the country is in the midst of a security crisis, and the presence of the prime minister is necessary," said Bahaa al-Araji, a member of parliament from Sadr's bloc. "We are concerned that the prime minister may receive instructions from Bush on the security situation. We believe that the government must have the final say on such matters because the security situation is something that concerns Iraq and its government only."

Joost Hiltermann, who follows Iraq for the nonprofit International Crisis Group from Jordan, voiced skepticism that Maliki would crack down on private militias. "He is completely beholden to the Sadrists," he said. "The notion that he could confront the power of the militias that gave him power is absurd."

"There is a problem with saying that we need to get the Iraqis to take charge of the situation," said Eliot A. Cohen, a professor of military strategy at Johns Hopkins University. "By virtue of the kind of government we helped create -- particularly one based on proportional representation -- and because the institutions of the Iraqi state are weak, even if we can get him to promise, we cannot reasonably expect him to deliver much."

Before leaving for Jordan on Wednesday, Bush will finish meetings with other NATO leaders gathered here for a summit that is focusing heavily on the alliance's mission in Afghanistan. U.S. officials were hopeful that the summit would yield new troops for the fight against the resurgent Taliban, as well as a loosening of restrictions from member countries on how those troops can be used.

In a speech here, Bush alluded to these issues in saying that NATO commanders "must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs."

Bush started the day with a round of meetings in Tallinn with the leaders of Estonia, the first time a sitting U.S. president has visited the tiny Baltic country. Bush has now visited each of the three Baltic nations that gained independence with the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. Given their experiences with despotism, Bush has found a more congenial audience in these countries for his message of promoting democracy and the U.S. interventions in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Iraqi Premier Wants More Control Over His Military (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Maliki will press Bush for the U.S. to relinquish some authority. His government holds direct talks with Syria and Iran.

BAGHDAD — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki will push for the U.S. military to relinquish control over his nation's security forces when he meets President Bush today to discuss a strategy to quell raging violence in Iraq, aides and political insiders said Tuesday.

Frustrated by U.S. accusations that he isn't doing enough, Maliki says his hands are tied as long as he does not have the authority to deploy forces as he sees fit. He wants Bush to accelerate the training of the army and police, fund more recruits and provide them with bigger and better weapons, lawmakers briefed by Maliki said.

The prime minister also will insist at the two-day summit in Jordan that his government should drive negotiations with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, they said.

Maliki's emboldened stand comes at a time of uncertainty for U.S. strategy in Iraq. Bush is under pressure to make changes after Democrats swept the midterm congressional election on a wave of unhappiness about the war's results.

Bush is waiting for recommendations from a bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which Tuesday continued work on its final report.

Democrats want Bush to set a timeline to start reducing the number of U.S. forces in Iraq. But Bush maintained Tuesday that there was no possibility of an immediate pullout.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do," he said during an afternoon speech in Riga, Latvia, where he was attending a NATO summit. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is completed."

Bush is also under pressure to enlist the help of Iran and Syria in curbing the bloodshed. But he ruled out direct negotiation with Iran unless it halts a uranium enrichment program that potentially could be used to produce nuclear weapons.

While the United States considers its options, Maliki's government has opened direct talks with both countries.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was in Tehran on Tuesday, securing promises of assistance from his counterpart, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. He also has accepted an invitation to visit Syria, said his spokesman, Hiwa Osman, reached by telephone in Tehran.

The comments came on the eve of a hastily arranged summit in Amman, the Jordanian capital, where King Abdullah II will hold talks with Bush and Maliki after a week of some of the fiercest fighting in Iraq's civil war.

At least 215 people were killed in coordinated car bombings Thursday in a Shiite Muslim slum of Baghdad, a stronghold of anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr and his Al Mahdi militia. Hundreds more died in days of reprisal attacks, as Shiite and Sunni militiamen pounded neighborhoods with mortar rounds and gunfire.

As the toll grew, Iraqis on both sides of the sectarian divide directed their anger at the United States and demanded an immediate pullout.

"If the Americans withdraw, the fighting will stop," Iraq's most revered Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari, said in Jordan, where he met with Abdullah in the run-up to the summit. "Once Americans make the decision to withdraw, whether it is in one or two years, we can go to the resistance and tell them you have what you have been fighting for."

But other Sunnis trapped in Baghdad's strife-torn neighborhoods said they had no one besides the Sunni fighters to turn to for protection. They accused Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force of turning a blind eye to sectarian death squads and even colluding with them.

Sunnis are likely to find threatening any consolidation of security forces in Maliki's hands.

Adnan Dulaimi, head of the Sunni bloc in parliament, found himself calling for U.S. help when gunmen attacked his home over the weekend.

"I think that without the Americans, there will be a security vacuum and the result will be civil war," he said Tuesday.

Sadr's political representatives threatened last week to pull out of parliament and the Cabinet if Maliki met with Bush, a move that could precipitate the collapse of a painfully crafted government drawing in representatives of Iraq's main ethnic and religious groups. By Tuesday, however, they had softened their stance.

"We will wait until we have the visit and then we will examine the situation: Are there any benefits or good results for the Iraqi people?" said Nassar Rubaie, a spokesman for Sadr's political bloc. "Then we will discuss it and eventually decide" whether to pull out.

Bush said he intended to ask questions of Maliki, rather than offer his own solutions.

"My questions to him will be: What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?" Bush told reporters in the Estonian capital, Tallinn, en route to the Riga summit.

Maliki insiders said the prime minister's answer would be to tell U.S. commanders to give the Iraqi government full control over its security forces.

"This will not happen overnight; it needs a lot of preparation," said Haider Abadi, a lawmaker from Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party. "We need to build our forces, we need to train them, we need to arm them properly…. But if we can achieve a timeline, we will have achieved a lot."

U.S. and Iraqi officials also expect to discuss Talabani's visit to Iran. Khamenei on Tuesday blamed American policies for the violence in Iraq and told Talabani that Iran considered it a "religious and humane duty" to help establish security in the neighboring country, according to his office's website.

Bush is expected to press Maliki to deliver on promises to disarm Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army and the rival Badr Brigade, which are linked to key members of the political bloc that put the prime minister in power.

But Abadi and other officials close to Maliki ruled out military action against the militias.

"Unfortunately, you cannot disarm militias when your population feels the Iraqi security forces and the multinational forces are not doing enough to protect them from terrorists," he said. "This will result in the collapse of the government."

He said the government would seek a political solution to the problem of private armies and focus on cleaning up its security forces, which officials acknowledge have been infiltrated by Shiite militiamen.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have been vague about any expected outcome from the meeting, a silence that appeared to inspire little confidence among Iraqis reeling from last week's carnage.

"I don't think any good will come out of this meeting," said Kareem abu Karrar, whose world was upended when a car bomb exploded in the busy intersection where he sells electrical goods. He saw friends ripped to pieces and watched in a daze as a minivan packed with passengers flew through the air.

"We are now used to not expecting any good from Bush or Maliki," he said, "because we learned that after every attempt for national reconciliation, the exact opposite happens."

Some Question Whether Al-Maliki Strong Enough (USAT)

By César G. Soriano And Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Two months ago, President Bush declared Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was "the right man" for the job.

As Bush prepares to meet with al-Maliki today and Thursday in Jordan, analysts say there is growing evidence that al-Maliki is not up to the formidable task of bringing stability to his country.

Since taking power May 20, al-Maliki has yet to confront violent militias or persuade rival Sunnis to support his government. The government's security forces are accused of taking sides in growing sectarian fighting.

Al-Maliki "probably has neither the will nor the ability to address certain core issues, such as widespread abuses on the part of (Shiite) militias and the police," said Wayne White, head of the State Department's Iraq intelligence desk during the U.S. invasion in 2003. "He is beholden to the forces behind the militias for his political survival."

Bush said he will ask al-Maliki "what is required and what is your strategy to be a country which can govern itself and sustain itself?"

"My question to him will be, what do you need to do to succeed?" Bush said Tuesday in Estonia.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said Bush will not push al-Maliki to achieve quick results in trying to stabilize Iraq. "I think there's a lot of discussion about pushing Maliki. Maliki is doing a lot of pushing himself," Hadley said.

White and other analysts said that although the administration casts the Bush-al-Maliki meetings as a listening session on the part of the United States, Bush will probably underline the need for fast progress on a host of fronts. Hadley acknowledged that al-Maliki has taken steps forward, but "obviously, they have a long way to go."

Some key issues:

·Militias. U.S. and Iraqi military leaders have pressed al-Maliki for months to outlaw militias, some of which have close links to Shiite parties in Iraq's ruling coalition.

Al-Maliki told USA TODAY in October that his government will not force militias to disarm until possibly early next year. He has rejected U.S. timelines for curbing militias by year's end and has pulled U.S. and Iraqi troops back from raids and checkpoints in Sadr City, the teeming Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad where anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr draws support.

Military historian Andrew Bacevich said al-Maliki is beholden to al-Sadr for helping maintain his Shiite political power base. Al-Sadr's militia has clashed with U.S. forces on at least two occasions. His organization is represented in parliament and in the Cabinet.

Asked what al-Maliki has done to rein in militias, Bacevich said, "I know of nothing. The prime minister is dependent upon (Shiite) groups that are at a minimum in league with the militias, if not controlling the militias."

·Political reconciliation. Al-Maliki, 56, spoke of creating a "pluralist Iraq" when he assumed the job of prime minister in May. Sunni legislators complain that no olive branches have been offered and that Iraq's Sunni minority lives in fear of Shiite-inspired violence.

"We are in an unannounced civil war," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, who heads the main Sunni parliamentary bloc. "The violence will continue tomorrow and the day after tomorrow unless there is a real balance" in the government and Iraqi forces.

·Infiltration of Iraqi forces by death squads and Shiite militias. Al-Dulaimi said Sunnis do not trust Iraqi security forces "because these forces are participating with the militias in attacks against Sunnis."

Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie said such allegations "are baseless." He said Iraqi forces "are getting better trained, equipped and armed. They are getting stronger and more experienced, slowly but surely, week by week."

Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert and an adviser to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that is due to report its findings soon, said al-Maliki appears ill-suited to try to bridge Iraq's sectarian divides, but Washington has no alternative.

The Sunni leadership is "equally fractured," Marr said and "there is no strong man there" who could replace al-Maliki.

Jeffrey White, a former Defense Intelligence Agency Middle East analyst, said al-Maliki was chosen as prime minister by Shiite leaders "because he was weak and pliable."

White also argued that criticism of Iraqi leaders by the White House and Congress comes from unrealistic expectations for al-Maliki or any other Iraqi leader. Leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress have called for al-Maliki's government to take more security responsibility so some of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq can come home.

"There is no way they can do what we want them to do," White said. "If these benchmarks could have been met, they would have been met. They are prisoners of their own history, system and personalities."

Deeper Crisis, Less U.S. Sway In Iraq (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 — When President Bush meets in Jordan on Wednesday with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, it will be a moment of bitter paradox: at a time of heightened urgency in the Bush administration's quest for solutions, American military and political leverage in Iraq has fallen sharply.

Dismal trends in the war — measured in a rising number of civilian deaths, insurgent attacks, sectarian onslaughts and American troop casualties — have merged with growing American opposition at home to lend a sense of crisis to the talks in Amman. But American fortunes here are ever more dependent on feuding Iraqis who seem, at times, almost heedless to American appeals, American and Iraqi officials in Baghdad say.

They say they see few policy options that can turn the situation around, other than for Iraqi leaders to come to a realization that time is running out. It is not clear that the United States can gain new traction in Iraq with some of the proposals outlined in a classified White House memorandum, which was compiled after the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, visited Baghdad last month.

Many of the proposals appear to be based on an assumption that the White House memo itself calls into question: that Prime Minister Maliki can be persuaded to break with 30 years of commitment to Shiite religious identity and set a new course, or abandon the ruling Shiite religious alliance to lead a radically different kind of government, a moderate coalition of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish politicians.

The memo's assessment of Mr. Maliki tracks closely with what his American and Iraqi critics in Baghdad say: that six months after taking office, he has still not shown that he is willing or capable of rising above Shiite sectarianism.

These critics say, in effect, that the 56-year-old Iraqi leader has failed, so far, to meet the test set by Mr. Bush when the two men met for the first time in Baghdad in June. At that meeting, the American leader told Mr. Maliki he had come to "look you in the eye" and determine if America had a reliable partner here.

Against these judgments, some key passages in the Hadley memo seem at odds with the reality on the ground, as if the steady worsening of America's prospects here has driven the White House to reach for solutions that defy the gloomy conclusions of America's diplomats and field commanders, not to mention some of Mr. Maliki's closest political associates.

Even some powerful figures in the Shiite alliance have spoken recently of Mr. Maliki less as a possible leader of a parliamentary coup against the political movement that nurtured him than as an ineffective and ultimately dispensable figure, much like the man he succeeded in the prime minister's office, Ibrahim al-Jaafari.

Shiites in Iraq are riven by factional rivalries, and there may be opportunities for the Americans to exploit those divisions to create parliamentary realignments. Indeed, some Iraqi leaders have started exploring new alliances to break the political logjam, possibly involving a parliamentary coup against Mr. Maliki. But if Grand Ayatollah Ali al- Sistani, Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, has been clear about anything, it has been that the Shiites must subordinate their differences to the cause of consolidating Shiite power.

So it is hard to imagine Mr. Maliki approaching Ayatollah Sistani to win approval "for actions that could split the Shia politically," as the Hadley memo suggests. Shiite leaders, who are tiring of Mr. Maliki, appear to be thinking of replacing him with another Shiite religious leader, and not of sundering the alliance and surrendering the power the Shiites have awaited for centuries.

But if recent interviews in Baghdad with senior American and Iraqi officials are a guide, a bigger problem for the Bush administration in effecting change here may be that the United States, in toppling Saddam Hussein and sponsoring elections that brought the Shiites to power, began a process that left Washington with ever-diminishing influence.

One reason for the declining American influence lies in policies that, for various reasons, alienated the political class, most of them former exiles like Mr. Maliki who rode back to Baghdad on the strength of American military power.

Many Shiite leaders resent the Americans for compelling them to share power in the new government with the minority Sunni Arabs — a policy, the Shiites say, that guaranteed paralysis for the government.

Sunni leaders still resent the American invasion, and the imposition of an electoral process that ended centuries of Sunni dominance. Just as much, they fume over the pervasive influence of neighboring Iran, which backs the Shiite parties.

And secular politicians, marginalized by the Shiite and Sunni Islamist politicians who dominate the government, say they, too, have lost faith in the Americans, for failing to protect Iraq's secular traditions.

"Politically, their position is weaker in all aspects," Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish leader, said of the Americans. "They just got weaker and weaker, and many more people who were supporting them are supporting them less."

Meanwhile, the faltering of the latest effort to secure Baghdad has exposed the limitations of American ability to change the military equation. The White House memo raises the possibility of using additional American troops to fill what it calls "the four brigade gap" in troops committed to the Baghdad operation in August — a gap caused by Iraq's new army committing only two of the six brigades it promised.

That shortfall left Americans providing about two-thirds of the 25,000 troops, halting by mid-October the sweeps to clear districts of insurgents and death squads.

But American commanders interviewed said that committing additional American troops could send a signal to Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds that they could continue to quarrel over their share of political and economic power behind an American military shield.

In recent days, Mr. Maliki has seemed to heed these American warnings, telling fellow Iraqi leaders on Sunday, three days after bombings that killed more than 200 Shiites in Sadr City, that they have to accept the blame for the surging violence.

"The crisis is political," Mr. Maliki said, "and the ones who can stop the cycle of aggravation and bloodletting of innocent people are the politicians."

Meanwhile, the political process has almost completely ground to a halt. Mr. Maliki's "national reconciliation plan," intended to reduce violence through dialogue and an amnesty program for militia fighters and insurgents, has stalled.

Political leaders have also made little progress on promises to review the new Constitution, a document resented by Sunnis, and a plan to draft a new law that will set terms for the future divisions of oil revenues that account for 90 percent of Iraq's economy.

Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni legislator, was blunt in his assessment of the government: "Do you not recognize that it's going backwards?"

Sectarian rifts between the nation's political leaders have deepened. During a session of Parliament last week, prominent Sunni and Shiite legislators bitterly accused each other of sectarianism and promoting violence. President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has warned fellow leaders about the possible collapse of the state. And even the Shiite leaders who control the government have taken to conspiring among themselves, with open jockeying for the succession if Mr. Maliki should fall.

At the crux of the most difficult decisions facing Mr. Maliki stands the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose control of one of the largest blocs in Parliament, several ministries and a large and restless militia, makes him arguably the most powerful politician in Iraq. Mr. Maliki is indebted to Mr. Sadr for providing the votes within the ruling Shiite alliance that made him prime minister.

But Mr. Sadr's volatile militia, the Mahdi Army, is blamed for many of the Shiite revenge attacks against Sunnis. The White House memo suggests that Shiites might be willing to drop their support of the militia if the Americans continue their military pressure against Sunni insurgents. But Shiites see the militia as their last defense against decimation by Sunni insurgents.

For the Iraqi leader, the challenge presented by Mr. Sadr and the Mahdi Army amounts to a zero-sum game. If Mr. Maliki moves too fast against the militia, he risks losing Mr. Sadr's support and splintering the Shiite bloc. If he moves too slowly, he will alienate the Sunni Arabs whose cooperation is crucial to any hope of reining in the insurgency.

Meanwhile, Mr. Maliki is in a vexed relationship with the United States. The Iraqi government needs the United States for the protection its 150,000 troops afford. At the same time, he has felt compelled to push back publicly against American pressures, partly to gain credibility among those in his power base who oppose the American presence, particularly the staunchly anti-American Mr. Sadr. Among other things, he has demanded effective control of Iraq's new 140,000-man army, which remains under overall American command.

According to several Iraqi politicians, Mr. Bush may consent in Jordan to arrangements that give Mr. Maliki at least greater nominal authority over the Iraqi forces, something American commanders — and the White House memo — agree would be important to Mr. Maliki's credibility.

But the Americans will be careful about the practical implications, because of concerns that the Iraqi police and army, overwhelmingly Shiite, could be used as a sectarian militia.

Iraqis are growing impatient. "The government should say they are going to take things into their own hands," said Adel Abdul Mahdi, the Shiite vice president and one of Mr. Maliki's rivals for prime minister.

"We don't have enough time," he continued. "Iraqis have to deliver. We have to show the world that there is a state."

Why Iraq's Discord Stalls Political Solution (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- President Bush is expected to press Iraq's leader when they meet this week to act decisively against the violence coursing through Iraqi neighborhoods. That may prove extremely difficult, because the sectarian discord has paralyzed the country's fragile political structure -- and with it much of the leverage at Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's disposal.

Nowhere is this paralysis more evident than in Iraq's national assembly. The Parliament was cast by Washington as a solution to the nation's problems when it was elected a year ago. Instead, it embodies Mr. Maliki's biggest challenge because it mirrors the sectarian battles raging on the Iraqi streets.

Lawmakers routinely demonstrate their fury with one another by boycotting sessions to stymie the legislative process, using speeches in parliament to accuse fellow lawmakers of complicity in violence, and exchanging personal insults using epithets that ensure lingering mistrust and ill will.

In a typically charged exchange last week, a senior Shiite Muslim politician railed against attacks on his co-religionists in one Baghdad neighborhood and called for Iraqi security forces to move in to restore order. A leading Sunni Muslim lawmaker who lives in that neighborhood took the comment as a personal insult and accused Shiites of treating Sunnis like Jews -- fighting words in this mostly Arab land. This kind of acrimony has left Mr. Maliki unable to quell sectarian violence and to reconcile the warring Shiite and Sunni factions through an inclusive political process.

When Mr. Maliki's administration took office in May, it was billed as a government of national unity that could pacify the insurgency by bringing its Sunni leaders back into politics and then disarming Shiite militias by exerting pressure on the political parties that control them. After that, officials in Baghdad and Washington argued, American troops could start leaving the country.

After six months in office, Mr. Maliki is facing pressure from across Iraq's political spectrum. Sunnis are furious that the Shiite militias that target Sunnis for assassination and torture have grown even more active on his watch. While the government has pledged to tackle the militia problem, Mahmoud Mashadani, the outspoken Sunni speaker of parliament answers, "Show me, don't tell me."

Legislators loyal to combative Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr are furious over Thursday's car bombs that killed more than 200 Shiite civilians in Baghdad's Sadr City district. Mr. Sadr blames the Americans for failing to prevent the violence, but anger at Mr. Maliki is running high. "He's like a bird trying to fly without wings," says Nasar al-Rubaie, a parliament member affiliated with the Sadr movement.

Mr. Maliki is blaming the political discord for the deteriorating situation in Iraq. "The crisis is political," he said after last week's bombings. "And it is the politicians who must try to prevent more violence."

His defenders say Mr. Maliki has a lot of responsibility but little authority because the Shiite political parties to whom he owes his post are also the ones controlling the militias. Several Iraqi politicians say the prime minister has repeatedly expressed frustration that he doesn't have enough operational control over Iraq's fledgling security forces.

In protest over last week's carnage in Baghdad, Mr. Sadr's political movement is threatening to suspend its participation in parliament and the cabinet if Mr. Maliki goes through with his plans to meet Mr. Bush in Amman, Jordan, this week. The boycott could touch off yet another political crisis here. But it would hardly be unusual for a parliament accustomed to arguments, walkouts, accusations and counter-accusations hurled across the floor.

"These are the things that need to be transcended, these are the things that happen on a daily basis," Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations representative in Baghdad, says of Iraq's parliamentary quarrels. "There's mistrust, there's division, there's misunderstanding."

The 275-member Council of Representatives is dominated by Shiite political parties. Still, the Sunnis, who had boycotted an earlier round of elections, also have sizable representation. Kurdish factions are well represented, too, but their primary concern has been to ensure smooth sailing for their own autonomous region in northern Iraq.

Heated sectarian rhetoric has become such a common feature in the parliament hall that the assembly decided to push back member statements to the end of the session, knowing that once someone makes an accusation, the parliament quickly descends into chaos. Some lawmakers also want to post a roll call from every session on the parliament's Web site, hoping to name and shame those who don't attend. In fact, boycotts and absenteeism in protest of an attack or a policy have become so common that the parliament now wants to impose fines against those who skip sessions and thus endanger the quorum.

Once, when Mr. Maliki was planning to address the parliament on security matters, an anxious Mr. Mashadani waited two hours for enough members to gather in the parliament hall, and finally canceled the session after citing the lawmakers' "deplorable behavior" -- and then called one member "a dog" for good measure.

Lawmaking has taken a back seat to recriminations. A parliament official recently read aloud a list of 40 bills submitted by the cabinet to the assembly; most of them never left the committees. A key measure aimed at bringing some Sunni extremists into the political process fell apart when politicians couldn't agree which groups qualified for inclusion.

One bill that galvanized the parliament's attention was also the most divisive and sectarian issue ever to reach the floor. In October, several Shiite political parties took up a bill that would allow the formation of autonomous regions, a proposal vehemently rejected by Sunnis. The Sunnis, who make up about 20% of Iraq's population and live in landlocked and oil-poor central Iraq, are afraid the majority Shiites would carve out their own semi-independent enclave in the South where most of Iraq's oil is concentrated. Combined with the existing Kurdish region in the north, it would leave Sunnis with no natural resources.

Sunni parties lobbied frantically to derail the bill, striking a tactical alliance with Mr. Sadr's movement. Although a Shiite, Mr. Sadr is an Iraqi nationalist opposed to any federal division of the country. Observers were surprised to see hardline Sunni lawmakers and Mr. Sadr's deputies -- who usually don't agree on anything -- huddle in the hallways. In the end, though, the federalism bill passed by a narrow margin, widening the gulf between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The law is a recipe for dividing Iraq," says Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leading Sunni legislator who last week was involved in a televised argument in parliament that led to the Jew comment. In fact, he adds now, the Shiites are treating Sunnis even worse than they would treat Jews -- and claims the Shiites inflated the death toll of last week's massive bombings in Sadr city to demonize the Sunnis.

Jalaladdin al-Sagheer, a prominent Shiite deputy in parliament, says Mr. Dulaimi personifies everything that is wrong with the Sunni political leadership. "I don't want to say that he's sectarian, but he always talks only about his own sect," he says.

Iraq And The Facts Of Life (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

At this point it is hard to tell who is more out of touch: President Bush, who continues to insist that Iraq has not descended into civil war, or Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who appears to believe that Americans will prop him up indefinitely.

When the two sit down in Jordan, we hope they will use the time — finally — to impress on each other the brutal facts of life in their respective capitals.

Mr. Bush needs to make clear that Americans' patience has all but run out and that he will start bringing the troops home unless Mr. Maliki moves to rein in sectarian bloodletting and Iraqi troops start shouldering more of the burden. Mr. Maliki needs to make Mr. Bush understand Iraq's full desperation — and his own desperate political weakness. So long as Baghdad remains in chaos — and militias are better armed and more motivated than the Iraqi Army — he has no chance of ending the blood feuds or breaking the cycle of retribution.

This sort of truth-telling does not come easily to either man, and at this point there may not be anything that can salvage Iraq. But more denial and drift will only lead to more chaos. The very fact that the meeting is being held in Jordan — explanations range from concerns about safety in Iraq to the White House's desire to pry Mr. Maliki away from his more unsavory backers — should leave no doubt about the urgent need for a change in strategy.

Mr. Bush needs to start by giving the Iraqi leader a clear deadline for beginning national reconciliation talks, preferably as soon as Mr. Maliki returns to Baghdad. And he should insist that the talks continue until some agreement is reached on protecting minority rights, equitably dividing the country's oil wealth, and demobilizing sectarian militias. Mr. Bush does not need to insult Mr. Maliki by barking out orders. But he does need to make clear that he can hold off demands for an American withdrawal for only so long.

Mr. Bush should not be the only demander. Reconciliation talks will go nowhere until Iraqis see evidence that there is at least some hope for a better life. Mr. Maliki needs to give his own deadline to the Americans for launching a truly make-or-break campaign to retake the streets of Baghdad.

Mr. Maliki also needs to tell Mr. Bush that the American training of the Iraqi Army is failing, and without a more aggressive program, the army will collapse at the first sign the Americans are leaving. And he must warn that Mr. Bush's insistence on talking only to friends won't halt meddling by Iran and Syria.

King Abdullah II of Jordan, who will play host to the meetings, is warning that unless something drastic happens soon, the Middle East will face three full-blown civil wars: in the Palestinian territories, Lebanon and Iraq. If Iraq's desperate reality is not enough to inspire Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki to tell each other the truth, perhaps a look into that wider abyss will.

Bush Declines To Call Situation In Iraq Civil War (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 28 — On the eve of a high-profile trip to Jordan to meet Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, President Bush on Tuesday dismissed suggestions that Iraq had descended into civil war, blamed Al Qaeda for the latest wave of sectarian violence and vowed not to withdraw troops "until the mission is complete."

The president's remarks, during a swing through the Baltics that took him from Tallinn, Estonia, on Tuesday morning to Riga for a NATO summit meeting, were his first on Iraq since a series of bombs killed more than 200 people in a Shiite district of Baghdad on Thursday. It was the deadliest attack since the American invasion in 2003, and it was followed by bloody Shiite reprisals.

At a morning news conference with President Toomas Hendrik Ilves of Estonia, Mr. Bush, making the first visit to Estonia by a sitting United States president, characterized talk of civil war in Iraq as "all kinds of speculation." Foreshadowing his message to Mr. Maliki, he said he would press the Iraqi prime minister to lay out a strategy for stopping the killings.

"My questions to him will be: 'What do we need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?' " Mr. Bush said. "I will assure him that we will continue to pursue Al Qaeda to make sure that they do not establish a safe haven in Iraq."

Mr. Bush is in Riga to talk about the other war — Afghanistan — which tops the NATO agenda. The alliance, which was formed to protect Europe, now has 32,000 troops in Afghanistan. But Mr. Bush wants NATO to commit more troops to the southern region of that country, to fend off a resurgence by the Taliban. In a speech at Latvia University, the president warned that terrorists, drug traffickers and warlords "remain active and committed to destroying democracy in Afghanistan."

Yet Iraq, not Afghanistan, is dominating the president's time, casting as heavy a shadow here as it does at home. Democrats, who are about to take control of Congress after midterm elections that were widely viewed as a referendum on the war, are pressing for a phased withdrawal of troops, but Mr. Bush held firm against that.

"We'll continue to be flexible, and we will make the changes necessary to succeed," he said in Riga. "But there's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

In part, Mr. Bush is laying the foundation to push back against a high-level bipartisan commission, which has been meeting in Washington behind closed doors to review Iraq strategy. Though the panel is reportedly divided on the issue of withdrawal, it is widely expected to recommend greater United States engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Iran and Syria, two nations the White House has shunned.

Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he intended to leave such talks to Iraq, "a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy."

On Wednesday, after lunch with his fellow NATO heads of state, Mr. Bush is scheduled to leave for Amman, Jordan, for two days of meetings with Mr. Maliki. Experts say that the president must walk a fine line, reassuring Mr. Maliki while making clear that American patience may wear thin if the prime minister does not tamp down the violence so Iraqis can assume greater responsibility for securing their country.

"They're probably a little worried right now that if Maliki and others think maybe it's only a matter of time before the administration gets out, the last thing they are going to do is go after militias, because the militias are what they need for protection," said Dennis Ross, a former Middle East envoy for the Clinton and first Bush administrations.

But while Mr. Bush suggested he would lean on Mr. Maliki, White House officials were careful to say the president would not deliver any ultimatums.

"I think Maliki would be the first person to say he has not produced the kind of results he would like to have produced," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, told reporters, adding: "There is a lot of discussion about pushing Maliki. Maliki is doing a lot of pushing himself."

The president and Mr. Maliki appear to be at odds on the cause of the recent bombings. Mr. Maliki has called them "the reflection of political backgrounds" and has said that "the crisis is political." But instead of citing Shiite and Sunni militias on Tuesday, Mr. Bush placed blame on Al Qaeda.

“There’s a lot of sectarian violence taking place,” Mr. Bush said, “fomented in my opinion because of the attacks by Al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal.”

As the cycle of violence continues, officials outside the United States are warning that Iraq is verging on civil war. King Abdullah II of Jordan told ABC News on Tuesday that “something dramatic” must be done, and Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, told reporters on Monday that the region would face civil war “unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation.”

But Mr. Bush, well aware that a label of civil war would make the Iraq mission even more difficult to justify, brushed aside that question on Tuesday.

“There’s all kinds of speculation about what may or may not be happening,” he said in Estonia, adding, “No question, it’s tough.”

White House Wages War Of Words Over 'Civil' Term (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The carnage in Iraq is "sectarian violence," President Bush says. It's a "struggle for freedom," the "central front in the war on terror." It is not, no matter how much it may look like it, a civil war.

Forget the debate over what to do about the war in Iraq. The White House is still debating what to call the war in Iraq. With retired generals, analysts, politicians and pundits increasingly using the term "civil war," the Bush administration insists that the definition does not fit as part of its latest effort to control the words of war.

To people dying in the streets of Sadr City, it may be just semantics. But the White House fiercely resists the phrase out of fear of its impact in both Iraq and the United States. Defining it as civil war, some strategists worry, could accelerate the conflict and encourage Iraqi factions that remain on the sidelines to join the struggle. And acknowledging that it has become a civil war, they fear, could collapse the already weak support for the mission among Americans.

But the risk for the White House, analysts said, is that once again it will appear out of touch with reality over there and with public perception here at home. For months after the invasion of Iraq, the administration denied there was an insurgency. Then it resisted the notion that there was sectarian violence. Now polls show that about two-thirds of the American public think that Iraq is mired in civil war.

"If they can't characterize what's going on in Iraq in an honest fashion, we can't begin to address the problem," retired Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, who led troops in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, said in an interview.

Asked about the matter at a news conference in Estonia yesterday, Bush skirted the issue and focused attention on al-Qaeda's role. "No question, it's tough," he said. "No question about it. There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of these attacks by al-Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal."

White House press secretary Tony Snow rejected the term "civil war" on Monday because "you have not yet had a situation . . . where you have two clearly defined and opposing groups vying not only for power but for territory."

The issue of terminology has arisen periodically for months, especially since the February bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra touched off round after round of attacks between the once-dominant minority Sunnis and the majority Shiites who now control the government. The debate has flared more intensely in recent days amid the bloodiest assaults of the war in the Shiite slum of Baghdad known as Sadr City. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan warned Monday that when it comes to civil war, "we are almost there."

The decision by NBC News on Monday to use the term despite White House objections prompted a fresh examination by many in Washington about the nature of the conflict. As MSNBC began flashing the logo "Iraq: The Civil War," other news organizations staked out positions. The Los Angeles Times noted that it has been calling the violence a civil war since October. The New York Times said it will use the term, though sparingly. The Associated Press said it is still debating the issue, while The Washington Post has made no policy.

The Random House unabridged dictionary defines a civil war as "a war between political factions or regions within the same country." Scholars often further refine that to those conflicts that take at least 1,000 lives. Those who argue that Iraq does not qualify say that a true civil war involves organized military units contesting for territory on behalf of competing governments or quasi-governments.

"In American history, in the Civil War, you had borders and you had two sides," said Michael Ledeen, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "I don't see anything like that. There's lots of people killing lots of other people, yes. Why not call it a terror war? That seems to cover it."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said Bush would rather frame it in the terrorism context to preserve public support. "If it's a civil war and only a small portion of it involves al-Qaeda operatives, then it's suddenly not the central front in the war on terror, it's a struggle by Iraqis for political power," he said. "That means the rationales for this are severely undercut."

Polls suggest that most Americans have already settled this debate in their minds -- 61 percent of those surveyed in September by NBC News and the Wall Street Journal described the situation in Iraq as a civil war, while 65 percent agreed in a CNN poll and 72 percent in a Gallup poll. Of those who described the conflict as "out of control" and a "civil war" in a later Gallup-USA Today poll, 84 percent called U.S. involvement a mistake, compared with 25 percent of those who did not view the situation that way.

"There's a good deal of research to suggest that the American public is less willing to use troops to intervene in other countries' civil wars than in humanitarian-type missions," said Christopher F. Gelpi, a Duke University scholar who has studied public opinion in wartime. "So even if the facts on the ground are the same . . . the label used has a substantial effect on public opinion. That's why they're fighting over it."

Language also has the power to influence events in Iraq, where leaders engage in a similar debate. "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is," former prime minister Ayad Allawi said as far back as eight months ago. But the current prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, adamantly rejects the term, and analysts said his fragile government risks collapsing if it accepts the premise.

"There is a very tenuous and very weak hold on legitimacy," said Peter Khalil, a Eurasia Group consultant who served as a U.S. security adviser in Iraq. "If they were to admit that, then that last strand gets unraveled. You're not far off from falling off the ledge."

Kurt M. Campbell, a Pentagon official in the Clinton administration, said many key players in Iraq have not engaged in violence but could decide to weigh in if they think the conflict has evolved into an all-out struggle for power -- which means the Iraqis and Americans have a legitimate reason to fear the disputed phrase.

"It may trigger the thing you're trying to forestall," he said. "It's not simply a matter of political correctness and trying to avoid harsh reaction." But Campbell, who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said it may soon be too late. "Where we're at right now is so close to all-out civil unrest that in the next few weeks if it continues the way it's going, it'll be all but unavoidable."

Bush Says U.S. Won't Withdraw From Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 29, 2006

Under intense pressure to change course, President Bush on Tuesday rejected suggestions Iraq has fallen into civil war and vowed not to pull U.S. troops out "until the mission is complete."

At the opening of a NATO summit, Bush also urged allies to increase their forces in Afghanistan to confront a strengthening Taliban insurgency.

On the eve of his visit to Jordan for meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush portrayed the battles in both Afghanistan and Iraq as central fronts in a war "against the extremists who desire safe havens and are willing to kill innocents anywhere to achieve their objectives."

The stakes in Iraq are huge for Bush. His war policies were repudiated in U.S. midterm elections that handed control of Congress to Democrats. A bipartisan blue-ribbon panel is about to issue a report proposing changes in the administration's approach in Iraq. And al-Maliki's government itself sometimes seems to be at cross purposes with Washington.

Bush set the stage for the Jordan talks with a speech at the NATO summit here and at an earlier news conference in neighboring Estonia. The president said he was flexible and eager to hear al-Maliki's ideas on how to ease the violence.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do, I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," Bush declared in his speech. There are about 140,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

Earlier, speaking with reporters in Tallinn during a joint news conference with Estonia's president, Bush would not debate whether Iraq had fallen into civil war and blamed the increasing bloodshed on a pattern of sectarian violence that he said was set in motion last winter by al-Qaida followers.

"I'm going to bring this subject up, of course, with Prime Minister Maliki," Bush said. "My questions to him will be: What do you need to do to succeed? What is your strategy in dealing with the sectarian violence?"

Bush said he realized that "no question it's dangerous there, and violent. And the Maliki government is going to have to deal with that violence, and we want to help them do so."

Bush has been coming under increasing pressure, both overseas and at home, to reach out more to other countries, particularly to Syria and Iran to help with a solution in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0099481

Such a recommendation may be among those issued by the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton. The group is expected to finish its work next month.

Bush has resisted such talks, and he renewed a warning on Tuesday to both Iran and Syria not to meddle in Iraq. Still, al-Maliki's government itself has made overtures to both countries.

"As far as Iraq goes, the Iraqi government is a sovereign government capable of handling its own foreign policies and is in the process of doing so," Bush said in Tallinn.

Later, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said that Bush and al-Maliki have "a relationship of candor."

"A lot of discussion has been about (Bush) pushing Maliki. Maliki has done a lot of pushing himself," Hadley said. "There has been a coordinated effort between the Iraqi government and allied forces to get greater control. ... It has not produced satisfactory progress in a satisfactory timeframe."

Meanwhile, in Washington, House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Bush must work with Democrats on stopping the violence in Iraq.

"We want to work in a bipartisan way to settle this," Pelosi said. "If the president persists on the course that he is on, that will be more difficult."

In Riga, Bush pressed many of the 26 NATO allies to do more to marshal resources and troops in Afghanistan, particularly in the volatile south.

Bush said the Afghanistan mission — which has mobilized over 32,000 troops_ is NATO's top operation and defeating Taliban forces "will require the full commitment of our alliance."

"The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," he said.

Bush met individually with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and joined other leaders in attending a working dinner.

Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, said that Bush brought up a need for "additional defense capabilities and additional defense spending" in the meeting with the secretary-general and also intended to discuss it at the dinner.

In both Baltic countries, Bush on Tuesday saluted their persistence in eventually prevailing over Soviet occupiers, and he said it was a good example for both Afghanistan and Iraq.

Bush: No Troop Pullouts Until Mission 'complete' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia — President Bush begins two days of meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki today aimed at easing sectarian violence in Iraq. He remains insistent that U.S. troops will not leave the war-torn country "before the mission is complete."

Speaking here before a NATO summit on Afghanistan, Bush said Tuesday that his goals for the meetings in Jordan with al-Maliki and local host King Abdullah II are to learn more about the situation on the ground in Iraq and the efforts to transfer more responsibility to Iraqi security forces.

"We'll continue to be flexible, and we'll make the changes necessary to succeed," he said. "But there is one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

The president urged NATO allies to support anti-terrorism efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, where the security alliance has 32,000 troops. Bush also urged allies to contribute resources to the NATO forces fighting the resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan.

Earlier at a news conference in Estonia, Bush blamed al-Qaeda for the strife in Iraq. He traced it back to the February bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, which sparked attacks and reprisals between the Shiite majority and Sunni minority.

Bush said he plans to ask al-Maliki how his country can seize control of its own future.

"I will assure him that we will continue to pursue al-Qaeda to make sure that they (al-Maliki's government) establish a safe haven in Iraq," Bush said during a news conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves.

The president also declined to call the rising violence in Iraq a civil war. United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Abdullah have suggested Iraq is headed in that direction.

Bush also suggested the United States will not negotiate with Iran and Syria to support Iraq, in part because Iraqi officials are already doing so. The administration has said it wants other nearby nations, such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt, to work with all the factions in Iraq to end the violence.

"We want Iraq's neighbors to help the Maliki government in its efforts to promote reconciliation and stabilize the country, and this includes encouraging Iraqis, Sunnis and others, to participate in their political process and support the new government," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, billed the Jordan meetings as listening sessions. Among those with the president's ear: a panel, headed by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, that will make its Iraq recommendations next month.

"Everybody knows where we want to get," Hadley said. "The question is, can you get there in a way that will ensure that Iraqis really are able to control and provide for their own security."

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi told the Associated Press that Democrats are willing to work with Bush on Iraq, but "if the president persists on the course that he is on, that will be more difficult."

Bush Deflects Questions About Civil War In Iraq (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

RIGA, Latvia - President Bush said Tuesday that he intended to press Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki this week for a plan to stem growing sectarian violence and a strategy for how the country will sustain and govern itself.

On the eve of his initial meeting with al-Maliki in Jordan, the president blamed the escalating violence on an al-Qaida plot aimed at fueling sectarian fighting, and he placed responsibility for ending it largely on al-Maliki's shoulders.

"No question it's dangerous there, and violent," Bush said at a news conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik during a stop in Tallinn, Estonia. "And the Maliki government is going to have to deal with that violence, and we want to help them to do so."

Although Washington is boiling with expectations that the new Democratic Congress and a blue-ribbon bipartisan commission soon will push Bush toward a plan for phased withdrawal from Iraq, the president gave no sign of that Tuesday. He vowed again that U.S. troops will stay until the mission is complete, and shrugged off talk of negotiating with Syria and Iran for help in calming Iraq.

His remarks about al-Maliki came before his arrival at Riga, Latvia, where he's attending a two-day North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit. The NATO agenda centers on improving the organization's ability to battle 21st-century security threats, but most of the talk in Riga has been about deteriorating security in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraq lately has experienced the worst bloodshed since U.S.-led forces invaded in March 2003. Last week's bombings killed at least 160 people and wounded more than 200. More than 3,700 Iraqis were killed in October, the highest monthly death toll since the war began. The spike in violence prompted United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan to say Monday that Iraq is close to civil war - and many independent authorities say it's already civil war.

Bush rejected that conclusion. Tuesday he blamed Iraq's worsening violence on al-Qaida.

"You know, the plans of Mr. Zarqawi was to foment sectarian violence," he said, referring to the late Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who led the group al-Qaida in Iraq until a U.S. airstrike killed him last June. "The Samarra bombing that took place last winter was intended to create sectarian violence, and it has. The recent bombings were to perpetuate the sectarian violence. In other words, we've been in this phase for a while."

The bombing of the al-Askari mosque in Samarra last February did spark a surge in sectarian violence, but it's not known whether al-Zarqawi was responsible for it. In addition, sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has been a condition of life in Iraq for centuries. It exploded out of control again after the removal of Saddam Hussein's dictatorship left a vacuum of power, and U.S.-led occupation forces failed to fill it with enough troops to restrain the violence.

Bush promised to be flexible with his Iraq strategy, changing it as conditions there change - but he vowed that U.S. troops would stay as long as necessary.

"There's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said during a speech at Latvia University's Grand Hall. "We can accept nothing less than victory for our children and our grandchildren."

He framed the stakes as a struggle throughout the Middle East between forces of terrorism and freedom, and warned that if the terrorists win, they could pose "a mortal threat to Europe, America and the entire civilized world."

Earlier, in Estonia, Bush had shrugged off talk of negotiating with Syria and Iran toward a solution for Iraq. He said Iran would have to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment program before the United States sat at a negotiating table with it.

"But as far as Iraq goes, the Iraqi government is a sovereign government that is capable of handling its own foreign policies, and is in the process of doing so," he said. "And they have made it abundantly clear - and I agree with them - that the Iranians and Syrians should help, not destabilize this young democracy."

At the NATO summit, Bush turned his attention to Afghanistan, where the 26-nation alliance is struggling to provide security against resurgent Taliban forces. Despite having 40,000 U.S. and NATO-led troops on the ground, Afghanistan this year has experienced the most bloodshed since the 2001 military intervention that toppled the Taliban and drove al-Qaida out of the country.

Bush implored NATO members to provide commanders in Afghanistan with "the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," a veiled reference to the restrictions some countries have placed on how their troops are used in Afghanistan. The restrictions keep some units in the safer northern portion of the country while troops from Canada, the Netherlands and Great Britain endure most of the combat in the south.

Bush claimed that NATO's mission has helped to sustain Afghanistan's fledgling democracy but he warned that "defeating (the enemy) will require the full commitment of our alliance."

In Amman Enemies, And Allies, Await Bush (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 28 — The ink on banners condemning American hegemony was still wet Tuesday as the details of a possible march were being worked out. DVDs of a British movie depicting the assassination of President Bush sold briskly in downtown Amman, while police cordoned off streets in preparation for a security nightmare.

When President Bush arrives here Wednesday to meet with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq, there will be no shortage of people seeking to make him feel unwelcome with a decidedly blunt message.

“We want to stress that America’s battle for the hearts and minds of Arabs has failed,” said Zaki Bani Rsheid, director general of the Islamic Action Front, the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood here. “We are raising banners all over Jordan condemning Bush’s visit. It should be self-explanatory why.”

But as many here and throughout the Arab world prepared for Mr. Bush in the halls of power and on the streets of Amman, Iran was foremost on a lot of minds.

“I am here to make sure the mistakes of the past are not repeated,” said Sheik Dhari al-Jirba, of the Iraqi Shummar tribe, who sat in his hotel suite Tuesday pondering what strategy Mr. Bush would present to Mr. Maliki to pursue stability in Iraq.

“We keep hearing they want to bring Iran in, but Iran will come with conditions,” he said. “We don’t want Iran’s conditions to be met at the cost of Iraq and its Sunni neighbors. That is our great fear.”

Mr. Jirba said he planned to meet with Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, and hoped he would have an audience with the president himself. His first demand, he said, would be to say “no” to Iran.

A draft report by an American bipartisan commission studying new strategies for Iraq has urged that the United States open direct talks with Iran and Syria, according to American officials who have seen all or part of the document.

On Monday, the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani, said at a meeting in Iran that his country needed Iran’s help to bring about peace.

Mr. Bush, who will be accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice, is expected to try to enlist Arab leaders to help rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents.

The United States wants moderate Arab governments like those of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan to help drive a wedge between Mr. Maliki and Moktada al Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric whose Mahdi Army has been behind many of the Shiite reprisal attacks in Iraq, senior administration official have said.

But that would require getting those governments to coax moderate Sunni Iraqis to support Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, boosting his ability to take on Mr. Sadr’s Shiite militias. The bipartisan commission would also open a line with Iran and Syria to help secure stability in Iraq.

Yet for many, a resurgent Iran, with or without a nuclear bomb, is a central concern. An opening with Iran, many analysts said, would amount to a loss of face for the Arabs and a striking boost for Iran.

“The one thing scarier to these guys than a powerful Iran is an American deal with Iran,” said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director at the International Crisis Group. “That would ratify Iran’s dominant position in the Persian Gulf. Iran wants to underscore it is the pre-eminent power in the region, and the U.S. would hand them that.”

Despite growing anti-Americanism, Arab governments have been eager to maintain an American presence in the region, fearing Iran would step in where the United States retreated. But a shift on Iran and Syria has caught many by surprise, as the Bush administration goes from “calling them the axis of evil, to considering them as an important element,” Emad Gad, a researcher at Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo, said last week.

“The security and stability of the Persian Gulf cannot endure a shaken U.S. image,” Mr. Gad said. “When the big bodyguard leaves, they will have to succumb to the little bodyguard, and Iran has military power and has Shiites who could cause problems.”

DOJ_NMG_0099484

In the Amman suburb of Ruseifa, Abu Mutasim, who described himself as a jihadi and would give only his nickname for fear of arrest, greeted a possible American opening with Iran with optimism. “Iran is the source of all the problems in the Middle East, and now they want to create problems here,” he said. “But including them would only be in the interest of the jihadis, because Iraq’s Sunnis would quickly shift to Al Qaeda. This would ultimately be in our interests, not against it.”

Bush Firm On Iran, Syria Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — As pressure mounts for the United States to seek direct talks on Iraq with Iran and Syria, President Bush appeared Tuesday to rule out any change in his administration's policy toward those Iraqi neighbors.

By reaffirming a long-standing administration policy setting strict conditions on talks with either country, Bush indicated that he may be unwilling to accept an expected recommendation by a bipartisan commission assessing policy options on Iraq.

The commission members have said they want the administration to negotiate with Iraq's neighbors. But Bush said Iran must first agree to international demands that it halt development of its nuclear program.

"Iran knows how to get to the table with us, and that is to do that which they said they would do, which is verifiably suspend their enrichment programs," Bush said Tuesday in Estonia during a trip that will take him to Jordan later this week to meet with Iraq's U.S.-backed leader. "And then we'll be happy to have a dialogue with them."

Bush was less specific about Syria, but gave no hint that he had grown more willing to hold talks with leaders in Damascus.

The Iraq Study Group is meeting this week in Washington to try to reach a bipartisan consensus for a final report expected by the end of the year. Although members agree on the need to negotiate with countries like Iran and Syria, they have been divided on other key issues, including U.S. troop levels.

The 10-member panel, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), was scheduled to meet through Tuesday, but will reconvene today in an effort to reach agreement on a final report.

Although Bush has insisted he will receive the panel's recommendations with an open mind, his views on the possible recommendations have remained unyielding. Other administration officials have joined him in emphasizing the disadvantages of trying to negotiating with Iran or Syria.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley, asked by reporters whether Bush was closing the door on new openings to Damascus or Tehran, reiterated the administration's long-held stance.

"What the president was reaffirming today is we made it very clear we are prepared to talk with Iran, and those conversations clearly begin with the nuclear issue," Hadley said.

Vice President Dick Cheney has repeatedly emphasized the disadvantage of direct engagement with the two governments. And other government officials have in recent days sought to bolster the administration's case by pointing to what they say are efforts by Tehran and Damascus to disrupt the region.

One U.S. official said there was growing apprehension within the government that the Iraq Study Group's recommendations for talks would become "a club that's going to be used to bash the administration."

Although many experts have been advising the study group to prescribe talks, there is wide agreement among hard-liners and pragmatists within the government that the idea "has serious downsides," said the official, discussing internal views on condition of anonymity.

Officials are especially reluctant to make an opening to Damascus at a time when Syria is seen as undermining U.S. goals in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, as well as Iraq, the official said.

Although there may be less opposition to trying to engage Iran, the official noted that the administration had made repeated efforts to engage Tehran, but found them unproductive.

Mitchell B. Reiss, who was the State Department's director of policy planning during Bush's first term, said that the administration was "far from enthusiastic about engaging the Iranians in serious negotiations, and it's completely unclear that the Iranians are serious about engaging the United States, either."

Reiss, who is now vice provost at the College of William and Mary, said he believed it unlikely that such talks would take place in the short term.

"Or if they do, they'll be along the lines of the six-party talks with North Korea — a lot of pomp and circumstance and not much substance to them," he said.

Meanwhile, U.S. intelligence officials have expressed new concern over Iran's role in the spreading violence in Iraq and have leveled new charges against the country's leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0099485

Officials on Tuesday cited indications that the Iranian-backed terrorist network, Hezbollah, had sent operatives to Iraq to help train members of Shiite militias. The officials also said that Shiite fighters from Iraq had traveled to Lebanon for training with Hezbollah.

A U.S. military official said that Defense intelligence estimates suggested that as many as 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Al Mahdi army in Iraq had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. But officials at other U.S. intelligence agencies cautioned that the actual numbers were probably significantly lower. U.S. intelligence concern about Hezbollah's role was first reported by the New York Times on Tuesday.

NBC Assailed For Declaration Of 'Civil War' (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

"Civil war" has joined "terrorist" and "undocumented immigrant" in the growing lexicon of terms that prompt press organizations to get touchy about their coverage.

In the name of neutrality, print and broadcast journalists alike have declared moratoriums on words deemed inflammatory or judgmental in the years since the September 11 attacks.

Neutrality might not be the motivation behind NBC's decision to announce that Iraq is now engaged in a civil war, despite statements from the White House to the contrary.

"NBC has decided the change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized a civil war," "Today" show host Matt Lauer said Monday.

"News organizations claim they don't want to be political in their coverage. But this declaration strikes me as very political. This is NBC saying, 'Hey, George Bush is delusional, and we're not going to play along.' That's the tenor of it," Tim Graham of the Media Research Center said yesterday.

"The pomposity of the judgment is also troubling. The network is clearly seeking a tipping point to declare that the U.S. is losing Iraq," Mr. Graham added. "But the phenomenon of selective description is not new. How many papers and networks refused to call Hamas a 'terrorist' group in the past?"

Whether NBC's position resonates with the public remains to be seen.

"Frankly, I don't think that a judgment NBC has made is as remotely important as the actual events on the ground in Iraq," said Alex Jones of Harvard University's Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy.

The network is exercising typical editorial decision-making, Mr. Jones said, "but I don't think it's going to change any minds out there."

Some cast NBC's public declaration as a benchmark that could potentially sway public opinion -- and press outlets themselves.

"Let's cut right to what this 'civil war' fanfare in the media is really all about: It has nothing to do with ongoing violence in Iraq, and everything to do with the fact that these media organizations, struggling to maintain their relevance in a rapidly changing industry feel the need to assert themselves and remind the public of their importance," Stephen Spruiell of National Review Online said yesterday.

An Editor & Publisher survey revealed that reporters and editors at the Los Angeles Times, New York Times, Christian Science Monitor and McClatchy Newspapers are allowed to use the term "civil war," while The Washington Post still opts for "sectarian strife." CNN leaves the hair-splitting decisions to individual editors and reporters. The Associated Press, CBS and ABC are undecided; Fox News has not made its policies public.

It can be a work in progress: Earlier this year, three minority journalism groups asked the American press to avoid terms such as "illegal alien" because it was "dehumanizing," recommending "undocumented worker" or "economic refugee" as less-offensive alternatives.

Bush And Maliki (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

President Bush is in Jordan today for meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and the most important message the two leaders could send would be to reaffirm their common commitment to their antiterror fight.

That task has clearly been complicated by recent events -- including more blood in Baghdad and the Republican wipeout in Congress caused in part by frustration with the Iraq war. There's also this week's spectacle of the wannabe Walter Cronkites at outlets like NBC News and the Los Angeles Times patting themselves on the back for declaring that the Iraq conflict is a "civil war." Mr. Cronkite is often credited with helping turn public opinion against the war in Vietnam, and today's media point seems to be to declare the war unwinnable, as if this were actually desirable.

To his credit, Mr. Bush refused to give ground to such defeatist rhetoric during meetings with NATO leaders yesterday. No doubt many critics will continue to snicker at his alleged lack of realism, but public confidence is crucial to avoiding disaster in Iraq. We're clearly at a hinge point in Iraq, with Mr. Bush himself saying there's a need for "fresh eyes" and James Baker's Iraq Study Group poised to report next month. Among the policy options being considered are redoubled military efforts against the insurgents and diplomatic outreach to Syria and Iran. But even supporters of reaching out to those regimes must realize that U.S. negotiating leverage will be zero if they sense the U.S. is ready to cut and run.

As for the talks with Mr. Maliki, let's hope Mr. Bush resists the pressure he will face from some Arab leaders (and his own State Department) to push Mr. Maliki to make concessions to Baathist and Sunni Islamist insurgents. Such tactics have been tried a number of times in recent years, with no discernible reduction in the insurgency.

That failure in turn has fed suspicions among the majority Shiites that the U.S. would secretly prefer that Iraq be led by a new Sunni strongman. Jordan's King Abdullah didn't help matters recently by hosting Harith al-Dari of the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars -- a terrorist front group -- only days ahead of the Bush-Maliki summit.

One reassuring sign is that the President fingered Sunni extremists as the root cause of the violence during his press conference yesterday in Estonia: "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal." The point here is to define who the main enemy in Iraq continues to be, and that is the Baathist and al Qaeda insurgents. They are the source of the car bombs that continue to go off in Shiite neighborhoods and that have inspired Shiite reprisals. The undearly departed Musab al-Zarqawi's explicit strategy was to fan such sectarian attacks precisely so the Americans would lose patience and leave.

Mr. Maliki will, in turn, have a far easier time building political support for disarming Shiite militias such as the Mahdi Army once Sunni bombs stop killing Shiites. Mr. Maliki reportedly wants more control over the Iraqi Army and better weaponry to tackle Sunni insurgents, and we hope Mr. Bush listens to what the Prime Minister has to say.

Which brings us back to the alleged "civil war." The term seems to have acquired a totemic meaning in Iraq, although the U.S. has intervened successfully in civil wars before: the Balkans and Afghanistan, most recently. Regarding Iraq, the goal of the "civil war" chorus seems to be to delegitimize the war by painting what is a false picture of the balance of power and legitimacy between the Iraqi government and the terrorists.

The sectarian violence is a horrible problem. But by any reasonable definition, a "civil war" implies at least two militarily strong factions with a popular claim on political leadership. Neither of those conditions exists in Iraq.

The country's elected, pan-sectarian government and its several hundred thousand security forces remain the only legitimate power center. The Sunni insurgents, meanwhile, are a mix of Islamists and Baathists who enjoy little support and are capable only of terrorist-style attacks. They hold sway only through murder and intimidation in areas where the government lacks enough troops to assure public safety. Shiite militia leaders are also divided and what support they enjoy is due to the perception among ordinary Shiites that the government has been unable to protect them. Few Shiites would be eager to see Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical cleric, in Mr. Maliki's chair.

The next Iraqi or American official to be asked about "civil war" might want to reply by asking the journalist who, precisely, is fighting whom, and why Iraqi security officers of all backgrounds continue to risk their lives for the elected Baghdad government. The truth is that the enemies of Mr. Maliki's government are terrorists and thugs. Mr. Bush could help give Mr. Maliki the confidence he needs for the tough fight ahead -- first against the Sunni terrorists, then against the Shiite revenge killers -- by assuring him that U.S. policy will be based on this fact.

Gingrich Calls Iraq War A 'Failure' (BOS)

By James W. Pindell

The Boston Globe, November 29, 2006

BEDFORD, N.H. -- Former House speaker Newt Gingrich told a New Hampshire audience yesterday that unless the Bush administration admits that the war in Iraq is a "failure," it will never develop a strategy to leave the country successfully.

Gingrich, who has been laying the groundwork for a presidential run, said the Bush administration needs to plan a "third stage" in Iraq, following the military takeover stage and the recent democracy-building stage. But he says a third stage can come about only if officials admit they must change course.

"If the military, White House, and State Department continue to avoid the word 'failure,' how can you bring about a third stage?" Gingrich said.

Gingrich was in New Hampshire for three campaign-style events Monday night and yesterday. While the former speaker has expressed interest in a presidential run, he said yesterday that he is more interested in injecting ideas in to the 2008 campaign than in putting his name on the ballot. He said he will not seriously entertain a presidential campaign until September.

Gingrich, who served on a key Pentagon board that advised Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in the runup to the Iraq war, was eager to distance himself from the Bush administration's handling of the war.

He said a show of contrition by the White House would help the president regain the trust of the American people and avoid a quick pullout, which would be disastrous.

The first goal in Iraq, Gingrich said, should be to rebuild the national military, even if it requires spending tantamount to the Marshall Plan effort in the aftermath of World War II, in which the United States spent up to 3 percent of its gross domestic product.

"We have to show we are serious about winning and that we will defeat any person, Sunni or Shi'ite, that hopes to disrupt progress," he said. "But we can only do that if we have Iraqi troops on the ground."

Speaking at various campaign-style events, Gingrich reiterated his belief that the Republican Party's loss of Congress earlier this month was attributable to a failure to follow conservative principles, particularly concerning spending.

On Monday night, Gingrich was the keynote speaker at a First Amendment dinner sponsored by the Union Leader of Manchester, the state's largest and historically conservative newspaper.

Yesterday morning he appeared at the classic New Hampshire primary stop "Politics and Eggs," where he fiercely defended the first-in-the-nation status of the Granite State's presidential primary on the grounds that its small size and engaged electorate make it a forum for a discussion of ideas.

The former speaker also met privately with David Carney , a New Hampshire-based consultant who was the White House political director during the George H. W. Bush presidency. He wrapped up his visit by addressing 100 Republican legislators and activists at a lunch meeting that was part pep rally and part lecture on how to build a strong party.

The lecture was well-received by Republican leaders.

"He was exactly the right person we needed to hear from," said State Representative George Katsakiores , a Derry Republican.

As Iraq Deteriorates, Iraqis Get More Blame (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

From troops on the ground to members of Congress, Americans increasingly blame the continuing violence and destruction in Iraq on the people most affected by it: the Iraqis.

Even Democrats who have criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the occupation say the people and government of Iraq are not doing enough to rebuild their society. The White House is putting pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have debated how much to blame Iraqis for not performing civic duties.

This marks a shift in tone from earlier debate about the responsibility of the United States to restore order after the 2003 invasion, and it seemed to gain currency in October, when sectarian violence surged. Some see the talk of blame as the beginning of the end of U.S. involvement.

"It is the first manifestation of a 'Who lost Iraq?' argument that will likely rage for years to come," said Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University expert on terrorism who has worked as a U.S. government consultant in Iraq.

Americans and Iraqis are increasingly seeing the situation in different terms, said retired Army Col. Jeffrey D. McCausland , who recently returned from a visit to Iraq. "We're just talking past each other," he said, adding that Americans are psychologically edging toward the door that leads to disengagement. "We're arguing about 'cut and run' versus 'cut and jog.' "

Iraqis' role in their own suffering has been an issue since shortly after the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003, when looters ransacked the national museum and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld dismissed it by saying, "Stuff happens." But more than three years later, with schools and hospitals struggling, electrical service faltering, and police and government agencies infiltrated by sectarian death squads, the question of blame is more urgent.

For example, a Nov. 15 meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee turned into a festival of bipartisan Iraqi-bashing.

"We should put the responsibility for Iraq's future squarely where it belongs -- on the Iraqis," began Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the committee's next chairman. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves." He has advocated announcing that U.S. troops are going to withdraw as a way of pressuring Iraqi politicians to find compromises.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) followed by noting: "People in South Carolina come up to me in increasing numbers and suggest that no matter what we do in Iraq, the Iraqis are incapable of solving their own problems through the political process and will resort to violence, and we need to get the hell out of there."

"We all want them to succeed," agreed Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.). "We all want them to be able to stabilize their country with the assistance that we've provided them." But, he added, "too often they seem unable or unwilling to do that."

DOJ_NMG_0099488

Later the same day, members of the House Armed Services Committee took their turn. "If the Iraqis are determined and decide to destroy themselves and their country, I don't know how in the world we're going to stop them," said Rep. Robin Hayes (R-N.C.).

Iraqi Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie said he worries about the growing chorus of official voices blaming Iraq, and suggested that a little introspection on the U.S. side could help.

"I am indeed concerned about this trend," he said in an interview. "The U.S. through its actions and omissions has helped to create the current conditions in Iraq. Therefore the U.S. also bears responsibility in putting right the situation."

It isn't just politicians who have decided that the problem with Iraq is the Iraqis. In the military establishment, said Joseph J. Collins, a professor at the National Defense University, "there is lots of disappointment in the performance of Iraqi officials of all stripes."

Thomas Donnelly, a hawkish defense expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said he considers blame a legitimate issue. "Ultimately, just like success rests with the Iraqis, so does failure," he said. "We've made a lot of mistakes, but we've paid a huge price to give the Iraqis a chance at a decent future."

The blame game has also been playing out somewhat divisively within the secretive Iraq Study Group. The bipartisan commission, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is deliberating policy recommendations to put forward next month.

"I'm tired of nit-picking over how we should bully the Iraqis into becoming better citizens of their own country," former CIA Middle East expert Ray Close wrote in an e-mail to the other advisers to the study group.

Several other experts of various political stripes said this tendency to dump on Baghdad feels like a preamble to withdrawal.

"It's their fault, and by implication not ours, is clearly a theme that's in the air," said retired Army Col. Andrew J. Bacevich, a Vietnam veteran and longtime skeptic of the war in Iraq. It reminds him, he said, of the sour last days of the Vietnam War, when "there was a tendency to blame everything on the 'gooks' -- meaning our South Vietnamese allies who had disappointed us."

"People never understood the culture and the challenges that we faced in trying to build a new Iraq," a senior U.S. intelligence official said. "There's incredible frustration . . . but it also shows a great deal of ignorance."

"Definitely," said Paul Rieckhoff, who served in Iraq as an Army officer in 2003-2004 and went on to found a veterans group critical of the conduct of the war. "It is growing into an angry, scolding tone." He said he finds it "sad" -- "especially after all the talk of our mission to 'save the Iraqis.' "

The long-term effect of blaming Iraqis also could be poisonous, said Juan Cole, a University of Michigan specialist in Middle Eastern issues. He predicted that it will "infuriate the Iraqis and worsen further the future relationship of the two countries."

The turning point in the blame game seems to have occurred in early October, when both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) went public with their frustrations, warning the Baghdad government that it must do much more much faster. Warner suggested that the United States should explore a "change of course" if security had not improved within 90 days.

During a surprise visit to Baghdad on Oct. 5, Rice said with uncharacteristic bluntness that the security situation was not helped by "political inaction."

The Bush administration hoped the long-delayed formation of a government, which took about five months after the Dec. 15 election last year, would produce more initiative by Baghdad. But the security and political situation continued to deteriorate, so the administration increased the pressure on Maliki's government. Over the past three months, U.S. officials and foreign diplomats said, senior U.S. military and administration officials visiting Baghdad have conveyed the same message: Get on with it.

"Our role is not to resolve those issues for them," Rice told reporters last month after pressing Maliki to be bolder about disbanding militias and reconciling sectarian differences. "They are going to have to resolve those issues among themselves."

Blaming Iraqis for the woeful situation disregards recent history, some experts argue. Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert and adviser to the Iraq Study Group, calculates that because of policy missteps and other errors, the United States bears about 60 percent of the blame. "You can't say, 'We did this and the Iraqis didn't rise to the occasion,' " she said. "There's enough blame to go around."

U.S. Troop Levels In Iraq Stymie Panel (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

Members of an independent commission on Iraq policy could not reach a consensus Tuesday on how many or how long U.S. troops should remain in Iraq, forcing the group to return for a third day of debate, according to an official close to the panel's negotiations.

Panel members mostly made no comment as they left the Woodrow Wilson Center on Tuesday afternoon. But Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff to President Clinton, hinted at some struggles, telling reporters, "Trying, trying to find a ... trying to find consensus. ... It goes up and down."

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel created to recommend changes in U.S. war policy, is having difficulties reaching agreement on what the appropriate level of U.S. troops should be in Iraq, whether there should be a phased withdrawal, and if so, under what time frame, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the panel's deliberations are private.

A second official has said that the commission was unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq but that some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal, an idea that has been pushed by many congressional Democrats.

The first official said Tuesday that the group was still struggling over whether to set a hard deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces or if there should be any short-term increase in troops as the U.S. works to train and build up Iraq's security forces. There are currently about 139,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

The questions are key to the U.S. future policy in Iraq following the November election in which Democrats swept control of the House and Senate largely due to voters discontent with the progress of the war.

Leaving the daylong meeting Tuesday afternoon, members of the panel, which is headed by former Republican Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, played down any divisions among the diverse group.

"It's a good group to work with, let's just put it that way," said Panetta, as he emerged with Vernon Jordan, who was a Clinton adviser, and former Republican Sen. Alan Simpson of Wyoming.

The group was initially expected to wrap up their deliberations Tuesday. People close to the commission said they expect the panel to issue a bipartisan, consensus report some time next month.

Officials have said a consensus report is the group's goal, rather than having the panel issue one that suggests two divergent opinions with no clear recommended path.

Panel members are also expected to urge the Bush administration to reach out to Iran and Syria, as part of an effort to get regional governments involved in stabilizing Iraq.

Bush, attending a NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, renewed his pledge Tuesday not to pull U.S. troops out "until the mission is complete." He also repeated a warning to both Iran and Syria not to meddle in Iraq.

Stepping Into Iraq (WP)

By Nawaf Obaid

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

In February 2003, a month before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, warned President Bush that he would be "solving one problem and creating five more" if he removed Saddam Hussein by force. Had Bush heeded his advice, Iraq would not now be on the brink of full-blown civil war and disintegration.

One hopes he won't make the same mistake again by ignoring the counsel of Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, who said in a speech last month that "since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited." If it does, one of the first consequences will be massive Saudi intervention to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis.

Over the past year, a chorus of voices has called for Saudi Arabia to protect the Sunni community in Iraq and thwart Iranian influence there. Senior Iraqi tribal and religious figures, along with the leaders of Egypt, Jordan and other Arab and Muslim countries, have petitioned the Saudi leadership to provide Iraqi Sunnis with weapons and financial support. Moreover, domestic pressure to intervene is intense. Major Saudi tribal confederations, which have extremely close historical and communal ties with their counterparts in Iraq, are demanding action. They are supported by a new generation of Saudi royals in strategic government positions who are eager to see the kingdom play a more muscular role in the region.

Because King Abdullah has been working to minimize sectarian tensions in Iraq and reconcile Sunni and Shiite communities, because he gave President Bush his word that he wouldn't meddle in Iraq (and because it would be impossible to ensure that Saudi-funded militias wouldn't attack U.S. troops), these requests have all been refused. They will, however, be heeded if American troops begin a phased withdrawal from Iraq. As the economic powerhouse of the Middle East, the birthplace of Islam and the de facto leader of the world's Sunni community (which comprises 85 percent of all Muslims), Saudi Arabia has both the means and the religious responsibility to intervene.

Just a few months ago it was unthinkable that President Bush would prematurely withdraw a significant number of American troops from Iraq. But it seems possible today, and therefore the Saudi leadership is preparing to substantially revise its Iraq policy. Options now include providing Sunni military leaders (primarily ex-Baathist members of the former Iraqi officer corps, who make up the backbone of the insurgency) with the same types of assistance -- funding, arms and logistical support -- that Iran has been giving to Shiite armed groups for years.

Another possibility includes the establishment of new Sunni brigades to combat the Iranian-backed militias. Finally, Abdullah may decide to strangle Iranian funding of the militias through oil policy. If Saudi Arabia boosted production and cut the price of oil in half, the kingdom could still finance its current spending. But it would be devastating to Iran, which is facing economic difficulties even with today's high prices. The result would be to limit Tehran's ability to continue funneling hundreds of millions each year to Shiite militias in Iraq and elsewhere.

Both the Sunni insurgents and the Shiite death squads are to blame for the current bloodshed in Iraq. But while both sides share responsibility, Iraqi Shiites don't run the risk of being exterminated in a civil war, which the Sunnis clearly do. Since approximately 65 percent of Iraq's population is Shiite, the Sunni Arabs, who make up a mere 15 to 20 percent, would have a hard time surviving any full-blown ethnic cleansing campaign.

What's clear is that the Iraqi government won't be able to protect the Sunnis from Iranian-backed militias if American troops leave. Its army and police cannot be relied on to do so, as tens of thousands of Shiite militiamen have infiltrated their ranks. Worse, Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, cannot do anything about this, because he depends on the backing of two major leaders of Shiite forces.

There is reason to believe that the Bush administration, despite domestic pressure, will heed Saudi Arabia's advice. Vice President Cheney's visit to Riyadh last week to discuss the situation (there were no other stops on his marathon journey) underlines the preeminence of Saudi Arabia in the region and its importance to U.S. strategy in Iraq. But if a phased troop withdrawal does begin, the violence will escalate dramatically.

In this case, remaining on the sidelines would be unacceptable to Saudi Arabia. To turn a blind eye to the massacre of Iraqi Sunnis would be to abandon the principles upon which the kingdom was founded. It would undermine Saudi Arabia's credibility in the Sunni world and would be a capitulation to Iran's militarist actions in the region.

To be sure, Saudi engagement in Iraq carries great risks -- it could spark a regional war. So be it: The consequences of inaction are far worse.

Ten Months Or Ten Years (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Here is the central truth about Iraq today: This country is so broken it can't even have a proper civil war.

There are so many people killing so many other people for so many different reasons — religion, crime, politics — that all the proposals for how to settle this problem seem laughable. It was possible to settle Bosnia's civil war by turning the country into a loose federation, because the main parties to that conflict were reasonably coherent, with leaders who could cut a deal and deliver their faction.

But Iraq is in so many little pieces now, divided among warlords, foreign terrorists, gangs, militias, parties, the police and the army, that nobody seems able to deliver anybody. Iraq has entered a stage beyond civil war — it's gone from breaking apart to breaking down. This is not the Arab Yugoslavia anymore. It's Hobbes's jungle.

Given this, we need to face our real choices in Iraq, which are: 10 months or 10 years. Either we just get out of Iraq in a phased withdrawal over 10 months, and try to stabilize it some other way, or we accept the fact that the only way it will not be a failed state is if we start over and rebuild it from the ground up, which would take 10 years. This would require reinvading Iraq, with at least 150,000 more troops, crushing the Sunni and Shiite militias, controlling borders, and building Iraq's institutions and political culture from scratch.

Anyone who tells you that we can just train a few more Iraqi troops and police officers and then slip out in two or three years is either lying or a fool. The minute we would leave, Iraq would collapse. There is nothing we can do by the end of the Bush presidency that would produce a self-sustaining stable Iraq — and "self-sustaining" is the key metric.

In his must-read new book about the impact of culture on politics and economic development, "The Central Liberal Truth," Lawrence Harrison notes that some cultures are "progress-prone" and others are "progress- resistant." In the Arab-Muslim world today the progress-resistant cultural forces seem to be just too strong, especially in Iraq, which is why it is so hard to establish durable democratic institutions in that soil, he says.

"Some may hark back to our successful imposition of democracy on West Germany and Japan after World War II," adds Mr. Harrison. "But the people on whom democracy was imposed in those two countries were highly literate and entrepreneurial members of unified, institutionalized societies with strong traditions of association — what we refer to today as 'social capital.' Iraq was social capital-poor to start with and it now verges on bankruptcy."

On Feb. 12, 2003, before the war, I wrote a column offering what I called my "pottery store" rule for Iraq: "You break it, you own it." It was not an argument against the war, but rather a cautionary note about the need to do it with allies, because transforming Iraq would be such a huge undertaking. (Colin Powell later picked up on this and used the phrase to try to get President Bush to act with more caution, but Mr. Bush did not heed Mr. Powell's advice.)

But my Pottery Barn rule was wrong, because Iraq was already pretty broken before we got there — broken, it seems, by 1,000 years of Arab-Muslim authoritarianism, three brutal decades of Sunni Baathist rule, and a crippling decade of U.N. sanctions. It was held together only by Saddam's iron fist. Had we properly occupied the country, and begun political therapy, it is possible an American iron fist could have held Iraq together long enough to put it on a new course. But instead we created a vacuum by not deploying enough troops.

That vacuum was filled by murderous Sunni Baathists and Al Qaeda types, who butchered Iraqi Shiites until they finally wouldn't take it any longer and started butchering back, which brought us to where we are today. The Sunni Muslim world should hang its head in shame for the barbarism it has tolerated and tacitly supported by the Sunnis of Iraq, whose violence, from the start, has had only one goal: America must fail in its effort to bring progressive politics or democracy to this region. America must fail — no matter how many Iraqis have to be killed, America must fail.

This has left us with two impossible choices. If we're not ready to do what is necessary to crush the dark forces in Iraq and properly rebuild it, then we need to leave — because to just keep stumbling along as we have been makes no sense. It will only mean throwing more good lives after good lives into a deeper and deeper hole filled with more and more broken pieces.

Plumb Out Of Mission (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The meaning of the election was clear for all to see: The people plainly believed that the unified, pluralistic Iraq that the Bush administration insisted was growing stronger with each passing day actually had no future at all.

There's no other way to interpret the vote for the first Iraqi National Assembly, held one year ago, in December 2005. Overwhelmingly, Iraqis voted their sect rather than their nation. The Shiites, who constitute roughly 60 percent of Iraq's population, voted for Shiite parties, which now control roughly 60 percent of the National Assembly. The Sunnis and the Kurds voted for their own parties, too.

There was, to be sure, a national unity slate, a coalition of nonsectarian parties headed by former prime minister Ayad Allawi. It pulled down 8 percent of the vote.

For a moment, the U.S. government seemed to understand what the election meant. "It looks as if people have preferred to vote for their ethnic or sectarian identities," said Zalmay Khalilzad, our harried proconsul (okay, ambassador) in Baghdad. "But for Iraq to succeed there has to be cross-ethnic and cross-sectarian cooperation."

But if Iraqis had wanted Iraq to succeed, they would have voted for Allawi. Iraq, it turns out, was not the name of their desire, or their fear. And the civil war that has been growing relentlessly more horrifying since the election is ultimately just the continuation of their politics by other means.

Which is why the parallels to Vietnam are way too optimistic. In Vietnam, at least the United States could identify a government and some genuinely anti-communist constituencies with which it was plainly allied. But with whom do we stand, and who stands with us, in Iraq? Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki heads a Shiite-dominated government that grows closer to Iran and that is propped up by Moqtada al-Sadr, whose militia is the most powerful force in the country other than the U.S. Army, which Sadr has called on to leave Iraq forthwith.

As for the Sunni minority, it's among that group that the insurgency against both the U.S. occupation and the string of post-Hussein governments took root. At first the number of insurgents was relatively small, but as the Shiite-controlled police force joined the Shiite militias in anti-Sunni pogroms, the number of Sunnis taking up arms ballooned.

So -- which side are we on?

In the face of escalating civil war, of an increasingly Hobbesian conflict of each against all, the calls still coming from the U.S. military, the administration and Capitol Hill to step up our training of Iraqi forces seem light-years off the mark. The problem with Iraqi security isn't that Iraqi forces are poorly trained. It's that, like the rest of their countrymen, like the very government whose uniform they wear, they're not really invested in fighting for a unified, nonsectarian Iraq. Why do we expect them to defend an ideal that their countrymen either never believed in or were compelled to abandon under pressure of civil war?

But on matters Iraqi, much of the Beltway -- and not just the administration -- remains impervious to fact. "We've got to get the Iraqi army and police better equipped, better trained and into the fight," retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey declared recently. "And I think we've got 24 months." The police, of course, are already into the fight, many of them working with Shiite militias to execute Sunnis. They are, from any dispassionate perspective, proficient enough. Train them for 24 months and they will be the terror of the Earth.

We have plumb run out of mission in Iraq. We have enemies galore, but, other than the Kurds, precious few friends. We defend the idea of Iraq in the absence of Iraqis willing to do the same. We are at best a buffer -- unable to deter the daily atrocities but ensuring by our presence that they won't grow cataclysmically worse. Since we cannot deter the sectarian polarization, however, the cataclysm will follow our leave-taking whether it comes sooner or later.

Those who argue that we should send more troops (as if we had them) to Iraq, or train more Iraqis, or stay until the situation stabilizes should at least explain how the situation will stabilize, how nation-building will work in a nation that doesn't want to be built. We should, as George Packer has argued, rescue as many individual Iraqis as we possibly can on our way out. But rescuing Iraq from the forces we unleashed is plainly beyond us.

Or we could, I suppose, wait it out. About 100,000 Iraqis now flee the country every month for Syria or Jordan. At that rate, if we just hang on for 20 years, Iraq will be completely depopulated. The insurgency will be vanquished; sectarian strife will subside. Victory will be ours, and we can go home.

America Doesn't Cut And Run . . . (WSJ)

By Amir Taheri

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

The meeting in Jordan this week between George W. Bush and Nouri al-Maliki could be their last opportunity to develop a joint strategy on Iraq. President Bush, entering his lame-duck phase with Congress controlled by political adversaries, may see his influence in shaping policy diminish. Prime Minister Maliki risks being forced from office, pressured by domestic rivals and Iranian mullahs who resent his emphasis on "uruqa" (Iraqi identity) rather than Shiism. In this context, what Messrs. Bush and Maliki tell each other assumes the utmost importance.

The last time the two leaders met, Mr. Bush promised a U.S. commitment until Iraq could defend itself against domestic and foreign foes, even hinting at measures that would guarantee the vow under the next administration. He is no longer in a position to offer as much. Still, Mr. Maliki ought to ask for a reassertion of American commitment, the most effective weapon against the Saddamist and al Qaeda terrorists in Iraq. At the end of this year, the mission of the U.S.-led multinational force, under a U.N. mandate, will end. Mr. Maliki should ask that it be extended for three years -- that is, until the next general election in Iraq.

While Iraq continues to need a U.S. and allied presence, the country is putting the final touches on a plan under which the army and police assume responsibility for security in all 18 provinces before the end of 2007. (This is already the case in five provinces, with two more slated to be handed over before the end of the year.) Mr. Maliki might also ask for renewed support for the Iraqi army, which the president has often praised, but to which his administration has been reluctant to give the vote of confidence it deserves.

In addition to a lack of modern equipment, the army has virtually no logistics -- without U.S. forces, it would have to hire taxis to reach any battlefield. Too few American and other allied officers and NCOs are seconded to the army. Iraq also faces a desperate shortage of officers. At the current rate of training it might need another 10 years to reach its targets.

There is also talk of approaching some of the enemies of the U.S., notably Iran and Syria, in the hope of getting their help in ending the violence in Iraq. Mr. Maliki must demand that Mr. Bush reject such talk. Suspicions that the U.S. might try to hand Iraq over to Iran would incite Iraqi nationalists against the very democratic process he wishes to defend. Mr. Maliki might suggest: Instead of talking to enemies, why not talk to friends? Ask, for example, the "moderate" Arab friends, and some NATO allies, to end their boycott of the new Iraq. Why do they refuse to reactivate their embassies in Baghdad and appoint full ambassadors? Why do they allow their territory to be used for jihadi recruitment, fundraising and deployment to Iraq?

But the real war over Iraq is fought in the U.S. Here, Mr. Bush's administration continues to fail to explain what is at stake. In the Middle East, the old status quo and the balance of power that sustained it have been shattered. The region needs new structures of stability, which could either be created by the U.S. and its allies, including the new regimes in Kabul and Baghdad, or by the enemies of the U.S., particularly Tehran and its Syrian clients. An undemocratic and anti-American region will become a marshland of fanaticism where terror is bred, a point Mr. Maliki should drive home. U.S. national security requires success not only in Afghanistan and Iraq but also throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Maliki should also emphasize the successes the U.S. has seen in Iraq: Saddam Hussein has been toppled; and power has been transferred to the people of Iraq, who have written their own constitution and conducted free elections. Not surprisingly, this new Iraq is challenged by all manner of retrograde forces: pan-Arabists, pan-Islamists, jihadists, Khomeinists and downright nihilists. That challenge, he should note, must be met with determination.

In his response, Mr. Bush should recognize his own limitations. As the recent elections revealed, a majority of Americans have doubts about the wisdom of involvement. It is not enough for him to say the U.S. has achieved its objectives if the lack of basic security in Baghdad makes it impossible for millions to enjoy their new freedoms. But as the power of the Tikriti clique has devolved on the people of Iraq, Mr. Bush must ask them to be its primary defenders. This will require the government and parliament to take a number of measures.

For one, it needs to postpone plans for a federal system that is anathema to Arab Sunnis and regarded with suspicion by secular Shiites, and recognize that it may take years to build an acceptable consensus on that issue. Parliament must freeze the issue of Kirkuk until after the next general election in 2009. It also needs to develop an equitable system of sharing oil revenues. Even if provinces that have no oil get a bigger role for a few years, the price is worth paying to maintain Iraq's unity.

Mr. Bush should also allow that the disbanding the army of the former regime was a mistake, albeit one done on the advice of the new Iraqi political elite, including Mr. Maliki's camp. The way to rectify the mistake is to invite all former offices and NCOs, if they wish, to return to service. With stringent screening measures in place, Iraq would be able to keep the undesirable elements out while allowing others a second chance. In the same spirit, parliament must also come up with a more comprehensive amnesty law to cover hundreds of thousands of people whose sole offense was membership in the Baath Party, often forced upon them by circumstances.

Mr. Bush must also emphasize that Mr. Maliki's government has failed to develop a coherent strategy for dealing with security issues. It needs a coordinator to make sure that the ministries of defense and interior, the army command, the police hierarchy and the dozen or so different armed units attached to different ministries work together to prevent infiltration and rogue actors, including those that pose as Shiite militias. It also needs to root out corruption and nepotism. Mr. Maliki must have heard what they say in Baghdad teahouses about "a government of thieves and their cousins." Perhaps this is unfair. But corruption could become as much of a threat as the jihadists.

Finally, while Mr. Bush should demonstrate that America remains committed to the new Iraq, he should only prepare to renew the U.S. mission for one more year, dependent on a credible plan for transferring responsibility for security to the Maliki government. In that year, the U.S. ought to intensify its training programs and examine options for expanding the weapons system of the new Iraqi army. Contrary to some perceptions, America does not abandon its friends. It will certainly not hand Iraq to its enemies, least of all Iran. But nor does it write blank checks.

In Statement, Defense Choice Criticizes Iraq Planning (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — In his first detailed public statement since his nomination as defense secretary, Robert M. Gates criticized the Pentagon as failing to prepare adequately for securing Iraq after the invasion in 2003.

Asked in a questionnaire from the Senate Armed Services Committee what he would have done differently in Iraq if he had been defense secretary in the last six years, Mr. Gates responded: “War planning should be done with the understanding that postmajor-combat phase of operations can be crucial. If confirmed, I intend to improve the department’s capabilities in this area.”

He added that “with the advantages of hindsight, I might have done some things differently.”

He kept mainly to generalities in the 60 pages of answers to committee members’ questions. The White House sent the document to committee members on Tuesday.

The confirmation hearing is set for next week.

By criticizing the Iraq planning, however obliquely, Mr. Gates offered a glimpse of how he might distance himself from the record of the current secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who will step down.

Mr. Rumsfeld has acknowledged mistakes in Iraq, but has dismissed criticism that too few American troops were dispatched to preserve order after Saddam Hussein’s fall in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0099494

Mr. Gates is scheduled be the sole witness at a one-day hearing next week that appears to be likely to speed him toward confirmation, Congressional officials from both parties said.

Even Democrats on the committee say that barring an unexpected disclosure Mr. Gates is likely to be approved by the Armed Services Committee and, soon thereafter, by the full Senate before it adjourns next month.

Mr. Gates's carefully couched answers displayed few policy differences between him and the administration and, in many cases, states administration policy in anodyne language.

Several replies appeared fashioned to reassure that Mr. Gates is entering the job with a realistic assessment of its challenges and leaving open the possibility of changes in policy.

Asked whether the United States should engage in direct talks with Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq, Mr. Gates shied from endorsing bilateral overtures to either country.

"Engagement with Iran might well come as part of an international conference," he said.

Talks with Damascus could "take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference," he added.

But he also said, "No option should be taken off the table," noting that "even in the worst days of the cold war, the United States maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China."

A bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton is widely expected to recommend an aggressive regional diplomatic initiative that includes direct talks with Iran and Syria. Mr. Gates was a member of that panel before resigning after his nomination.

His reply on Iran backed slightly from a study of which he was a co-author for the Council on Foreign Relations. The examination called for the United States to "engage selectively" with Iran, in part to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons.

The administration has offered to hold direct talks only if Iran suspends its nuclear enrichment program.

"It is one thing to direct a study as a private citizen and another to serve as a senior policy maker," Mr. Gates said.

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will become chairman of the Armed Services Committee in January, said in an interview he intended to question Mr. Gates carefully about his willingness to challenge Iraq strategy in internal administration discussions, something that Mr. Levin said had not been welcome at the top levels of the administration.

In a private meeting this month, Mr. Levin said, Mr. Gates "assured me that this is the approach he will be taking."

Mr. Gates, former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, signaled that he would re-examine Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts to build up intelligence gathering at the Pentagon and its use of special forces for counterterrorism operations.

Mr. Gates and other C.I.A. veterans have criticized that policy.

"Clearly, if confirmed, this will be an area that I would look into," he wrote.

Mr. Gates told the committee that he backed Mr. Bush's decision to invade Iraq in 2003. In response to a question noting that nonconventional weapons were not found, he said: "I believe the use of pre-emptive force should be based on very strong evidence. It is a decision that must not be taken lightly."

He defended the decision in 1991 by the first President Bush, for whom Mr. Gates was deputy national security adviser as well as intelligence director, not to push to Baghdad, after forcing the Iraqi army from Kuwait.

"I do not believe we were mistaken," he said. "The coalition had not planned for, or resourced for, military operations to occupy Iraq."

Gates Warns Against Leaving Iraq 'In Chaos' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to become the next secretary of defense, said he opposes a swift pullout from Iraq, arguing in written testimony submitted yesterday to Congress that "leaving Iraq in chaos would have dangerous consequences both in the region and globally for many years to come."

Gates, whose confirmation hearings are scheduled to begin next week, also staked out positions on Iran and Syria that are consistent with his past views but appear to be at odds with the Bush administration's current policies. He called for diplomatic engagement with both countries, noting that "even in the worst days of the cold war the U.S. maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China and I believe those channels of communication helped us manage many potentially difficult situations."

Until he was nominated earlier this month by President Bush, Gates was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group is said to be leaning toward recommending that the Bush administration seek stability in Iraq partly by holding an international conference that includes Iraq's neighbors. In 65 pages of written answers to the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates repeatedly mentions such a conference.

"Our engagement with Syria need not be unilateral," Gates stated. "It could, for instance, take the form of Syrian participation in a regional conference."

That position conflicts with the U.S. stance on Syria particularly. The White House is deeply angry with Damascus, which it believes has broken a variety of commitments, such as pledges to contain traffic by foreign fighters across its border with Iraq and to close the offices of extremist groups. Its support for Hezbollah and its possible role in the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Lebanon -- the other beleaguered model for democracy in the region -- also have infuriated the administration. White House officials say they have already tried talking to Syria, to no avail.

Gates, a veteran intelligence official, also staked out strong positions on a variety of other subjects, from the growing strength of the Chinese military to the need to deploy a missile defense system even if it is incomplete.

In other comments touching on Iraq, Gates appears to criticize the handling of the invasion. "I believe the use of pre-emptive force should be based on very strong evidence," he said when asked about the Bush administration's decision to invade Iraq in part because of the belief, now largely discredited, that Saddam Hussein's regime possessed weapons of mass destruction. But Gates also noted that in 2003, he believed that Hussein possessed such weapons or the capacity to develop them.

He also stated that he intends to "improve" the Pentagon's ability to carry out post-invasion operations. "With the advantage of hindsight, I might have done some things differently," he said in response to a question about the six years in which Donald H. Rumsfeld has been defense secretary.

Discussing the war in Afghanistan, Gates also took the interesting step of criticizing the administration of President Bush's father, of which Gates was part. "In my opinion, we must avoid repeating the mistakes of the late 1980s when in retrospect we neglected Afghanistan after the Soviet withdrawal," he stated.

But he stood by the earlier Bush administration's decision not to invade Iraq after ousting Hussein's military from Kuwait during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Gates, who was then deputy national security adviser, argued that going to Baghdad was not part of the plan and would have shattered the coalition of nations that supported the war's limited objective of pushing Iraqi forces out of Kuwait.

Gates, who had the reputation of being a hawkish realist during the Cold War, seemed to be back in that mode in his discussion of China's growing military strength. "It appears to me that China is building capabilities to fight short duration, high-intensity conflict on its periphery," he wrote.

Although he believes China wants to take over Taiwan peacefully if possible, he writes, "their capabilities suggest they are prepared to consider the use of force if peaceful efforts fail."

He also endorsed continuing to develop and deploy strategic missile defense systems, even if they are incomplete or not fully tested. "North Korea and Iran continue to develop longer range missiles and are determined to pursue weapons of mass destruction," he wrote. "In this regard, defenses with a limited operational capability, at least initially, are better than no defenses."

Touching on a recent flurry of speculation about whether a military draft should be resumed, Gates said he is "absolutely" committed to preserving the all-volunteer force.

Turning On The Puppet (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

The pictures show a handsome blond kid. Nick Rapavi's family and friends described him as a tough guy with a selfless streak. He'd wanted to be a marine since high school, and his dress uniform had a parade of medals for heroism in Afghanistan and Iraq, including a Purple Heart. He was on his third overseas deployment, and planned to go to college when he finished this stint in the spring.

The 22-year-old corporal, the oldest son of a dentist, grew up in Northern Virginia in the shadow of the Pentagon. The kid described as being "full of life" died Friday in Anbar Province, the heartless heart of darkness in western Iraq, the hole-in-the-desert stronghold of the Sunni insurgency and Al Qaeda fighters.

His mother told The Washington Post that her son's squad had approached a gate on patrol, and Nick told his men to "stay back while he went through." He was shot in the neck by a spectral enemy that melted away, one of 2,874 brave Americans to die fighting in Iraq.

In Latvia, President Bush vowed yesterday that "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete." But his words about Iraq long ago lost their meaning. Especially the words "mission" and "complete."

At least in Anbar, the Pentagon may be about to pull troops off the battlefield. In another article yesterday, The Post, reporting on a classified Marine Corps intelligence report, said that "the U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter Al Qaeda's rising popularity there."

The Post went on: "The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as 'embroiled in a daily fight for survival,' fearful of 'pogroms' by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on Al Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital."

ABC Nightly News went even further last night, reporting that the Pentagon is "writing off" Anbar and will send the 30,000 marines stationed there to Baghdad. "If we are not going to do a better job doing what we are doing out there," a military official told Jonathan Karl, "what's the point of having them out there?"

President Bush is still playing games, trying to link the need to stay in Iraq with Al Qaeda. "No question it's tough," Mr. Bush said at a news conference. "There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place, fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by Al Qaeda, causing people to seek reprisal."

Never mind that W. dropped the ball on Osama, and that his own commanders have estimated that Al Qaeda forces represent only a fraction of the foe in Iraq. Al Qaeda wasn't even in Iraq until the Bush invasion.

The administration still won't admit the obvious, that our soldiers are stuck in the middle of a civil war and that it's going to take more than Dick Cheney powwowing with the Saudis to get us out of it. Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, gingerly talks of "a new phase" in the conflict.

But reality does break through at moments. As Mr. Bush and Mr. Hadley head to Jordan to try to tell Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki not to go all wobbly, a stunning secret memo from Mr. Hadley has surfaced, expressing severe skepticism about whether our latest puppet can cut it.

Michael Gordon reveals in today's Times that in a classified assessment, Mr. Hadley wrote that the Iraqi leader, who is getting pushed around by Moktada al-Sadr, was having trouble figuring out how to be strong.

"The memo suggests that if Mr. Maliki fails to carry out a series of specified steps," he writes, "it may ultimately be necessary to press him to reconfigure his parliamentary bloc, a step the United States could support by providing 'monetary support to moderate groups,' and by sending thousands of additional American troops into Baghdad to make up for what the document suggests is current shortage of Iraqi forces."

Just what the election said Americans want: More kids at risk in Baghdad. (W.'s kids, of course, are running their own risks, partying their way through Argentina.)

Mr. Hadley bluntly mused about Mr. Malaki: "His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shi'a hierarchy and force positive change. But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

It's bad enough to say that about the Iraqi puppet. But what about when the same is true of the American president?

Shi'ites, Sunnis Amass Arms (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Rival Shi'ite and Sunni groups are massing their militias in expectation of major confrontations, Iraqis say, even as President Bush prepares to meet today with the nation's embattled prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Bush's meeting in Jordan is part of a wider attempt to involve Iraq's neighbors in efforts to end Iraq's vicious sectarian violence before it spills over into a larger regional conflict.

But Iraqis on both sides of their nation's sectarian divide report worrisome signs that the conflict will soon evolve into pitched battles between large armed groups.

One secular Shi'ite speaking on the telephone from Baghdad said Shi'ite militias were massing in preparation for a large offensive against Sunnis in the capital.

"They had a big militarylike ceremony today for the Mahdi militia, to show their force. They are making themselves ready for something big -- protests, fighting, killing," said the Shi'ite.

A secular Sunni in close contact with one insurgent faction, said rebel Sunnis were also trying to form alliances among militias for a big push in the city against the Shi'ites, including more raids on government buildings.

"I am waiting for the Sunnis to launch a 'Tet Offensive.' That is the one plug they have not pulled yet, and I could see that happening," said senior Rand defense analyst Ed O'Connell.

The Tet Offensive was a series of attacks by the North Vietnamese and their Viet Cong allies that many consider a turning point in the war, leading eventually to the U.S. withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0099497

Any emergence of pitched battles between massed groups of Sunnis and Shi'ites would largely settle a long-running argument in Washington over whether the conflict in Iraq should be described as a civil war -- a description the Bush administration has so far rejected.

However the depth of concern over the rising levels of violence is evident in the flurry of diplomacy leading to Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. al-Maliki in Amman today.

Vice President Dick Cheney met with King Abdullah in Saudi Arabia on Saturday, and Iraqi President Jalal Talabani held talks Monday and yesterday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Both Iranian leaders pledged to help Iraq, but sharpened the political divisions with the United States by accusing Washington of destabilizing the region by supporting Sunni "outlaws."

King Abdullah II of Jordan, meanwhile, has said that "something dramatic" must come out of the meeting because Iraq is "beginning to spiral out of control."

While the Bush administration has been reluctant to recruit clearly hostile regimes in Tehran and Damascus into the Iraq effort, many analysts have concluded that there is no other choice.

"The only people who are going to be able to put this back into the box are not the American politicians or American military -- it is the Iranians, the Syrians, the Jordanians and the Saudis," said Mr. O'Connell.

An adviser to the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, said any talks with Iran must deal more with the violence in Iraq than with Tehran's nuclear program.

If Mr. Cheney's meeting with the Saudis "was more about Iraq -- rather than Iran and the nuclear issue -- that would be a more hopeful sign," said the former U.S. military officer who would only speak on the condition of anonymity because of his involvement with the Iraq Study Group.

"There might be some indication that the administration is having dialogue with Iran about Iraq," he said.

Mr. al-Maliki is expected to ask Mr. Bush to set a timetable for removing U.S. troops from Iraq, although there are deep disagreements in Washington whether that would make matters better or worse.

There are also serious questions as to how much control Mr. al-Maliki has over his own government and country.

"Al-Maliki is heavily under the sway of [radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada] al-Sadr. He is afraid of al-Sadr, is kowtowing to the Iranians, has no idea of how to deal with the United States, and is the worst possible candidate to lead the country out of this mess," said Mr. O'Connell.

Iraqis in Baghdad note that Mr. al-Maliki was pelted with rocks on Sunday when he went to visit grieving families in Sadr City -- once the base of his support.

Mr. Bush is expected to publicly reiterate his support for Mr. al-Maliki, but privately push the Iraqi leader to take effective action against the Shi'ite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army of Sheik al-Sadr.

"You are faced with the fact that Sadr has to be stopped, or you have to concede the battle of Baghdad to him," said security analyst Robert Killebrew.

"In the past 30 days, what we've got is the Sadr militia openly trying to take over Baghdad and run the Sunnis out, and we simply can't tolerate Sadr any longer," Mr. Killebrew said. "He has emerged as our number one problem in Iraq."

U.S. Military Predicts Rising Violence In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 -- Parliament voted unanimously Tuesday to keep Iraq under a state of emergency for 30 more days, as a U.S. military spokesman said he expects violence to escalate over the next few weeks in response to Thursday's bombings in Sadr City.

Renewed every month since first authorized in November 2004, the state of emergency allows the Iraqi government to impose a nighttime curfew and make arrests without warrants.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, told reporters Tuesday that he expects to see "elevated levels of violence" as a result of the car bombings that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite district in northeast Baghdad. The coordinated attacks set off a wave of retaliatory killings in Sunni neighborhoods.

While acknowledging the sectarian conflict, Caldwell stopped short of characterizing it as a civil war.

"We don't see somebody competing for control of the country here at all," he said at a press briefing. "What we see is a country that's still functioning and still has duly elected representatives in charge who are able to give instructions and orders to their security forces."

Late Tuesday, the military announced that six Iraqis, including five girls ranging in age from infant to teenager, were killed during a firefight between U.S. soldiers and suspected insurgents in western Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0099498

The fighting began when the soldiers tried to clear a roadside bomb in the town of Hamaniyah, northeast of Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold. As two men fired small arms from the roof of a house, the troops responded with machine guns and tank rounds.

Searching the house after the fighting ended, the U.S. patrol found six bodies and a wounded woman who refused treatment. There were no U.S. casualties, the military said.

In the past 24 hours, 40 bodies were found in Baghdad, showing signs of torture and gunshot wounds to their heads. Among them were three beheaded bodies and two female bodies, said Col. Kareem Abdul Aziz Hussein of the Interior Ministry.

Meanwhile, two car bombs exploded behind Yarmouk Hospital in west Baghdad, killing five people and wounding 11, Hussein said. In the northern city of Kirkuk, a suicide bomber attacked a convoy belonging to provincial Gov. Abdul Rahman Mustafa near the city's hospital, wounding four bodyguards and killing a civilian, Kirkuk police Capt. Shakhwan Abdulallah said.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, during his second day of meetings with Iranian leaders in Tehran, sought the counsel of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, in dealing with Iraq's sectarian strife. Khamenei blamed the United States for the violence, accusing it of hiring terrorists and former members of Saddam Hussein's ousted government, according to Iranian state-run television.

"The first step to resolve the instability in Iraq is the withdrawal of occupiers from this country and the transfer of security responsibilities to the popular Iraqi government," Khamenei said.

The U.N. Security Council, however, voted unanimously to extend the mandate of the 160,000-member multinational force in Iraq through Dec. 31, 2007. The council acted in response to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said his government needs more time to assume full responsibility for security and stability in the country.

As in previous resolutions, the council committed to "terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq."

Meanwhile, the number of U.S. military deaths in Iraq announced by the Pentagon rose to 2,880. The U.S. military announced that a Marine died Monday in Anbar province from injuries sustained in combat.

The military is also investigating the crash of a U.S. Air Force F-16 fighter jet in a field 20 miles northwest of Baghdad on Monday afternoon. Caldwell said the pilot's fate was still unknown. He said there was no evidence that the plane had been shot down, despite the presence of insurgents in the area.

Air Force Brig. Gen. Stephen L. Hoog said at a press briefing that the ejection seat and other instruments had been found and that investigators were analyzing DNA samples. He said that insurgents were in the area immediately after the crash but that he did not know how long it took U.S. forces to get there.

Also on Tuesday, Iraqi police arrested 11 insurgents who set up a fake checkpoint in the Dora neighborhood in southern Baghdad after a two-hour chase, said Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, an Interior Ministry spokesman. One police officer was killed and three injured during the chase.

Witnesses Detail Iraq Burning Deaths (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

The attack on the small Mustafa Sunni mosque began as worshippers were finishing Friday midday prayers. About 50 unarmed men, many in black uniforms and some wearing ski masks, walked through the district chanting "We are the Mahdi Army, shield of the Shiites."

Fifteen minutes later, two white pickup trucks, a black BMW and a black Opel drove up to the marchers. The suspected Shiite militiamen took automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers from the vehicles. They then blasted open the front of the mosque, dragged six worshippers outside, doused them with kerosene and set them on fire.

This account of one of the most horrific alleged attacks of Iraq's sectarian war emerged Tuesday in separate interviews with residents of a Sunni enclave in the largely Shiite Hurriyah district of Baghdad.

The Associated Press first reported on Friday's incident that evening, based on the account of police Capt. Jamil Hussein and Imad al-Hashimi, a Sunni elder in Hurriyah, who told Al-Arabiya television he saw people who were soaked in kerosene, then set afire, burning before his eyes.

AP Television News also took video of the Mustafa mosque showing a large portion of the front wall around the door blown away. The interior of the mosque appeared to be badly damaged and there were signs of fire.

However, the U.S. military said in a letter to the AP late Monday, three days after the incident, that it had checked with the Iraqi Interior Ministry and was told that no one by the name of Jamil Hussein works for the ministry or as a Baghdad police officer. Lt. Michael B. Dean, a public affairs officer of the U.S. Navy Multi-National Corps-Iraq Joint Operations Center, signed the letter, a text of which was published subsequently on several Internet blogs. The letter also reiterated an earlier statement from the U.S. military that it had been unable to confirm the report of immolation.

The AP received no comment Friday when it first asked the U.S. military for information. It then carried portions of a U.S. military statement Saturday that said the U.S. had been unable to confirm media reports that six Sunni civilians were allegedly dragged out of Friday prayers and burned to death. The U.S. military said that neither police nor coalition forces had reports of such an incident.

The Iraqi Defense Ministry later said that al-Hashimi, the Sunni elder in Hurriyah, had recanted his account of the attack after being visited by a representative of the defense minister.

The dispute comes at a time when the military is taking a more active role in dealing with the media.

The AP reported on Sept. 26 that a Washington-based firm, the Lincoln Group, had won a two-year contract to monitor reporting on the Iraq conflict in English-language and Arabic media outlets.

That contract succeeded one held by another Washington firm, The Rendon Group. Controversy had arisen around the Lincoln Group in 2005 when it was disclosed that it was part of a U.S. military operation to pay Iraqi newspapers to run positive stories about U.S. military activities.

Seeking further information about Friday's attack, an AP reporter contacted Hussein for a third time about the incident to confirm there was no error. The captain has been a regular source of police information for two years and had been visited by the AP reporter in his office at the police station on several occasions. The captain, who gave his full name as Jamil Gholaiem Hussein, said six people were indeed set on fire.

On Tuesday, two AP reporters also went back to the Hurriyah neighborhood around the Mustafa mosque and found three witnesses who independently gave accounts of the attack. Others in the neighborhood said they were afraid to talk about what happened.

Those who would talk said the assault began about 2:15 p.m., and they believed the attackers were from the Mahdi Army militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. He and the Shiite militia are deeply rooted in and control the Sadr City enclave in northeastern Baghdad where suspected Sunni insurgents attacked with a series of car bombs and mortar shells, killing at least 215 people a day before.

The witnesses refused to allow the use of their names because they feared retribution either from the original attackers or the police, whose ranks are infiltrated by Mahdi Army members or its associated death squads.

Two of the witnesses — a 45-year-old bookshop owner and a 48-year-old neighborhood grocery owner — gave nearly identical accounts of what happened. A third, a physician, said he saw the attack on the mosque from his home, saw it burning and heard people in the streets screaming that people had been set on fire. All three men are Sunni Muslims.

The two other witnesses said the mosque assault began in earnest about 2:30 p.m. after the arrival of the four vehicles filled with arms. They said the attackers fired into the mosque, then entered and set it on fire.

Then, the witnesses said, the attackers brought out six men, blindfolded and handcuffed, and lined them up on the street at the gate of the mosque. The witnesses said the six were doused with kerosene from a 1.3-gallon canister and set on fire at intervals, one after the other, with a torch made of rags. The fifth and sixth men in the line were set afire at the same time.

The witnesses said the burning victims rolled on the ground in agony until apparently dead, then the gunmen fired a single bullet into each of their heads.

The witnesses said residents, in the meantime, had taken up arms and began a gunbattle with the suspected militiamen that raged in the neighborhood until 4 p.m. They said eight to 10 gunmen were killed and left in the streets. Iraqi law allows each household to own an AK-47 assault rife for protection.

One witness said he and other people from the neighborhood took the six immolation victims to the Sunni cemetery near Baghdad's Abu Ghraib suburb and buried them after the gunbattle. That witness said one of the victims was the Mustafa mosque muezzin or prayer caller, Ahmed al-Mashadani. He did not know the names of the five others, but said they were all members of the al-Mashadani tribe.

Security Council Extends Mandate In Iraq (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 29, 2006

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Tuesday to extend the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq for one year, acting quickly ahead of a key meeting between U.S. and Iraqi leaders aimed at halting escalating violence in the country and paving the way for a reduction of American troops.

The council responded to a request from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout the country but that it needs more time.

Al-Maliki, who was scheduled to meet with President Bush in Amman, Jordan, on Thursday, gave no timetable for a takeover of military and security operations. But the Iraqi prime minister said the government is committed to putting all 18 provinces under Iraqi control — up from the two now under Iraqi authority.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, extends the mandate of the multinational force for one year starting on Dec. 31 and authorizes a review of the mandate at the request of the Iraqi government or by June 15. The resolution contains the same provision as past resolutions — a commitment that the council "will terminate this mandate earlier if requested by the government of Iraq."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton welcomed the council's support for the multinational force and its speedy adoption of the resolution, which was co-sponsored by Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia.

"I think this is a very important decision by the council," Bolton said. "It shows the resolve to continue to cooperate with the government of Iraq."

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin backed the resolution but expressed concern that it did not include Moscow's proposal to continue "the political process in Iraq," or promote "a constructive interaction" with Iraq's neighbors to help stabilize the country quickly.

Despite efforts made by the Iraqi government and the multinational force, he said, "the growth of violence and terrorist activity continues." He called the continuing division of Iraq's Arab population a great threat for the future of the country and said national reconciliation is vital.

France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere also expressed concern at the worsening security situation. "We all share the same objective, which is to help Iraq to not fall into the civil war that threatens it, and to recover the stability that it aspires to," he said.

Sectarian violence in Iraq is at its worst level in the 3 1/2 years since a U.S.-led coalition invaded the country and toppled Saddam Hussein.

Bush's summit comes as members of the Iraq Study Group, an independent U.S. panel, mull recommendations for changes in U.S. war policy that would help restore peace and security and enable the United States to reduce its 141,000 troops.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday that Iran and Syria should work with the United States and the international community to resolve the Iraq conflict.

"I have been quite clear that the two countries have a role to play and they should become part of the solution," he said. "And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue, and let them assume some of the responsibility."

Annan indicated this was one of "quite a few" recommendations he made to the Iraq Study Group's members by teleconference on Monday, hours after he told reporters Iraq is close to civil war.

"I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there," Annan said. "In fact, we are almost there."

Asked about Annan's call for Iran and Syria to be brought into an Iraq solution, Bolton said, "We take due note." Bush has said the U.S. will not talk to Iran until it suspends uranium enrichment, a process that can be used to make nuclear weapons.

Annan Seeks Summit Outside Iraq To Reconcile Factions (WP)

By Robin Wright And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The U.N. Security Council unanimously extended the mandate for the 160,000-strong U.S.-led coalition in Iraq for an additional 12 months yesterday, as Secretary General Kofi Annan proposed an international conference at a venue outside the war-torn country to forge reconciliation among Iraq's political parties.

Addressing what may be the most controversial issue to face the Bush administration, Annan said that Iran and Syria should be included in efforts to stabilize Iraq.

"The two countries have a role to play, and they should become part of the solution," he told reporters, reflecting strong international momentum behind a broader approach to Iraq's strife. "And we should bring them in and get them to work with us in resolving the issue and let them assume some of the responsibility."

The Iraq Study Group, the independent, bipartisan U.S. panel that is wrapping up an eight-month search for alternatives, has been discussing whether to reach out to Tehran and Damascus. But on the eve of talks between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, U.S. officials once again appeared to reject that option.

In its earlier discussions, the group of 10 prominent thinkers has explored ways to take a stronger regional approach to stabilizing Iraq, which overlaps with thinking at the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0099501

In a surprise move, the panel heard last-minute testimony from Annan and Sen. John McCain, (R-Ariz.) a strong advocate of sending more troops to Iraq. Annan's testimony, by videoconference from New York, had been deferred from an earlier date, but the 10-member panel asked McCain to talk to them in a hastily organized teleconference, according to sources in McCain's office. The panel, which has held months of informal, secret hearings, was supposed to have finished its interviews last week.

Neither of the two options put forward by experts advising the panel called for deployment of additional troops, although the idea of sending as many as 50,000 more was advocated in testimony by other Middle East experts.

McCain's aides would not disclose the substance of the senator's comments but referred to recent media appearances. On NBC's "Meet the Press" this month, McCain warned that even providing a date for withdrawal would lead to chaos in the region.

"There are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops," he said.

To stabilize Iraq, McCain advocated first getting Sunni areas under control, to show Shiites that they do not need militias to protect themselves from Sunni attacks. The present formula is "unacceptable," he said. He also predicted that the U.S.-led coalition is "either going to lose this thing or win this thing within the next several months."

The final report of the panel, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is due to be released as early as next week, before Congress adjourns.

Late yesterday, the panel decided to continue meeting for a third day of deliberations.

At the United Nations, Annan said the world body could host a conference to bring Iraq's ethnic and sectarian parties together, modeled on efforts to create stability in Afghanistan and the former Yugoslavia.

"The security in Iraq today is a major constraint," Annan said. "If we were to work out an arrangement where one can get the Iraqi political parties together, somewhere outside Iraq, as we did in Afghanistan, the United Nations can play the role it normally plays."

But in a reflection of growing concern about Iraq's turmoil, Annan and other U.N. officials have suggested that the United Nations would not be able to fill the vacuum if the United States lowered its profile in the country or left Baghdad.

"We should be very clear Washington can't move the problem a few hundred miles north" to the United Nations, the world body's deputy secretary general, Mark Malloch Brown, said at a recent conference on the Middle East sponsored by Princeton University. "Nobody should operate under the illusion that there is any other force out there which can replace the U.S. The U.N. couldn't do it. The neighbors won't do it."

Bush is likely to face more pressure for a broad solution when he meets with Jordan's King Abdullah, who will host a summit between Bush and Maliki. In a speech to parliament yesterday, Abdullah said the Arab-Israeli conflict remains the "core" issue in solving all other major problems in the Middle East.

6 Iraqis Killed As GIs Fight Insurgents (AP-Y)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

U.S. soldiers fought with suspected insurgents using a building as a safe house in Ramadi on Tuesday, killing one Iraqi man and five females, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the U.S. military said.

Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, has been the scene of some of Iraq's fiercest fighting between U.S. forces and Sunni insurgents. It is the capital of Anbar province, where many Iraqi insurgents are based.

The bloodshed came on a day that saw sectarian violence kill nine other Iraqis and wound about 50, police said. The bodies of 50 torture victims also were discovered, most of them in Baghdad and the city of Baqouba to the north, police said. Several of the corpses had been dumped at a bus station or outside a government building.

The battle in Ramadi began when a U.S. patrol discovered a roadside bomb in the Hamaniyah section of the city, and two suspected insurgents fled to a house, where they took up positions on the roof, the military said.

As coalition forces removed the bomb, the militants fired on the soldiers, who fought back with machine guns and tanks, the statement said.

Afterward, coalition forces searched the house and found the six bodies, ranging in age from an infant to teenagers, the military said, without providing ages. Another female was wounded but refused treatment, it said.

One of the gunmen may have been wounded and removed from the scene by other militants, the statement said, adding that there were no coalition casualties.

The military quoted residents as saying the building "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a military spokesman, said efforts were under way to "coordinate and offer available assistance to surviving family members."

DOJ_NMG_0099502

A U.S. Marine died Monday in another area of Anbar province, the military said, raising to at least 2,881 the number of members of the American military who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Iranian supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei blamed the United States for the chaos in Iraq, saying the answer to the violence is the withdrawal of foreign forces.

But following Khamenei's comments, the U.N. Security Council voted unanimously to extend for one year the mandate of the 160,000-strong multinational force in Iraq.

The council acted ahead of a key meeting in Jordan between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki aimed at halting escalating violence in the country and paving the way for a reduction of American troops.

The Security Council responded to a request from al-Maliki, who said a top government priority is to assume full responsibility for security and stability throughout Iraq but that it needs more time.

The Iraqi Parliament voted to extend the country's state of emergency through December, but the U.S. military warned of even worse sectarian violence after last week's deadly insurgent attack on Shiites in the capital.

Citing the insurgent attack that killed at least 215 people in Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum on Thursday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said al-Qaida in Iraq is determined to dominate Baghdad, weaken the Iraqi government and kill as many Shiites as possible to deepen Iraq's sectarian divisions.

"We expect to see elevated levels of violence as a result of this over the next several weeks," Caldwell told reporters in the Green Zone, the heavily fortified section of Baghdad where the Iraqi government and the U.S. and British embassies are based.

He also said that while recent polling has indicated a large majority of Iraqis feel more loyalty to their democratically elected government than to their sect, ethnic group or tribe, "these numbers by themselves do little to counter the violence currently raging on Baghdad's streets."

The parliamentary vote continues the state of emergency that allows a nighttime curfew and gives the government extra powers to make arrests without warrants and launch police and military operations. The measures, in place everywhere except for the northern autonomous Kurdish region, have been renewed every month since they were first authorized in November 2004.

Meanwhile, videotape footage obtained by AP Television News appears to show the wreckage of a U.S. single-seat F-16CG jet in the farm field where it crashed Monday and the remains of an American serviceman with a tangled parachute nearby.

U.S. forces investigating the crash said insurgents had reached the site before American forces and the pilot is missing. Al-Jazeera satellite television broadcast similar pictures Monday, but declined to show the dead pilot, saying the footage was too graphic to air.

The U.S. Air Force jet crashed about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad while supporting extensive ground combat by coalition forces in Anbar, the Air Combat Command said.

U.S. Troops Kill 5 Girls In Assault On Insurgents (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 28 — American troops killed five girls, including at least one baby, and what the military described as either a boy or a man, when the troops attacked a house Tuesday in volatile Anbar Province after they suspected insurgents of firing at them from the roof of the house.

Another person, which the military described in a written statement as either a girl or a young woman, was wounded in the attack and refused treatment by the Americans.

The military said the killings occurred after troops spotted two suspected insurgents before dawn near a roadside bomb in the town of Hamaniyah, west of Baghdad. The men fled to the roof of a nearby house. When troops began defusing the bomb, the suspected insurgents began shooting, the military said.

The military said the Americans returned fire with machine guns and small arms and rounds from the main gun of one or more tanks. After the firefight, the Americans discovered the six dead Iraqis in the house.

It was unclear what happened to the suspected insurgents, but the military said “it was reported” that one was injured in the fight and carried away by other insurgents.

“In a very tragic way, today reminds us that insurgents’ actions throughout Iraq are felt by all,” Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a Marine spokesman, said in the statement. “Efforts are underway to coordinate and offer available assistance to surviving family members.”

DOJ_NMG_0099503

Anbar Province, a vast swath of desert and Euphrates River towns stretching from Baghdad to Iraq's western border, is the heartland of the Sunni Arab insurgency, which is battling to drive out the Americans and unseat the majority Shiites from the Iraqi government.

American troops in Anbar are fighting a holding action, unable to make any real headway against the insurgency while facing a mostly hostile civilian population. The pressures have already led to prominent incidents of civilian deaths — one unit of Marines is being investigated for whether it wrongfully killed 24 unarmed civilians in the town of Haditha last year.

In Baghdad, an Air Force spokesman, Brig. Gen. Stephen Hoog, said the military was still recovering parts from an F-16 fighter jet that crashed near the capital on Monday. It was unclear whether the jet and its pilot had been attacked, he said. Using an aerial drone, the military had observed insurgents in the area of the crash site, the general said.

The military said a marine died on Monday in Anbar from combat injuries.

Violence continued to roil Iraq one day before a scheduled meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Amman. At least 30 bodies were discovered in Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Four people were killed and 40 wounded when two car bombs exploded behind the morgue at Yarmouk Hospital in western Baghdad. A barrage of mortar rounds in the Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya injured at least 20 people.

At least 19 people were killed or found dead in Diyala Province, a police official said. In Kirkuk, at least one civilian was killed and 22 wounded when a suicide belt bomber exploded near a convoy carrying the governor of Tamim Province.

NATO Seeks More Troops In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

NATO was divided at its summit Tuesday on deploying more troops to Afghanistan's volatile south, with Germany resisting any permanently expanded presence and Canada complaining of bearing the brunt of an increasingly bloody mission.

Despite the strengthening Taliban insurgency and unexpectedly high casualties, NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said that by 2008, he hopes Afghan forces can begin taking over security tasks.

President Bush called the Afghanistan mission — which has mobilized 32,800 troops_ NATO's No. 1 operation. Defeating Taliban forces, he said, "will require the full commitment of our alliance."

"The commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," Bush said, crediting the alliance for helping Afghanistan go from "a totalitarian nightmare" to stability and steadily growing prosperity.

But German Chancellor Angela Merkel made clear that her country would not permanently expand its 2,900-strong force, though she said German forces could be deployed in the south in an emergency. Canada's foreign minister warned that public support will fade if other countries don't relax restrictions on use of their troops and help Canadian forces in the south.

Canada has suffered 44 deaths in Afghanistan — 36 this year alone. Most occurred after NATO forces moved into the south this summer.

Poland's Defense Ministry, meanwhile, said the full deployment of hundreds of new Polish troops to Afghanistan will be delayed by about three weeks because barracks for them will not be ready as scheduled.

De Hoop Scheffer urged NATO allies not to lose heart, insisting the operation was a "mission possible."

"We need to be frank about the risks, but we also need to avoid overdramatizing," he said. "NATO has been in Afghanistan for three years — time enough to know what it takes to succeed."

Afghanistan dominated the discussion at a gala dinner Tuesday evening, a senior NATO diplomat told The Associated Press, speaking on condition of anonymity. But the leaders were unable to persuade some countries to ease restrictions on the movement of their troops, he said.

Wednesday's summit-ending communique "will call on the Afghan government to assume a more distinctive role in maintaining security, and also call on the U.N. to manifest a leading role in the country," the official said.

Three countries pledged additional troops, one offered fighter aircraft, and in cases of emergency, all 26 NATO allies agreed "to come to the aid of each other," another alliance official said on customary condition of anonymity. He refused to elaborate on the countries or the troop levels.

The dangers to the NATO force were underscored by recent attacks that have shattered a period of relative calm.

On Tuesday, a suicide car bomber exploded his vehicle next to a counterterrorism police truck that had been chasing him in western Afghanistan, killing a police officer and wounding another. Two Canadian soldiers were reported slain by a suicide car bomber Monday, and on Sunday a suicide bomber killed 15 Afghans in a restaurant.

During a stop in Denmark en route to the summit, British Prime Minister Tony Blair stressed that NATO forces must have the flexibility and the troops to go where the need is greatest.

"We have got to send a clear message that NATO is prepared to make the military commitment necessary to sustain its mission in Afghanistan," he said. "It's important that we have the force generation and flexibility we need to make our mission successful."

"The important thing is that we recognize the operation in Afghanistan is of crucial importance to our own security," he added. "NATO's credibility is at stake here, and if we don't succeed in Afghanistan, the whole of our world will be less secure."

U.S. Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, said he had commitments from some of the nations that have imposed restrictions on the use of their troops that could free up about 2,000 additional soldiers for possible duty in the south.

Italy was expected to lift restrictions in extreme circumstances.

In addition to Afghanistan, NATO leaders plan to discuss the organization's emerging role as a guarantor of peace in global hotspots at the summit, which runs through Wednesday. They also planned to explore the possibility of forging closer ties with their Pacific allies.

Twenty-six presidents and prime ministers have gathered in Riga, the first to be held on the territory of the former Soviet Union.

Latvia, which shares a border with Russia, broke away from the Soviet sphere in 1991 and joined NATO in 2004.

De Hoop Scheffer called Russia, which long opposed NATO's expansion to its borders, an "important and privileged partner." He added that NATO's relations with Moscow must be "rejuvenated."

All 26 NATO allies have troops in the Afghanistan force, but military forces from Britain, Canada, the United States and others are fighting in the front line in the Taliban's southern heartland. These nations have complained that Germany, Italy, Spain and France are keeping their troops in the more peaceful north and west.

"Other NATO nations have troops there, but have imposed caveats on the use of them and on the use of their equipment — this at a time when NATO's commanders on the ground urgently require additional manpower," said Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga.

"NATO cannot afford to lose this crucial struggle against the regressive forces of a resurgent insurgency by being indecisive or lacking commitment," she said.

France is preparing to assume an expanded role in the Afghan mission. Officials said President Jacques Chirac would propose forming a contact group on Afghanistan to ensure that a global strategy guides NATO action in the country.

"The Europeans have relied on their American allies for too long," Chirac said in a statement. "They have to shoulder their share of the burden."

Bush Asks Nato To Step Up Afghan Efforts (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

President George W. Bush on Tuesday demanded Nato governments step up efforts in Afghanistan ahead of an alliance summit that sought to overcome differences on issues ranging from energy security to relations with Iran.

In a pointed speech in Riga, Mr Bush urged greater commitment from Nato governments that have been reluctant to deploy troops in the south of Afghanistan or relax restrictions on their contingents elsewhere in the country – such as France, Germany, Turkey and Spain.

“For Nato to succeed the commanders must have the resources and the flexibility to do their job,” he said.

France, Germany and Spain all said this week they could relax restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan to enable them to help in the turbulent south in case of emergencies. On Tuesday James Jones, Nato’s military chief, said that 10 to 15 per cent of restrictions were being lifted, a step equivalent to providing 2,000 soldiers.

On Tuesday night, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato secretary-general, was due to ask Nato’s 26 nations for confirmation that they would all come to the assistance of their allies in Afghanistan in case of emergency.

US officials say that the recent moves are encouraging but insufficient.

On Tuesday Tony Blair, the British prime minister, also called for greater flexibility in a speech in Copenhagen en route to the Riga summit. “It’s important that we recognise that this operation in Afghanistan is of crucial importance to our security. Nato’s credibility is at stake and if we don’t succeed in Afghanistan the whole of our world will be less secure,” he said.

Peter Mackay, Canadian foreign minister, also warned that support for the mission in his country – this week two Canadian soldiers died in Afghanistan – could deteriorate if other Nato missions did not reduce restrictions.

In one sign of emerging consensus, Mr de Hoop Scheffer said he “completely agreed with” a call from Jacques Chirac, French president, for an international “contact group” to work out international policy on Afghanistan. Such an entity would bring in neighbouring countries and international organisations.

But Washington has reservations about Mr Chirac’s proposal to include Iran, which has influence over the west of Afghanistan but has faced off the world’s big powers in a dispute over its nuclear programme. On Tuesday Mr Bush insisted that he would only contemplate direct talks with Tehran if it reined back on uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme.

In his speech, Mr Bush also highlighted the membership prospects of Georgia, although France and Germany are much less enthusiastic.

Nato officials sought to overcome their differences on a host of other issues, including energy security, an issue that Poland and the US would like to give greater prominence to but France says could distract the alliance from its core mission.

This week Richard Lugar, chairman of the US Senate’s foreign relations committee, said that Nato should include energy security in its mutual defence commitments and that allies should focus on helping other Nato states cope with cut-offs of Russian gas.

NATO To Bear Afghan Burden (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush yesterday challenged NATO members to boost their own defense spending and be willing to accept rough combat assignments, arguing that the alliance is now on a make-or-break mission in Afghanistan.

"To succeed in Afghanistan, NATO allies must provide the forces NATO military commanders require," the president said in Estonia, before heading to Latvia for a summit to chart the next two years' course for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. "Member nations must accept difficult assignments if we expect to be successful."

Mr. Bush also blamed al Qaeda for the increased violence in Iraq, and vowed not to withdraw troops from that nation as he prepares to meet today with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan.

"There's a lot of sectarian violence taking place -- fomented, in my opinion, because of the attacks by al Qaeda causing people to seek reprisal," Mr. Bush said at a press conference with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves.

In the middle of a four-day international trip to deal with the twin wars to which he has committed U.S. troops, Mr. Bush finds himself at the limit of military options and pushing other nations to step up their commitments.

In Iraq, he is dependent on how well Mr. al-Maliki's government handles the violence and political problems that threaten to tear the nation apart.

But on Afghanistan, he is not alone. Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer have called for European nations to step up their commitments and ease the burdens on the U.S., Canada, Britain and the Netherlands.

"It is not acceptable that our mission in the south still lacks 20 percent of its combined joint status of requirements," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said yesterday, calling on governments to stop adding conditions and limits to how their forces can be deployed. "We can ill afford reconstruction armies that cannot handle combat."

During his swing through these two Baltic countries, Mr. Bush pointedly praised Estonia and Latvia for their commitments in the war on terrorism, and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said those two nations are "punching above their weight" in terms of their military commitments.

The two countries have committed nearly 10 percent of their armed forces to Afghanistan and Iraq, and are "providing leadership in European institutions, despite their small size."

Asked if that meant some larger NATO members such as Germany were failing in their obligations, Mr. Hadley did not answer directly, saying instead it was right for Latvia and Estonia to be "acknowledged and recognized."

Also yesterday Mr. Bush:

·Took a swipe at Belarus, whose authoritarian leader is a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Mr. Bush said oppression of democracy advocates in the former Soviet state "offends the conscience of Europe, and it offends the conscience of America."

·Said NATO will invite other nations to join at the next summit, in 2008, with Croatia, Albania and Macedonia being likely candidates. Georgia is also a potential member, and Mr. Bush said the United States supports Ukraine's membership -- if the Ukrainians want it themselves.

·Said talking to Iran and Syria about the situation in Iraq is a job for the sovereign Iraqi government, not the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0099506

The president also ducked a question about whether Iraq has fallen into a "civil war," instead focusing on what he called increased sectarian violence. He said fomenting such violence is part of al Qaeda's plan in Iraq.

"The Samarra bombing that took place last winter was intended to create sectarian violence, and it has. The recent bombings were to perpetuate the sectarian violence," he said.

Meanwhile, Democrats are focusing on trying to get Mr. Bush to say the conflict has turned into a civil war.

"While news agencies, numerous experts and many American and Iraqi leaders all agree that Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, President Bush neither acknowledges the facts on the ground nor recognizes that his administration's failed policies have contributed to the chaos," said Democratic National Committee press secretary Stacie Paxton.

Bush's NATO Message Signals Concern On Afghanistan Front (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

RIGA, LATVIA — President Bush has long called the defeat of the Taliban a triumph of freedom over tyranny. But on Tuesday he tacitly acknowledged that not all is well in Afghanistan, four years after the U.S.-led invasion, and he exhorted allies to step up their cooperation or risk failure there.

Bush spoke on the first day of a summit among the 26 member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which now oversees about 30,000 allied troops in Afghanistan.

Some European nations have been reluctant to commit troops to the more dangerous southern regions of the country, where NATO faces a stubborn Taliban insurgency.

"For NATO to succeed, its commanders on the ground must have the resources and flexibility they need to do their jobs," Bush said during a speech at a university here in the Latvian capital. "Today Afghanistan is NATO's most important military operation, and by standing together in Afghanistan, we'll protect our people, defend our freedom, and send a clear message to the extremists the forces of freedom and decency will prevail."

Earlier in the day, in neighboring Estonia, Bush said NATO members "must accept difficult assignments if we expect to be successful."

Bush's comments, and the skittishness among allies in the face of an increasingly deadly Taliban insurgency, illustrate the troubles facing the president as he tries to build global support for his agenda, in Afghanistan and across the Middle East.

It served as a reminder that, although Iraq dominates the world headlines and shaped the debate in the U.S. midterm election, the war that was once considered a slam-dunk success is now very much in doubt.

Some of the early discussions Tuesday focused on Germany, which has troops in the safer, northern part of Afghanistan and has resisted sending troops to face combat in the south.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel reiterated those concerns during an appearance on Germany's N24 television, though she appeared to give some ground by pledging to do what she could to ensure NATO success.

"In emergencies we can help out in the south," she said. "But our place is in the north, where 40% of Afghanistan's population lives."

A NATO spokesman, referring to negotiations between Merkel and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, said Merkel's comments on emergency situations reflected a "meeting of the minds on the role of German forces in Afghanistan." The spokesman said that negotiations were ongoing but that the progress with Germany and other countries would lead to some improvement in the use of troops.

Officials are also taking a closer look at how violence has erupted anew in Afghanistan.

The White House said Tuesday that the insurgency had grown in the south largely because of an absence of government institutions outside of the capital, Kabul. Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, said the Taliban had "clearly exploited the absence of those institutions to begin burrowing into the south and mounting its attacks on coalition and Afghan forces."

NATO's supreme allied commander, U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, told reporters that it was a mistake to blame all of the country's troubles on the Taliban, listing drug traffickers, common criminals and tribal warriors as additional culprits.

Although the bulk of Bush's four-day trip is focused on a seemingly uphill struggle in the Middle East, the president appeared to relish his brief time in a corner of the world where the U.S. remains popular.

In Estonia and Latvia, he was greeted with applause and welcomed by both countries' presidents as a friend. Citizens of the former Soviet republics credit the U.S. with helping them win independence.

It is no coincidence that NATO, an organization created as a counterweight to the Soviet Union, decided to hold its summit in a Baltic state — a symbolic choice at a time Bush and others are seeking to expand the organization to include additional former Soviet republics.

DOJ_NMG_0099507

"We will also not falter in making Afghanistan more secure, where Estonian soldiers are helping to protect the welfare of Afghan citizens, again, together, hand in hand with the United States," said Estonian President Toomas Ilves, an Ivy League-educated former English teacher who made his remarks during Bush's visit to Tallinn, the country's capital.

Bush did not hesitate to express his enthusiasm for some of Estonia's more Republican-like policies, including its adoption 12 years ago of a flat income tax system. He mentioned Estonia's system no fewer than three times.

"They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple," he said.

A Strained Alliance (WP)

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

THE NATO alliance has been confounding prophets of its demise ever since the Cold War ended 15 years ago. For much of that time the military pact has played an unlikely but invaluable role as mentor to the formerly communist nations of Europe, granting 10 of them membership after requiring them to build democratic institutions. For the past several years it has played an increasingly important role in Afghanistan: Since the summer, NATO has led the fight against the Taliban in the unstable south, routing a large concentration of insurgents near Kandahar in the biggest battle in its history.

The skeptics were nevertheless back in force as NATO began its biennial summit meeting in Riga, Latvia, yesterday. They argue that despite NATO's battlefield success, Afghanistan is not looking good: The very fact that the Taliban has been able to infiltrate large parts of the south and stage major attacks on Western forces is one bad sign, along with a large increase in the production of poppies for opium, which funds insurgents and criminals. More than 90 percent of NATO's casualties have been borne by just three countries -- Canada, Britain and the United States -- which has created political problems on several home fronts as well as resentment toward those governments that refuse to send their troops to the south or that restrict the missions they can undertake.

NATO's democracy nursery is also in trouble. Western European governments suffering from "expansion fatigue" are resisting the entry of new countries into the process -- including several neighbors of Russia that badly need protection from the neo-imperialism of Vladimir Putin's Kremlin. Several Balkan countries that were already promised eventual membership are in danger of getting stuck halfway.

These are worrisome developments. Fortunately, there were signs at the summit that NATO's members will, as they often have before, do what is needed just before it's too late. The alliance's top commander, Marine Gen. James L. Jones, reported that a new appeal to governments for more troops and fewer restrictions in Afghanistan has yielded about 2,000 more soldiers who could be dispatched to the south. Poland will deploy a 1,000-member rapid reaction force early next year.

In a speech in Riga, President Bush spelled out a U.S. aim to bring Croatia, Albania and Macedonia into NATO by 2008 and to work toward membership for Georgia -- a democracy that Russia is doing its best to destabilize. NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer rightly pointed to the need for the alliance to step up development and reconstruction operations in Afghanistan, so that areas cleared of the Taliban will have a shot at stabilizing. If NATO's leaders can follow through on those commitments and objectives, the alliance could defy the prophets of its doom once more.

France's Two Faces On NATO (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

JACQUES CHIRAC IS expected to step down next year as France's president, so his clownish performance at Tuesday's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, was apparently something of a final Bronx cheer for his fellow Atlantic Alliance leaders. At a time when the alliance is crying out for sober deeds, the French are yet again uttering meaningless words.

Chirac's office was negotiating with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin to drop by Riga after the summit to celebrate the French leader's 74th birthday and perhaps dine with Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga. It's hard to imagine how even Chirac could be so tin-eared about politics in the Baltic states, where no Russian leader has visited since the Soviet collapse in 1991. The incident created an uproar, threatening to upstage the summit's few accomplishments, even though in the end the Kremlin canceled.

More tangibly damaging was Chirac's latest effort to assert French leadership out of one side of his mouth while limiting French support out of the other. "It is essential for each member state to agree to an appropriate defense effort," Chirac wrote in the Christian Science Monitor this week. "The Europeans have relied on their American allies for too long." Quite right, yet France is hardly setting a strong example.

The primary issue that NATO leaders hoped to address Tuesday is a shortage of troops in southern Afghanistan, where unexpectedly heavy resistance from the Taliban is endangering the alliance's most important mission. Among those not pulling their weight is France. Like Germany, Italy and Spain, France has placed caveats on the use of its 1,900 soldiers, preventing them from being shifted nimbly to the areas where they're most needed. The French also have refused to deploy a NATO strategic reserve battalion to address calls for 2,500 more combat troops.

NATO's mission in Afghanistan, unlike the war in Iraq, is a multilateral effort against a foe that presents a well-known threat to the West. A failure there would not only create a terrorist haven, it would expose NATO as a feeble, divided force. There were indicators Tuesday that some members have agreed to eliminate their caveats, which might bring more troops to the south. But the reluctance in many European capitals to commit the needed forces to such a vital effort is distressing.

This is not new territory for France. In 2005, Chirac announced with great fanfare that he would help stabilize Iraq by sending one (1) training officer to Brussels. When the call came out for a peacekeeping mission in Lebanon, Chirac's answer was a measly 200 French engineers. Stunts like the Putin invitation may make headlines, but it's the country's reluctance to participate fully in NATO — and lack of alternative ideas — that keep France from fulfilling a truly international role.

Living Symbols Of Reform In Afghanistan (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

AMONG the crowd of 800 turbaned elders who gathered in a vast tent, one person stood out: a slender woman in a white head scarf.

She took the podium only briefly, but when she did, most conversation came to a standstill. And though many of the bearded, tradition-bound elders are uncomfortable talking to a woman in public, several dozen clustered around her afterward to ask questions.

Her name is Zahera Sharif, and she is the only woman among the four members of Afghanistan's parliament from Khowst province. In a conservative area where it is possible to drive through towns without seeing a single woman on the street, she is a rarity.

As a member of parliament, she represents an institution that Western observers and experts in Afghanistan say is the country's best shot at building a stable democracy after years of war and religious extremism.

Among the 248 members of parliament's lower house, there are elders such as those Sharif met here. But there are also former exiles in Western-style business suits. All of the country's ethnic groups have a place: Uzbeks sit next to Tajiks; Pashtuns with Hazaras. There are onetime Taliban as well as their former Northern Alliance enemies. A quarter of the parliament members are women; not one wears a burka.

Some of those who gather in the low-slung building on the western edge of Kabul use old militia ties to get things done. Others take the floor to criticize the warlords. Or, like Sharif, they forgo the debate and focus instead on meeting the needs of their constituents.

"For the first time after 30 years of war, we've brought some major figures, who in the past would only talk to each other with a gun, under one roof," said Younis Qanooni, the speaker of parliament.

Western diplomats find some hope in that inclusiveness, as well as in the institution's willingness to challenge President Hamid Karzai.

The president has considerable authority, but parliament has insisted on its right to review his decisions. Deputies rejected five of Karzai's 25 nominations for Cabinet posts in the spring and seven of his picks for the Supreme Court, including one accused of selling legal decisions.

"More often than not, the reform impulse has come from the parliament," a senior Western diplomat said.

Not that it has been easy. The majority of Afghanistan's lawmakers still have their roots in the country's warring past. A number served as militia commanders and made their names and their money behind the barrel of a gun.

Even among the 68 women in parliament, U.S. and United Nations officials estimate that half have militia ties, and can be counted on to keep quiet and vote as they are told.

Some lawmakers still spit during sessions as though they were on a mountain road. Others doze off. A popular television news program was banned briefly from broadcasting parliamentary sessions because it showed lawmakers, heads thrown back, snoring. Many take the floor seemingly without any idea of what they want to say.

Despite their lack of experience in representative democracy, deputies have developed a range of styles to pursue their different political agendas on the floor of parliament and in visits to their districts.

Malalai Joya, a 27-year-old woman, publicly challenges the enduring power of warlords in a Western-style media campaign. For that, she has been pelted with water bottles in the parliament chamber, and twice her microphone has been shut off.

Haji Almas, 45, is a member of the old commanders network. He is angry that Karzai's government and its Western allies refuse to allow former warlords to run the country's military. But he also has embraced education and points with pride to schools that have been built.

Sharif, meanwhile, is a realist. Afghanistan will not change overnight, she believes. So she keeps quiet when commanders arrive at parliament sessions with their bodyguards in tow.

"They know they have done nothing for Afghanistan; they don't have answers for Afghanistan," said Sharif, 46. "But they are still there; they have supporters."

"People in parliament need to focus on issues one by one: electricity, jobs, education," she told the Khowst elders who had gathered in the tent to discuss pressing nationwide problems. "Everybody should think of the benefit of the society."

Getting an education

Sharif is no stranger to the conservative religious attitudes of southern Afghanistan. Her father was an imam, and he objected to her going to school past age 11. Miserable, she stayed in the women's quarters of the family home and stopped eating.

Her eldest brother finally won permission from their father to let her return to school, and later to take all his siblings to Kabul to finish high school, because schools there were better. Sharif went on to Kabul University, where she earned a master's degree in education. She became a member of the elite Academy of Sciences. At the time, Afghanistan was a Soviet satellite and many women were attending university and becoming professionals.

At the university, she met the man who became her husband, Mohammed Sharif Zadran, a Khowst native who also holds an advanced degree in education. In his own way, he is no less remarkable.

From the beginning of their courtship, he helped her to advance. When she was required to submit two copies of her 300-page master's thesis, he copied the second one by hand because Afghanistan had no copy machines.

But then the Taliban took over. She and her husband were forced to quit their jobs. Zadran had to do manual labor to help the family get by. After two years, they fled to Pakistan, where Sharif started a magazine for women, organized classes for Afghan refugee girls and trained female teachers who she hoped would go back to Afghanistan after the Taliban fell.

Within days of their return to Khowst when the rule of the mullahs was over, Sharif took off her burka and walked down the main street.

"Everybody was watching her as if they thought something terrible would happen — they were leaning out of doors, staring out of windows," recalled Naquibullah, the deputy director of Khowst's main radio station.

Despite ridicule from other men, Zadran stood by his wife when she decided to plunge into politics, even though it meant doing something unheard of for a woman here: going door-to-door in remote villages and introducing herself to strangers.

"People would say to me, 'How can you let your wife do that?' " recalled Zadran. He shrugged. "I said, 'What do you want me to do? Lock her in the house?' "

The answer for many Afghan men would have been 'yes.'

Sharif and Zadran have four children; both are devoted to caring for their youngest daughter, Zala, 3, who has Down syndrome.

And Sharif has tried to address the problems of young people in her legislative work.

She successfully fought legislation that would have allowed children as young as 13 to be punished as adults if they were found guilty of crimes.

She has been less successful fighting the corruption that permeates public and private life, or getting the central government to respond to her district's needs.

The agriculture minister gave Sharif barely 15 minutes of his time and flatly refused her request for subsidized fertilizer for farmers in her district. He didn't even respond to her complaints that most of the 40 goats that were designated for needy Khowst women ended up going to families who had connections to Agriculture Ministry officials.

More than once Sharif has joined with other reform-minded legislators to urge Karzai to replace corrupt police chiefs and governors connected with the opium trade.

"I told Karzai, 'You are just playing chess, taking the same person and moving him from one job to another,' " she said. "Then Karzai said, 'Give me men, give me names.' And we gave him names and he said, 'No, he's a Communist, no, he's this, he's that.' And he took almost none of them."

Afghan and international observers say Karzai's weak government relies on such local strongmen.

When she does overcome barriers to helping her constituents, Sharif finds it difficult to get credit.

She persuaded a rich Kabul resident to donate uniforms, sneakers, nets and balls to the Khowst volleyball and soccer teams, and she brought them when she returned from Kabul for the summer. But when she invited team members to her home to hand out the equipment, her husband and the coaches did most of the talking, and her resourcefulness went largely unappreciated by her constituents.

Where Sharif really shines is in her interaction with women, her original inspiration for entering politics. Women cast 45% of the votes in Khowst, and though some voted for men, analysts in Kabul believe that the vast majority voted for Sharif.

When she entered the high-walled compound that surrounds the Khowst women's center and the school for girls, she had hardly stepped out of her car before the women surged around her. There were young girls in their school uniforms clutching notebooks and pencils, older women who worked as cleaners, some still carrying their brooms. Teachers, middle-aged women with worn faces, reached over their students to touch her shoulder or hand.

As she handed out books and information about Women's Ministry programs from two huge sacks of supplies she had brought from Kabul, it was possible to believe Sharif could achieve her dream of "taking all the women with me" on her way forward.

There is a long way to go. A bare room serves as the reception area in the women's center. In stark contrast to the rooms warlords use when they hold court, this one had no rug or cushions, just flimsy plastic chairs, three scarred desks and a few torn fliers pinned to the walls.

There were no tea and biscuits, no plates of fruit. But the women's voices rose and fell as if they were at a feast. They recounted their latest trials and small victories: the difficulty of getting a job as a midwife, recent cases of child brides abused by men, the challenge of teaching science to students when there is not a single Bunsen burner in all of Khowst.

Sharif listened closely, nodding, occasionally asking a question or jotting something in a small notebook.

She believes in personal persuasion to bring about change. She knows that without female teachers, many families will not send their daughters to school. So she goes to the homes of women who have a university education and asks why they are not teaching. If they say their families will not allow it, she meets with their husbands, uncles, fathers and brothers, until she gets their agreement.

"I do not accept 'no,' " she said. "Usually, the men have not thought so hard about it, they have not thought that their wife will be earning money, that the family will be richer if the wife works. When they understand this and they understand that she will be with women, most of them accept it."

An influential man

Sharif's journey to her legislative district could not be more different than such a trip by Almas, the former commander of the Northern Alliance's 5th Corps.

Almas conveys his status with every gesture. He is so well known in Parwan province that when he stops his car to point out the location of a strategic battle, half a dozen vehicles pull off the road so their drivers can greet him.

Thickset, he wears a spotless white shalwar kameez and, even in the hot Afghan summer, the brown wool hat favored by Northern Alliance leaders. He moves with a determined stride.

His tone with subordinates is often peremptory; with supplicants, impatient. With those who consider themselves equals, he listens, then issues orders.

Westerners and some Afghan police officials describe him privately as a bully and a criminal who is active on the periphery of the lucrative narcotics trade, complicit in kidnappings and enriched by corrupt business deals. Some election officials attempted to prevent him from running, but failed, said a senior Western diplomat.

"Almas is one of the former commanders who has really cemented his power since he came into government," the official said.

Nasreen Gross, a sociology lecturer at Kabul University, said the international community must make an effort to win over men such as Almas. These former commanders influence many Afghans, and without their support, democracy could well fail, she said.

"They desire so much to be accepted by the West," Gross said. "Before, they had to do things illegally. No one helped them when they were fighting the Taliban. When you get involved in illegal activities, it's a cycle, it's self-perpetuating and insidious.

"We have to find an opening for those who want to gain respectability…. They can help us."

A trip home with Almas indicates that he is still divided between his warlord past and his emerging identity as a member of parliament, as though he has yet to decide whether the legitimacy of being in government is worth the payoff. So he veers wildly, dispensing tribal justice and bullying government officials, even while espousing education and adherence to the rule of law.

A man of limited education, Almas started fighting in his early teens. Now he is a fanatic about schooling.

In the early 1990s, when little education was available for girls, he built two schools in his district, one for boys and one for girls. His daughters are in high school, and he says he will allow them to attend university. He has two wives and is proud that the second is a university graduate.

DOJ_NMG_0099511

When he arrived in his home village of Rabat to eat lunch at the funeral of a village elder, scores of men gathered around him, a mirror image of Sharif's experience with women.

A privileged few ate with him in a small room and pressed their demands. Chief among them was jobs. They wanted the government to start a long-promised water project. Almas listened as he gnawed on a mutton bone and scooped up saffron rice with his fingers in the traditional Afghan style.

A little later an elder cornered him as he walked to the mosque for Friday prayers and asked for help. There had been trouble the night before, a knife fight between two boys. Both were wounded.

At the mosque, Almas spoke after the imam finished. "Don't behave in ways that make people call us the thieves of Rabat," he admonished the villagers.

Then he lashed out at imams for failing to preach the importance of education. "The mullahs taught us to reach for our guns but not for our pens. That is why our country is so behind," he said as the imam shifted uncomfortably.

After prayers, Almas held a meeting in a vast open tent in his family's walled rose garden. As young men served tea and candy, the two wounded boys, their heads bandaged, appeared with their fathers and grandfathers to apologize to the community for fighting the night before.

Almas made the fathers sign a pledge that they would go to jail if their sons started another dispute.

The next morning, Almas and an entourage of armed bodyguards zoomed in SUVs to the Parwan governor's office to discuss the delayed water project.

The governor, who wears Western clothes and comes from another province, explained the delay. He was trying to determine who needed the water most. He often consulted a thin, elderly engineer, who nervously flipped through a folder.

As he spoke, the governor sipped a cup of coffee. He failed to offer any to Almas, an insult seemingly intended to show that he stood outside Almas' influence.

Almas looked pointedly at the cup. "We are parched, and you are drinking. Why don't you offer us some?"

The governor didn't answer. After a few more minutes Almas, who was less interested in who got the water than in starting the project and distributing the jobs, slapped his knees and got up. His entourage rose around him.

"So the project starts tomorrow," he said, less a question than a command. The governor said nothing, but gave a slight nod, indicating that Almas would get his way. Satisfied, Almas clapped him on the shoulder as though they were friends. He and his men moved on.

War of words

Joya focuses on one theme, the enduring power of men such as Almas. She uses radio and television exposure to denounce them, and despite Afghanistan's limited media outlets, hers is a familiar voice in the country's larger cities.

The youngest member of parliament is already a master of the well-turned phrase, the eloquent exaggeration, the slight simplification. Along with parliament colleague Ramazan Bashar Dost, who works out of a simple tent in the middle of a Kabul park, she is one of Afghanistan's most prominent populists.

Her message is that despite the changes in Afghanistan, corruption is still rampant and the warlords are still in power.

"How can we have democracy when we have these warlords? The majority of seats [in the parliament] have been taken by these black persons…. First they should be tried by a court, but unfortunately the courts don't do that in Afghanistan," she said in one of the many interviews she gives to foreign and domestic reporters.

Even though she has become a well-known figure in many parts of Afghanistan, she remains a mystery in many ways. Most people who denounce the warlords will describe specific instances in which they, their families or perhaps their entire villages suffered. But Joya lived in Iran during much of the Taliban's rule.

Asked how she formed her viewpoint, she said only, "I suffered a lot and I saw people I know suffer. They cried, and I cried with them."

She has yet to make a concrete proposal for neutralizing the power of former commanders. So far, that doesn't seem to matter. Many people believe she is one of the few politicians who speak the truth.

They agree with her that brutal warlords now serving in high government positions are unlikely to look out for the best interests of the country.

"Malalai Joya says what many people know to be true," said Saad Mohseni, the director of Moby Capital Partners, which runs the popular Tolo TV channel.

Sharif's husband, Zadran, also says he admires Joya. "Not many people are willing to say the things she says, and to speak honestly about our situation in Afghanistan," he told his wife as they discussed corruption in their home province.

Joya's candor has provoked such serious threats that she canceled plans to visit her home province of Farah during parliament's six-week summer break because she could not get the United Nations to provide sufficient protection. In Kabul, she moves every few days among several houses where friends or relatives shelter her.

She stays in the public eye through high-profile speeches in parliament and regular interviews with journalists. One evening last summer, she invited 20 reporters to dinner at her home in Kabul.

"The current government is in the hands of warlords," she told the journalists. "Peace and security cannot be established. Bribery has reached its zenith. The current government is involved in bribery, smuggling and bombings."

There is little difference between the Taliban and its Northern Alliance enemies, she declared. "The Taliban and Northern Alliance are connected to each other like a chain. In fact, the Northern Alliance is a good brother of the Taliban."

Former militia commanders resent her deeply, some because she reminds the country of their misdeeds and others because they believe they deserve thanks for fighting the Taliban.

When Joya took to the parliament floor in May with another of her denunciations, some threw water bottles at her. Other legislators ran forward to shield her. Someone ordered her microphone turned off so her comments would not be audible on television.

Despite the obstacles, legislators all have their own reasons for staying in parliament. But for many, the frustration level is high and their commitment is tenuous. "Sometimes I wake up and I think I should just stay home and not go out and try to change things," said Sharif.

The bigger risk is that Afghanistan will fall back on the code of violence that has dominated its history.

Joya said that along with the water bottles came a threat from Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, a warlord notorious for his cruelty who has become a powerful member of parliament: "She is lucky it was water bottles and not knives."

Leftist Politicians Try To Take Control Of Mexican Congress (MCT)

By Jay Root

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

MEXICO CITY - Fistfights and shoving matches broke out in the Mexican Congress Tuesday after leftist lawmakers, hoping to block the inauguration of conservative President-elect Felipe Calderon, stormed the podium and tried to seize control of the chamber.

Conservatives, surrounded by security guards, pushed back the protesting lawmakers and vowed to keep order until they formally bestow the presidential sash on Calderon in a ceremony in the Chamber of Deputies this Friday.

The fisticuffs underscore the deep well of bitterness that remains after the closest and most hotly contested presidential race in modern Mexican history and highlight the possibility that Friday's ceremony will be marred by violence.

Members of the leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD, claim Calderon, a member of the National Action Party, or PAN, stole the July election.

"We're not going to allow this inauguration to happen," said Roberto Lopez, a PRD spokesman. "Felipe Calderon will not govern a single day in this country."

Calderon's transition office declined comment. Calls placed to the PAN headquarters weren't returned.

But Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said Calderon will take over on Friday no matter what happens in Congress.

"There is an institutional mechanism" for it, he said. "After the first second on the first day of December of this year, we will have a president who was elected by the majority of the citizens of this country."

Though PRD militants had made no secret of their plans to seize the podium to prevent Calderon's inauguration, the clashes inside the chamber were sudden and unexpected. Both sides blamed each other for inflaming tensions, and neither had abandoned their positions within the chamber as night fell.

In September, PRD militants seized the podium and forced Fox to deliver his final state of the nation address on television.

Calderon won the July elections by less than one percentage point over populist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. But the charismatic leftist claimed widespread fraud and never conceded, even after the nation's highest electoral court pronounced Calderon the victor in September. For weeks his followers camped out in downtown Mexico City, snarling traffic and shuttering shops.

Last week, Lopez Obrador declared himself the "legitimate president" of Mexico, strapped on his own presidential sash and began making plans for a "parallel" government. His supporters are planning a massive protest in Mexico City's central square, or Zocalo, to coincide with the inauguration on Friday.

Though Tuesday's clashes signal volatile times ahead, the increasingly bizarre protests have taken their toll on Lopez Obrador and his party. Polls taken weeks after the election show that Calderon would now trounce Lopez Obrador. Likewise, a poll in El Universal newspaper this week showed 64 percent of those surveyed opposed PRD moves to seize the chamber.

Calderon has promised to reach out to those who didn't support him. But his critics on the left say his Cabinet picks suggest otherwise. On Tuesday he announced that former Jalisco Gov. Francisco Ramirez Acuna, criticized for his hard-line approach in dealing with street protests, would be his new interior secretary, handling domestic security matters.

The U.S. Embassy said that former President George Bush, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez would travel to Mexico to attend the inauguration.

What they'll find when they get here is anybody's guess. Tuesday's trouble started around lunchtime, as rumors swept the chamber that PRD supporters would try to seize the chamber. PAN leaders, who have the largest bloc of votes and control the gavel, began assembling near the dais, along with a coterie of guards.

When PRD members began pushing and shoving toward the crescent-shaped stage, they clashed with a human wall of conservative lawmakers.

Jorge Zermeno, the PAN leader who presides over the chamber, ordered the rebel legislators to stand down and asked a throng of reporters and cameramen to leave the chamber. He then called a recess, but lawmakers stayed in the chamber, hurling insults at each other.

A second clash broke out at about 5 p.m., but each side held its ground.

Calderon Names Mexico Interior, Foreign Ministers (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Patrick Harrington

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Nov. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Mexico's President-elect Felipe Calderon named Francisco Ramirez Acuna as his interior minister, making the former Jalisco-state governor the country's chief political negotiator and strengthening the ruling party's hold on power.

Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1, also named former ambassador to Austria Patricia Espinosa as foreign minister during a Mexico City news conference. Arturo Sarukhan, Calderon's former chief foreign policy adviser, will become a liaison for U.S. relations.

Calderon, 44, has so far used his Cabinet posts to appease leaders of his own National Action Party rather than opposition party members, said Chappell Lawson, a political science professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. During his campaign, Calderon promised to forge legislative alliances in congress by building a coalition government.

``So far, his appointments are a representative sample of the National Action Party," Lawson said in a telephone interview. ``These are not a collection of people who are likely to elicit cooperation from congress."

Calderon today also named German Martinez, head attorney for his presidential campaign, as federal auditor. Juan Camilo Mourino will serve as chief of staff, Calderon said. The president-elect is expected to name his public-safety team tomorrow and must appoint all cabinet members by Dec. 1, when he is scheduled to swear in as president before congress.

U.S. Delegation

Former U.S. President George H.W. Bush will attend the swearing-in ceremony, the U.S. Embassy in Mexico said in an e-mail statement. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez will also attend, according to the statement.

Ramirez Acuna is known as a governor willing to use force as well as incentives to resolve conflicts, said Jorge Chabat, a political science professor at the Center for Economic Research and Teaching in Mexico City.

``He is a politician who knows how to get things done the old-fashioned way with a carrot and stick approach," Chabat said in a telephone interview. ``I don't know if that's the way things should be in a democracy, but it will probably work."

Speaking at today's news conference, Ramirez Acuna promised to maintain order and apply the law to attack corruption and impunity.

``Together we will return to Mexicans the peace and tranquility that they need to work and that is required to spur development in every corner of the country," he said.

Calderon Cabinet

On Nov. 24 Calderon named six non-economic Cabinet ministers from his National Action Party, including his former campaign manager Josefina Vazquez Mota as education minister.

DOJ_NMG_0099514

On Nov. 21 Calderon named Agustin Carstens finance minister, making the former International Monetary Fund official leader of U.S.-educated economic team. Three of Calderon's six economy-related appointments have doctorate degrees in economics from U.S. universities.

Calderon's decision to avoid appointing opposition parties to his Cabinet is not necessarily a mistake, Michael Hood, chief Latin America economist with Barclays Capital Inc. in New York, said in a phone interview. Such choices can lead to infighting within the Cabinet, he said.

``It's one of those situations where legislative progress is going to have to come from the top," he said. ``It's going to come down to his political capital and how he's going to employ it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Five Years After Enron, Firms Seek Weaker Rules (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Business interests, seizing on concerns that a law passed in the wake of the Enron scandal has overreached, are advancing a broad agenda to limit government oversight of private industry, including making it tougher for investors to sue companies and auditors for fraud.

A group that has drawn support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. plans to issue a report tomorrow that argues that the United States may be losing its preeminent position in global capital markets to foreign stock exchanges because of costly regulations and nettlesome private lawsuits.

Interest groups are trying to build political support to review long-standing rules that govern companies, as well as parts of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which imposed stringent responsibilities on accountants, boards of directors and corporate executives. Some key members of Congress have recently expressed concern that U.S. companies may be over-regulated.

For example, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) joined New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) to commission a study by McKinsey & Co. on whether U.S. stock exchanges are losing listings to more lightly regulated overseas markets. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who is set to head the Banking Committee, has expressed skepticism that the Sarbanes-Oxley law has led businesses to flee overseas but has signaled a willingness to hold hearings next year on how the legislation is working.

The business groups are initially focused on getting rules changed at the Securities and Exchange Commission, the independent federal agency that oversees U.S. capital markets and companies. The growing bipartisan concern about over-regulation will help set the tone for deliberations at the agency, which is led by Christopher Cox, a Republican and former congressman from California.

"From our perspective, the more people talking about this, the better," said David C. Chavern, director of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's corporate-governance initiative. The chamber plans to publish its own study next year that attacks what it views as duplicative rules and overly aggressive enforcement by securities regulators.

The renewed push to soften government oversight of business comes as the outcry begins to diminish over a series of financial scandals that erupted five years ago after Enron collapsed, costing thousands of employees their jobs and wiping out billions of investor dollars. The phony accounting at Enron and the bankruptcy of WorldCom months later prompted Congress to pass the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

The chamber panel studying regulation contains several prominent Democrats, including two members of President Bill Clinton's Cabinet -- William M. Daley, who headed the Commerce Department, and former U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor.

Lobbyists at the chamber are moving to line up meetings with Dodd, who is considering a bid for the presidency in 2008, and soon-to-be House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.). Frank recently spoke in general terms of his willingness to compromise with business on some matters to win concessions on minimum-wage legislation and housing reforms.

The current drive to roll back regulation pivots on a complex rule that requires companies to assess their financial controls to prevent fraud and mistakes. The provision, contained in Sarbanes-Oxley, has proved more expensive than regulators envisioned, particularly for small businesses.

With the encouragement of senior federal lawmakers, officials from the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which sets rules and oversees accountants, are meeting to hash out an accord on scaling back the rule. How far they go, perhaps effectively exempting smaller companies, is raising intense concerns from those who think the rules are necessary to protect investors from fraud.

If they decide to exempt small companies, that would take out "the guts of getting accounting and auditing straightened out" after years of cursory reviews by accountants helped fuel financial scandals, warned Charles A. Bowsher, former comptroller general.

But business groups are not stopping there. They were encouraged when Paulson gave a speech last week calling for "a more balanced approach" to regulation.

The private panel is frequently called "the Paulson group," even though Paulson is not a member. Instead, the panel is directed by Harvard University law professor Hal S. Scott. Other members include R. Glenn Hubbard, former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, and Brookings Institution Chairman John L. Thornton.

The group's report tomorrow is to advocate raising the standard for charging companies with crimes, according to sources briefed on its content who spoke on condition of anonymity because the document has not been officially released. It also is to propose shielding accountants from fraud lawsuits under certain circumstances.

Many of the group's recommendations would require congressional action, and passage of new laws is uncertain in the last two years of the Bush administration, even with a growing concern over regulation among senior lawmakers.

University of Rochester President Joel Seligman expressed concern about any new limits on the ability of people to sue companies over accounting, saying it could "handicap the ability of the SEC to be a vigilant watchdog."

"To have this occur, so soon after the dramatic increase in fraud that led to Sarbanes-Oxley, would be deeply troublesome," he said.

Paulson Walks Fine Line Amid Calls (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Some of the best minds in American finance have put their heads together and come up with a diagnosis for Wall Street's competitiveness problem:

Too many lawyers.

They aren't just talking about the securities-class-action-lawsuit type, although those certainly top their hit list. They also are talking about the battalion of legal beagles who staff the Securities and Exchange Commission and write the mind-numbing rules that publicly traded companies have to follow. And the armies of lawyers who represent those publicly traded companies and demand excruciatingly detailed rules for their clients to hide behind.

Or worst of all, the politically ambitious lawyers who become state attorneys general and U.S. attorneys and believe beating up corporations is their ticket to career advancement.

While I haven't seen the report of the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, which is scheduled to be released tomorrow, I have talked to others who have seen it. Beyond that, I listened to a speech that the committee's unofficial godfather, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson -- who isn't a lawyer -- gave last week to the Economic Club of New York.

The committee has been portrayed as an effort to roll back the law written by Sen. Paul Sarbanes and Rep. Michael Oxley -- both lawyers -- in the wake of the corporate scandals of 2002. That may be the least controversial part of its work.

Like almost everyone else, the committee concludes that the current interpretation of section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires publicly traded companies to do costly audits of their internal financial controls, needs to be relaxed, especially for smaller companies. The SEC is already at work on that.

More interesting is the call for moving from a regulatory regime based on "rules" to one based on "principles." In his speech, Mr. Paulson complained of "an ever-expanding rule book in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule." He extolled "the desirability, where practical, of moving toward a principles-based system."

As I listened to Mr. Paulson last week, I had no clue what the practical consequences of his call for "principles-based" regulation might be. So I investigated and discovered that the world's leading financial market has, rather suddenly, developed a bad case of Anglophilia. The model for a principles-based regulatory approach, it turns out, is Britain's Financial Services Authority.

I called up Sir Howard Davies, the founding chairman of the FSA who is now the director of the London School of Economics. Sir Howard is most definitely not a lawyer -- he studied French and history, then attended Stanford Business School.

He explained that when the FSA was created in 1997, in an effort to consolidate Britain's financial regulators, it wrote a rule book that began with a set of principles explaining what the regulators hoped to accomplish.

"There are, of course, also rules," he says. "But you can afford to be less intrusive because as a regulator, you have principles you can fall back on." In other words, once you have said no killing, there is no need to specifically prohibit sticking a hunting knife through another man's sternum.

DOJ_NMG_0099516

As simple as that sounds, it proved difficult in practice. The reason? Lawyers. "It's a struggle," Sir Howard said. "We wanted more principles and fewer rules, but the market pushed back."

For instance, the FSA wanted a simple principle saying financial firms must segregate their clients' money from their own money. Lawyers representing the financial firms responded: "What do you mean by clients? What do you mean by money? What do you mean by segregated?"

Still, the FSA was able to limit its rule-making, in part because it was staffed largely by economists. The lawyers were relegated to the general counsel's office. "We kept them on tap, not on top," Sir Howard says.

Could such a system work in the U.S.? Well, first, it would require a restaffing of the SEC: More economists, fewer lawyers. (The current count is 1,344 attorneys, 27 economists.) More importantly, it would require reining in the trial bar, which empowers corporate lawyers by creating the constant threat of lawsuits. It also would probably require curbs on state attorneys general like soon-to-be New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who was always happy to step in whenever he thought the SEC was going soft.

The biggest problem facing Mr. Paulson and the Committee for Capital Markets Regulation is one of perception. Can they convince people that their call for principles-based regulation isn't just an effort to go soft on corporate miscreants? With public approval ratings of corporate executives still in the dumps, that won't be easy.

Setting Aside Of Wittig Sentence May Be Challenged (TCJ)

By Robert Boczkiewicz, Special to The Capital-Journal

Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal, November 29, 2006

DENVER -- Prosecutors may ask an appeals court to reconsider last week's decision that set aside a five-year prison sentence for David Wittig, former chief executive of Westar Energy, for bank crimes.

In a new filing at the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a federal prosecutor in Topeka said attorneys at Justice Department headquarters in Washington, D.C., are evaluating whether to ask the court to rehear Wittig's appeal.

A three-judge panel of the court dealt a blow to prosecutors on Nov. 22 by setting aside Wittig's sentence and instructing U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson, of Topeka, to resentence him.

The appellate judges concluded that she erred in computing his sentence under sentencing guidelines.

They pointed out that a sentence of six months is the maximum recommended in the guidelines unless she justifies a longer sentence.

Wittig's sentence is for convictions in 2003 of hiding from bank regulators a $1.5 million loan he made to former Capital City Bank president Clinton Odell "Del" Weidner II. Wittig is serving a separate 18-year sentence for convictions in 2005 of looting Westar of millions of dollars.

In the new filing, prosecutor Richard Hathaway said prosecutors are considering asking all of the appeals court judges to consider the case, instead of only the three judges who issued last week's decision.

The Denver-based court seldom agrees to rehear cases, especially those in which a three-judge panel was unanimous, as it was in last week's decision.

The court typically operates in three-judge panels.

Hathaway said Dec. 6 is the deadline for prosecutors to ask the judges to rehear Wittig's appeal. The prosecutor said lawyers of the solicitor general's staff in Washington need more time to decide whether to make the request.

Hathaway asked for a 30-day extension of the deadline but said Wittig's lead attorney opposes an extension.

Charges Of Bribery In A Chinese Bank Deal (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

SHANGHAI, Nov. 28 — The American company says it was a legitimate cost of doing business in China, the price it had to pay to help secure a large software contract with one of China's biggest banks.

But a Chinese company that says it got pushed out of the deal has a different version: executives there say it was bribery, a case of an American company secretly funneling money to powerful Chinese government officials to ensure the lucrative banking contract.

According to a lawsuit filed earlier this year in United States District Court in Florida, Fidelity Information Services, an American software company, paid for two Chinese banking officials and family members to travel on vacation to Hong Kong, Paris, Rome, Las Vegas and the golfing resort of Pebble Beach, Calif.

The suit contends that Fidelity arranged for these trips through a consultant in China who was reimbursed for giving the Chinese bankers and their families an array of gifts, including expensive Sony cameras, luxury outfits from Versace and Burberry, and perhaps even a $330,000 apartment here in Shanghai.

The lawsuit grows out of a business dispute between Grace and Digital Information Technology, a Beijing-based consulting company and Fidelity, based in Jacksonville, Fla. It accuses Fidelity of trying to avoid paying $58 million in consulting fees after Grace helped the company win a series of software contracts worth $176 million with the China Construction Bank in 2001.

The lawsuit charges that after the contract was suspended in 2002, Fidelity dumped Grace and chose instead to hire another middleman, who was a close friend of the chairman of the huge Chinese bank. Fidelity, the lawsuit contends, made large cash payments to the middleman, who then passed money and gifts on to the Chinese bank's chairman and other bank officials, possibly in violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977.

That law forbids American companies from paying off foreign government officials to win or influence business deals outside the United States.

"This was bribery," said John Zhang, a lawyer working for Grace and Digital. "They were paying bribes to government officials and their families. What else could those payments be?"

Lawyers representing Fidelity, a division of Fidelity National Financial, strongly dispute the allegations, saying company executives simply reimbursed legitimate business expenses and that Fidelity never violated its contracts or the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

"The Justice Department says paying for typical business expenses is not against the law," said David W. Shapiro, a lawyer for Boies & Schiller, which is defending Fidelity in the case. "If the golf game is inappropriate, most of the companies doing business in this country are engaged in inappropriate activity."

In government filings earlier this year, Fidelity acknowledged that the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission were looking into the allegations.

Three weeks ago, a Beijing court sentenced Zhang Enzhao, the 60-year-old former chairman of China Construction Bank, to 15 years in prison for accepting more than $500,000 in gifts and bribes, including gifts that came from a consultant who worked for Fidelity, as well as I.B.M. and Cisco Systems, according to Bloomberg News and Cai Jing, a Chinese business magazine. None of the American companies have been charged with any crimes.

Whether or not the lawsuit brought by Grace and Digital stands up in court, the case could force other large American and European companies doing business in China to consider whether they are exposed to similar lawsuits or dangers as they move operations and executives to China, a country where corruption and bribery are endemic.

Amanda Garland, a spokeswoman for I.B.M., said the company was investigating the bribery case against Mr. Zhang of China Construction Bank. NCR and Hitachi are also looking into the charges.

The case began in December 2004, when Grace and Digital initially sued Fidelity in Superior Court in California, charging in its filing that Mr. Zhang, then the chairman of China Construction Bank, had been paid a $1 million bribe.

The case was dismissed after a judge ruled that California was not the proper locale for the lawsuit. The suit was then refiled in Florida.

In March 2005, after reports about the suit spread, Mr. Zhang stepped down as chairman of Construction Bank for "personal reasons." The Chinese police later detained him, just months ahead of the bank's planned initial public offering.

A new chairman was appointed and the bank went ahead with its public listing, which raised over $9 billion in October 2005 in the world's biggest stock offering of that year.

In court filings, lawyers for Grace said they had obtained copies of detailed e-mails and other records that show that Fidelity made a $1 million payment to a Hong Kong company called Prosten Technology. A Chinese consultant named Zou Jianhua, who was a close friend of Mr. Zhang, represented that company.

Mr. Zou, the filings said, submitted about $170,000 in expenses that were reimbursed by Fidelity covering an array of gifts, hotels, shopping sprees and entertainment costs.

For instance, in May 2002, the suit says, a Fidelity official e-mailed another company executive saying the chairman of China Construction Bank was interested in playing golf at "Cobble Beach," though he meant Pebble Beach.

Soon after, Fidelity paid for Mr. Zhang's hotel, car services and green fees in Pebble Beach.

And in October 2004, after the chairman expressed an interest in seeing Florida, the lawsuit says Fidelity sent its corporate jet to fly him from San Francisco, where he had been visiting with I.B.M., to its headquarters in Jacksonville.

The lawsuit also charges that Fidelity reimbursed tickets for Mr. Zhang's wife and son to travel in China and the United States. It also paid, the lawsuit claims, for his son's tennis club fees in Shanghai and golfing fees in Shenzhen and for the daughter of the bank's chief information officer to travel to Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0099518

Mr. Zou, the Fidelity consultant, accompanied Mr. Zhang's son to Las Vegas and also escorted the daughter of the bank's chief information officer on a trip to Europe.

Grace lawyers also say that on one occasion, after Mr. Zou's expenses were questioned by Fidelity, Mr. Zou responded that he was renting a hotel room in Beijing because Mr. Zhang and his wife needed to use the hotel's gym and swimming pool.

Mr. Zhang, the lawyer at Greenberg Traurig who is representing Grace, said the trips were "payoffs" to the family of the banking executives and that among the expenses reimbursed were luxury goods from Dunhill, Versace, Burberry, Mont Blanc and at least nine Sony and Canon cameras bought in Hong Kong. "What kind of business trips are these?" Mr. Zhang asked.

Fidelity's lawyers counter that entertaining government officials and their families is proper promotional activity. The company also says there was no breach of the original consulting contract, which was suspended by the government. A new software contract was later negotiated with another middleman, Mr. Zou, the lawyers said.

China Construction Bank officials have refused to comment on the case, saying it was a personal matter involving Mr. Zhang.

Citing court documents in the case, Bloomberg News said the Beijing No. 1 Intermediate Court indicated that I.B.M. had paid $225,000 to Success Century Technology, a company registered in Hong Kong by Mr. Zou, who was named by the government as one of the three businessmen who bribed Mr. Zhang.

Through Ms. Garland, I.B.M. released a statement: "I.B.M. has been unable to access the court documentation regarding this case, and therefore cannot comment on the allegations. I.B.M.'s Business Conduct Guidelines, to which I.B.M. employees in China certify annually, require I.B.M. employees to comply with all laws and regulations that apply to I.B.M.'s business worldwide. The guidelines also specifically prohibit bribery of any kind."

The statement went on: "We have turned this matter over to our legal team, who are investigating the allegations."

A reporter at the "21st Century Business Herald" says he got special access to the court documents in the bribery case. He says the documents show that Mr. Zhang accepted large gifts and bribes from three Chinese business executives in exchange for helping them secure large loans or software contracts.

Those court documents also show, he said, that Mr. Zou met with officials from I.B.M., NCR and Hitachi and that he recommended Hong Kong Hitachi as a supplier to Mr. Zhang and his bank.

NCR, based in Dayton, Ohio, issued a statement, which reads: "Under our marketing agent agreement with Mr. Zou, we required him to conduct business activities in a lawful manner. NCR maintains a clear and stringent code of conduct that requires the highest ethical standards and compliance with the local laws in all business dealings."

Hitachi, the Japanese electronics company, released its own statement, saying the case is under investigation and "according to the internal audit, up to now, we find no connection between Hitachi data systems and Mr. Zhang."

The Beijing court documents did not name Fidelity, though Mr. Zou worked as a paid consultant for Fidelity from 2002 to 2005. Gao Zicheng, a lawyer who represented Zhang Enzhao, the banker, in court, said his client admitted to mistakes.

"Zhang Enzhao said that as a government official he shouldn't have received money from friends," Mr. Gao said, but he declined to comment beyond that on the Fidelity case.

In its Florida court filing, Grace charges that Fidelity made a $1 million payment to Mr. Zou and that part of that money was funneled to Zhang Enzhao, partly through the gift of a luxury apartment.

Lawyers for Fidelity say Grace helped secure the original $176 million software contract in 2000, when Wang Xuebing was the chairman of China Construction Bank.

The software was supposed to allow the bank to track its lending activities. But Mr. Wang was fired and jailed in January 2002, after he was accused of accepting bribes during an earlier tenure, while he was serving at another large state-owned bank, the Bank of China.

After the firing of Mr. Wang, the government suspended the huge Fidelity contract. Then, after Zhang Enzhao came in as chairman, Fidelity hired Mr. Zou, a longtime friend, and 18 months later Fidelity signed a new software contract, Fidelity's lawyers say. Then Fidelity made a $1 million payment to Prosten, which had employed Mr. Zou.

Strangely, however, Prosten now denies that Mr. Zou ever worked for the company. An individual who picked up the phone at the Hong Kong headquarters said Mr. Zou had never worked for the company.

Mr. Shapiro, Fidelity's lawyer, said that its payments were legitimate. "It's only bribery," he said, "if he promised to do it in exchange for something."

But Patrick M. Norton, a lawyer at O'Melveny & Myers in Washington and an expert on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, said the law went further than that.

While some promotional activities may be allowed, Mr. Norton said, "the operative language in the statute is you can't provide a government official anything of value."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Brother Of Philadelphia Mayor Indicted On Fraud, Tax Charges Involving City Contracts (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

The older brother of Mayor John F. Street was indicted Tuesday, accused of using his last name to convince companies he could get them lucrative city contracts and failing to pay taxes on $2 million of income.

Soon after Street took office in 2000, T. Milton Street Sr. began hiring himself out as a high-priced consultant to companies that thought he could help them get city contracts, the indictment charged. One firm paid Milton Street, who is a longtime hot dog vendor, a $30,000-a.m.onth consulting fee and required him to do no work, authorities said.

He and two other businessmen face charges of mail and wire fraud, filing false tax returns and related counts.

"Milton Street wanted the IRS to believe he was a humble street vendor selling hot dogs and soda," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said. "What he didn't tell them was that he was making millions on nothing more than his last name."

Milton Street, a state lawmaker in the 1980s, has long been a colorful character on the local scene. He made news in recent years with entrepreneurial efforts including a startup company that offers "Duck boat" tours, a venture that landed him in court in a fight with an established tour operator.

The 69-year-old vowed he would be vindicated of the charges and blamed any problems on poor record-keeping.

"I think, honestly, that I stayed in bounds (of the law)" Milton Street said as he arrived at a home in Moorestown, N.J., on Tuesday. "Now, I have to tell you, I am the worst record-keeper in the history of the modern man."

The mayor, who was not charged, said he did not know details of his brother's financial dealings but defended his right to pursue city contracts.

"My brother is allowed to do business with the city of Philadelphia just like any other person," Mayor Street said at a news conference. "As far as I know, he has played by the rules."

The indictment stemmed from an investigation into municipal corruption in Philadelphia.

The wide-ranging probe, which ensnared the former city treasurer and several businessmen, became public three years ago when an FBI listening device was discovered in the mayor's office. The mayor was never charged.

Federal prosecutors say Milton Street was awarded consulting contracts with companies doing business at two city-owned airports even though he had no experience in facilities maintenance work. His consulting firms contained the name Notlim, which is Milton spelled backward.

One company, General Asphalt Paving, paid him $8,000 a month _ and later $12,500 a month _ to get city business, including a contract for maintenance at Philadelphia International Airport and Northeast Philadelphia Airport, prosecutors said.

Milton Street also was accused of defrauding a prospective airport contractor, who gave him $80,000 on a promise from Milton Street that he could get them a $3.2 million contract that didn't exist, prosecutors said.

Mayor's Brother Indicted In Alleged Scams (PHI)

By Marcia Gelbart And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 29, 2006

Mayor Street's flamboyant brother, T. Milton Street Sr., was indicted on federal corruption and tax charges yesterday in connection with alleged scams at Philadelphia International Airport.

Specifically, Milton Street is accused of failing to pay taxes on more than $2 million worth of income from 2000 to 2004.

He also was accused of defrauding a prospective airport contractor, which gave him $80,000 on the promise that Street could get it a $3.2 million contract that didn't exist.

In another instance, Street is accused of kicking back almost $100,000 to a businessman in exchange for help that businessman provided in ensuring that Street obtained a lucrative airport contract.

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said Street made "millions on nothing more than his last name," securing a $30,000-a-month consulting job on an airport-maintenance contract for which he did little or no work.

The mayor was not involved in his brother's alleged crimes, Meehan said, but the case is related to the broader pay-to-play climate that has tainted the current administration.

In an interview in front of his Moorestown home, Milton Street said he was "not going to lose any sleep" over the charges, which could mean two or more years in prison if he is convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0099520

"Let's face it: They didn't get John, they have to go after somebody," Milton Street said. "We will go to court. They will present their side, and I will present my side. And 12 people will decide. It will work out. I've been through lots of battles, lots of battle scars. I'll be OK."

The mayor, appearing somber and subdued, defended his brother to reporters outside his City Hall office about three hours after the public release of the indictment.

"My brother Milton has been one of my best friends in all the world," Street said, calling the charges a "very, very sad and distressing development for me... . He will have the full support of me and my family as he goes through this very difficult time."

The mayor - who phoned his brother yesterday but would not discuss what was said - rejected Meehan's suggestion that Milton Street tried to profit from their relationship. "My brother is allowed to do business with the City of Philadelphia just like any other person, and as far as I know he has played by the rules."

The Milton Street case was handled by some of the same FBI and IRS agents who worked on the City Hall corruption cases that have led to more than 20 convictions.

The grand jury alleged that Street did not file income-tax returns for 2002, 2003 and 2004, and that he underreported income for 2000 and 2001 by $175,000.

It was during those years that Street allegedly brought in $2 million, thanks to contracts he obtained at the airport.

Milton Street, 67, is a former hot-dog and T-shirt vendor, and served as a Pennsylvania state representative and a state senator. He filed for personal bankruptcy last year.

The 25-page indictment alleged that after John Street took office in January 2000, Milton Street "began hiring himself out as a highly paid consultant to area businesses who believed that Milton Street could help them obtain business with the City of Philadelphia."

Those actions did not represent a crime, but provided the backdrop for crimes allegedly committed, according to the indictment.

One of the businesses that hired Street was General Asphalt Paving Inc., which is owned by the family of city Republican Party chairman Michael Meehan (no relationship to Patrick Meehan). The company was then part of a joint venture named Philadelphia Airport Services (PAS). It hired Milton Street as a consultant to help land a $50 million, four-year contract to maintain airport facilities.

For his work, Street was paid $8,000 and then $12,500 a month, according to the indictment.

General Asphalt is no longer part of the joint venture, which has netted almost $74 million from the city since 2001, and company officials have said Street is no longer a consultant on the project. The current contract expires Jan. 1.

Under his arrangement with PAS, Street created a company to maintain the airport's baggage-conveyor system. The company, named Notlim (Milton spelled backward) Service Management Co., had no experience in the field.

Under the alleged scheme, Street in November 2002 began collecting $166,000 a month from PAS. Because his company had no experience or employees to do the work it was contracted to perform, it returned $133,000 to PAS, which then performed the work in question.

In the process, Street kept $33,000 for himself each month, the indictment alleged.

That represented some of the income Street is alleged to have failed to pay taxes on, according to the indictment.

Federal officials yesterday also charged two men, both employees of Philadelphia Airport Services, with conspiring with Street to defraud their company. They are John H. Velardi Sr., 53, of Drexel Hill, and Matthias A. Schwabe, 38, of Malvern.

The indictment says Street paid $98,000 to Schwabe, who in return did favors for Street.

Schwabe provided cell phones from his company for Street to use. Moreover, the indictment said, Schwabe put together a bid for Street to maintain kitchen exhaust hoods at the airport, and also helped arrange renovation work for Street's girlfriend's hair salon. All of this was done without PAS's knowledge or approval, according to the indictment.

The indictment also alleges that Street and Velardi defrauded a company called V-Tech out of more than $80,000 after promising the company owner they would deliver $3.2 million worth of airport work. Street and Velardi had no authority to assign such a contract.

Neither Velardi nor Schwabe could be reached for comment.

Milton Street is expected to surrender to the FBI this week. He is scheduled to be arraigned tomorrow in U.S. District Court. The case has been assigned to Judge Legrome D. Davis.

Life: A One-way Street (PHDN)

By Dave Davies

Philadelphia Daily News, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099521

One thought no doubt occurred to veteran observers of Milton Street after his indictment yesterday on fraud charges: for sheer entertainment, this should go to trial - and Milton should take the stand.

There's no more colorful figure in local politics in the past quarter century than the mayor's brother. He's been a state legislator (both Democrat and Republican), a truck driver, a street vendor, a wig salesman, and a duckboat entrepreneur.

While he's left behind a trail of bad debts and colorful quotes - like calling a mayor "a Mafioso," a City Council president "a lying bastard" and a congressman "an Uncle Tom" - he's managed to stay out of serious criminal trouble before now.

"I've never known Milton to be a crook," Shawn Fordham, Milton's nephew by marriage, said yesterday. "Can he talk you out of five dollars? Yes. But that's his skill. He makes his case, and then you think he needs your last five dollars more than you do.

"But he's a really generous guy, too," Fordham added. "He'd give you the shirt off his back."

Milton remained upbeat yesterday when he greeted reporters in front of his Moorestown, N.J. home, predicting success in his coming legal battle and saying he wasn't feeling old.

"I think I'll run for office," he said.

Milton Street was a housing and vending activist in the 1970s who made it to the state legislature, changed parties and got voted out, blew a patronage job in traffic court by racking up fines, then pursued a string of business opportunities which became more lucrative when his brother John was elected mayor in 1999.

Among the more colorful episodes in the Milton Street story:

· In 1982, after changing parties in the State Senate to become a Republican, Milton challenged U.S. Rep. Bill Gray in one of the nastiest elections in memory. He called Gray "an Uncle Tom and a house n-----... controlled by white people." Milton lost.

· In 1989, Republicans rewarded Milton for his help in the legislature by making him an assistant budget director in traffic court. He lost the post for failing to pay $2,000 in traffic tickets. "Why the f--- should I pay?" he told an Inquirer reporter at the time.

· In the 1990s, Milton returned to street vending. Despite numerous citations by the Department of Licenses and Inspections, the Rendell administration in 1996 and '97 put Milton in charge of controlling vending at the Penn Relays. The Penn's Landing Corporation took Milton to court last year for unpaid vendor fees.

· In 2000, political contributors got invitations to pay from $300 to $10,000 to sponsor a birthday gala for Mayor Street. It turned out the money was to go to a new political committee registered to Milton and an associate, and the mayor didn't even know about the event. He pulled the plug on it.

· In 2004, Milton emerged as an operative in Super Ducks, a business of amphibious touring vehicles which sought to use a pier controlled by its rival, Ride the Ducks. Milton was accused in a court filing of threatening to get access to the pier "the hard way." He denied the charge, but his firm lost the case.

Editorial | Milton Street Indicted (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 29, 2006

The indictment yesterday of Mayor Street's brother on tax-evasion charges seems an almost inevitable result of the crony-friendly city contracts that have defined the mayor's tenure. The charges against T. Milton Street Sr. arise from city contracts at Philadelphia International Airport, long a source of pay-to-play rewards for people with friends (or relatives) in City Hall.

Milton Street says he's innocent. And that should be easy enough to prove or disprove in federal court. The mayor's brother either paid income taxes on his sweet, $30,000-per-month salary as an airport maintenance "consultant," or he didn't. The IRS says he didn't.

Also indicted were two officials of Philadelphia Airport Services, John H. Velardi Sr. and Matthias A. Schwabe. General Asphalt Paving Co., a joint-venture partner of PAS, put the mayor's brother on the payroll in 2001 to help PAS get a $50 million city contract to maintain the airport grounds and non-flying equipment.

Milton Street's qualifications for airport maintenance work, other than being the mayor's sibling, included stints as a state senator and a hot-dog vendor. Later, he launched a duck-boat business.

In 2003, PAS tried to award Milton Street a $1.2 million, no-bid contract to maintain the airport's baggage conveyors. The mayor, in the midst of his reelection campaign, nixed the deal amid cries of cronyism. The public didn't find out until nearly two years later that Milton Street still earned about $1 million from the airport contract, courtesy of a $30,000-a-month consulting deal.

His brother's airport deal has weighed down the mayor with plenty of political baggage. That's because, other than the one occasion in which he intervened, the mayor has tolerated cronyism and nepotism in city-funded work at the airport.

For example, the FBI investigation of City Hall corruption showed that the mayor's rainmaker, the late Ron White, got an airport printing contract for his girlfriend, who didn't own a real printing company.

Philadelphia's airport is the first place for the region to make a good impression on visitors. A seamless, customer-friendly operation is crucial to the city's image and its economic future. Instead, the mayor has allowed a system in which patronage takes precedent over efficiency. It's an odious system that puts private agendas ahead of serving the public.

The airport has endured baggage headaches enough without having the mayor's career-challenged brother in a position to potentially run the luggage carousels.

Mayor Street isn't responsible for making sure his brother pays taxes. But the final year of the mayor's tenure will be tainted by yet another criminal prosecution involving people close to him. It is no accidental legacy.

Executive Pleads Guilty To Racketeering, Agrees To Testify Against Ex-Senator (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

A construction executive at the center of Maryland's largest public corruption investigation in years pleaded guilty yesterday to racketeering and other offenses, agreeing to testify against his codefendant, former state senator Thomas L. Bromwell.

As part of his plea agreement, W. David Stoffregen certified as accurate a document that outlines secret payments to Bromwell and free or steeply discounted contracting work at the lawmaker's home in exchange for Bromwell's steering of state contracts to Stoffregen's firm, commercial contractor Poole and Kent Corp.

The guilty plea is by far the most significant of the six such pleas that federal prosecutors have netted in their investigation of Bromwell, a Baltimore County Democrat who was one of the most powerful figures in Annapolis before he left office in 2002.

Allegations of the improper exchange of cash and favors between the two men are at the heart of the prosecution's case, and with his plea, Stoffregen immediately becomes the star witness in a trial scheduled to begin in March.

The summary, filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, largely mirrors assertions made in the original racketeering indictment and in related cases involving other defendants.

Bromwell and his wife, Mary Pat, who was also charged in the racketeering indictment, have pleaded not guilty. Joshua Treem, one of Bromwell's attorneys, did not respond to a message seeking comment on the plea agreement. Stoffregen's attorneys and U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein declined to comment.

According to the summary, Stoffregen paid more than $190,000 to Bromwell, arranged the contracting work at his house and gave the lawmaker an ownership stake in International Partners Construction, a company that Stoffregen formed in 2000 to do business in Russia.

In exchange, it says, Bromwell saw to it that Poole and Kent was awarded a $13 million contract with the University of Maryland Medical System and arranged for expedited payments for work that the company performed on a state juvenile justice center project.

Bromwell's influence in the state Senate was considered so valuable, the summary says, that when he considered leaving the legislature for financial reasons, Stoffregen told him that if he agreed to stay, his wife would be given a job -- with an annual salary of $80,000 and no requirement to show up. Bromwell agreed, it says, and received payments of $192,000 disguised as salary from Namco, a company that Stoffregen controlled.

Stoffregen, 53, of Towson, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud and filing a false tax return. Under the terms of the agreement, he will probably be sentenced to six to 18 years in prison. Stoffregen also agreed to forfeit more than $5.6 million, including his residence and a number of bank and other accounts.

The plea agreement is all but certain to complicate efforts to defend Bromwell, who was one of the most colorful figures in the legislature and who has been the head of a state agency, the Injured Workers' Insurance Fund, for three years.

Bromwell, a former tavern owner, was elected to the Senate in 1983. He rose to the powerful position of Finance Committee chairman and staged a daring but failed campaign to dislodge the Senate's longtime president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), in the final days of 2000.

In the summary filed, Stoffregen also acknowledged orchestrating a minority contracting fraud scheme involving Namco, a front company that was certified as female-owned and whose presence on a job allowed Pool and Kent to appear to meet minority contracting goals or requirements. The company, for example, enabled Poole and Kent to meet such requirements on a 2003 terminal expansion at Baltimore-Washington International Airport, it says.

The summary says that Stoffregen and others went to elaborate lengths to make the front company appear legitimate when inspectors from the Maryland Aviation Administration, which oversaw the project, announced that they wanted to visit Namco offices.

Stoffregen ordered that furniture, computers and documents be delivered to the largely empty space listed as the company address, the summary states. He directed Poole and Kent employees to create a company brochure. And on the day of the visit, it says, Mary Pat Bromwell posed as a receptionist.

South Gate's Former Treasurer Gets 10 Years (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Former South Gate Treasurer Albert Robles was sentenced today to 10 years in federal prison for plundering $12 million over five years from the small working-class city.

A federal judge handed down the sentence after Robles made an impassioned speech, admitting he acted "immorally" during his year as a leader of South Gate but claiming he never broke the law.

"There are different levels of hoodwinking, but I didn't think hoodwinking was a crime," Robles said. "During that period, I decided not to be a very good man every day. But I did not decide to be a criminal."

Federal Judge Stephen V. Wilson seemed incredulous at Robles' statements, at one point telling the defendant's attorney that "what you have just said is among the most absurd things I have ever heard."

Wilson ultimately said he found Robles to be a "puppet master" who won control of a corrupt enterprise that preyed on the city and its residents.

In addition to prison time, Robles was ordered to pay back more than $600,000 to the struggling city.

A federal grand jury in 2004 indicted Robles on 39 counts of money laundering, bribery, wire fraud and public corruption, alleging that he used his elected office and political influence to funnel money from a variety of city projects to family and friends between 1998 and 2003. He was convicted last year.

Federal officials estimated that Robles, 41, personally received $1.2 million from the various schemes. The charges come a year after voters in the predominantly Latino city about seven miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles recalled Robles and several political allies from office.

The recall capped a tumultuous period in the city's history, when one councilman was shot, the city neared bankruptcy, and Robles was accused of threatening to kill political opponents.

Ex-state Lawmaker Sent To Prison (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 29, 2006

Roscoe Dixon, former senator, was guilty of bribery in Waltz case

MEMPHIS - Former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first state lawmaker to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal, reported to a federal prison Tuesday to begin a five-year sentence.

Dixon, 57, is to serve the sentence, which has no provision for parole, at the Federal Correction Complex at Oakdale about 35 miles south of Alexandria, La., in the south-central part of the state.

Dixon is assigned to an unfenced prison camp at the complex and will bunk with about 70 other inmates in an open-bay dormitory, said public information officer Roland Jimenez.

While in prison, Dixon likely will work at a manual-labor job paying 12 cents to 40 cents an hour. "All inmates who are medically able are required to work," Jimenez said.

Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, was convicted in June of taking bribes from FBI agents posing as employees of E-Cycle Management, a company that offered payoffs for favors from state lawmakers and local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, pleaded guilty to Tennessee Waltz bribery charges last year and is serving a one-year sentence at a federal prison in Atlanta.

State Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Sens. Kathryn Bowers and John Ford, both Democrats from Memphis, are awaiting trials.

In all, the investigation has led to indictments against 11 defendants. Four have pleaded guilty, with three still waiting to be sentenced. A former county commissioner in Chattanooga was convicted at trial and sentenced to three years in prison.

Dixon was convicted on all charges in a five-count indictment and sentenced to five years and three months in prison. He also was sentenced to three years of supervised release when the prison term ends.

Dixon has vowed to appeal his conviction and has continued to argue that he was set up to take FBI money by overzealous federal agents and lying government informants.

In handing down the longest sentence in a Tennessee Waltz conviction, Judge Jon McCalla noted Dixon's lack of a public showing of remorse.

Ala. And Fla. Men Face Child Pornography Charges (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

A federal grand jury in Birmingham has charged two Florida men and one Alabama man on multiple charges related to an interstate child pornography business disguised as a child modeling agency.

An 80-count indictment was unsealed Tuesday charging 42-year-old Marc Evan Greenberg, 39-year-old Jeffrey Robert Libman and Webe Web Corporation, all of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

A two-count criminal information charging 43-year-old Jeff Pierson of Brookwood with conspiring to transport child pornography in interstate commerce using a computer was also unsealed Tuesday.

"The indictment alleges that these defendants conspired to produce pornographic images of underage girls posing in lascivious positions for profit, under the pretense of offering professional modeling services," said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Justice Department's Criminal Division.

Greenberg and Libman are charged with establishing a "child modeling" internet business called Webe Web Corporation. The indictment says Pierson was a photographer who provided images of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct in Alabama and sent those images to Greenberg and Libman in Florida.

A statement from the Justice Department says that, from December 2002 through April 2005, Greenberg, Libman and Webe Web conspired with Pierson to "use minors to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing visual depictions of that conduct."

The Web site was presented as "a Web site to promote models age 7 thru 16 and their photographers." Visitors to the site could view between 15 and 21 photos of underage girls for free and could subscribe - for a $25 initial fee and then $20 per month - to the individual Web site of the "model" to see additional photos.

If convicted, Greenberg and Libman face 15 to 30 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. The corporation faces a $500,000 fine. And Pierson would face five to 20 years on each count and a $250,000 fine on each count.

Pellicano Witness Charged (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, November 29, 2006

Former SBC employee accused of lying under oath

A former SBC Communications employee, who was acquitted in September of lying to a grand jury in the investigation of Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano, was charged again with lying under oath.

Joann Wiggan, 52, is accused by U.S. prosecutors of lying during trial testimony about voicemail messages from another former SBC employee, who is charged with helping Pellicano wiretap the telephones of actors and producers. Wiggan is also charged with lying to investigators and the grand jury.

Wiggan's lawyer, David Reed, didn't immediately return a call to his office. Her case was the first to go to trial in an investigation that has led to charges against 14 people, including Terry Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian and "Die Hard" helmer John McTiernan.

A federal jury in Los Angeles found Wiggan not guilty on four counts of perjury and deadlocked on a fifth count. McTiernan pleaded guilty in April to lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wiretap the phone of a movie producer.

Wiggan had been ordered to testify before a grand jury in October 2005 and again in January. She denied using a voicemail account that Ray Turner, the other indicted former SBC employee, called more than 100 times.

FBI: Ill. Man Targeted Immigrants (CHIT)

By Azam Ahmed, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, November 29, 2006

A southwest suburban man allegedly preyed on immigrants by posing as a government or law enforcement official who could help them with legal problems in exchange for fees, the FBI disclosed today.

Omar Abbas, 40, of Justice, was charged with a felony count of extortion after he was arrested in Chicago by FBI and Department of Homeland Security special agents on Oct. 19, authorities said.

Abbas, a Jordanian citizen who was working to obtain permanent U.S. residency, is accused of taking more than $25,000 from three different people since 2003. Abbas was living in the U.S. legally at the time, the FBI said.

DOJ_NMG_0099525

In the first instance, Abbas posed as an FBI agent and was paid more than $8,000 after he offered to assist a man facing possible deportation from the U.S., according to a criminal complaint.

In the second incident, Abbas pretended that he could bribe high-level City of Chicago attorneys to secure the release of a victim's son, who was held on an attempted murder charge, the complaint said. The father paid Abbas an estimated $5,000, according to the complaint.

In the third case, Abbas, posing as a government official, was paid more than $13,000 by an individual whose grocery store had been robbed, after Abbas said he could recover the stolen merchandise or get money for what was stolen, the complaint stated.

In all three instances, Abbas was introduced to the victims by third-party associates, authorities said.

Abbas, whose last known address was in the 8000 block of Marion Drive in Justice, was ordered held on $100,000 bond at his detention hearing at U.S. District Court in Chicago five days after his arrest, the FBI said.

Abbas is currently being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center, awaiting his next court appearance in early January. If convicted, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

The FBI believes there may have been additional victims and urged anyone with information to come forward.

"I would encourage anyone, regardless of their immigration status, who might have been victimized by Abbas to contact our office immediately," said Robert D. Grant, the special agent-in-charge of the Chicago office of the FBI.

FBI Says Man Targeted Troubled Immigrants For Extortion (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, November 29, 2006

Omar Abbas told people he could fix their problems -- for the right price.

One man gave Abbas $8,500 because Abbas allegedly said he was an FBI agent. Another trusted Abbas to be a high-level attorney and paid him $5,500.

Abbas was nothing but an extortionist, the FBI said Tuesday.

Abbas, 40, made promises he didn't keep as he collected $25,000 from just three people, according to charges.

Abbas usually preyed on immigrants caught in tough circumstances, authorities said. He was arrested last month on extortion charges and is being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center on a $100,000 bond.

Law enforcement officials believe more immigrants have been scammed but haven't alerted authorities because they fear their legal status will be questioned, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said.

"We want them to know they can come to us to complain," Simon said. "We will work with them every step of the way to make sure they're not punished for coming forward."

In one case, a man asked Abbas for help in getting his son out of jail pending his trial. Abbas allegedly said he was connected to assistant state's attorneys who would get his son out of jail immediately for the right price. The two met at the Daley Center downtown where the man handed cash to Abbas.

Faces 20 years if convicted He never saw Abbas again.

The man's son wasn't released until months later.

Another man went to Abbas when he faced deportation. Abbas allegedly said he was an FBI agent and would fix the problem for him. But Abbas allegedly pocketed the payments and did nothing.

Official: FBI Unresponsive To Taiwan (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, November 28, 2006, 5:18 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, November 29, 2006

Lee Hsiang-chen, director of the High-tech Criminal Center of the National Police Agency, said Taiwanese requests for help from the FBI representative at the American Embassy in Tokyo routinely went unanswered.

Lee made his remarks from Taipei during a video conference with Raul Roldan, acting deputy assistant director of the FBI's cyber crime division. Roldan was taking part in the conference from Hong Kong.

"We have no FBI agents in Taiwan, so when we have cyber crimes involving the U.S., we go through the American Embassy in Tokyo," Lee said. "But very few (of our inquiries) come back. It makes us feel very depressed."

Roldan promised he would look into the problem.

Lee's complaint appeared to stem from the deliberately low profile assumed by the U.S. representative office in Taiwan, which was set up when Washington transferred its recognition to Beijing in 1979.

The mainland and Taiwan split amid civil war in 1949, and the U.S. operates according to the principles of the "one China policy," which keeps its presence in Taipei deliberately low key.

While diplomats and military officers no longer need to go through the subterfuge of serving on a contract basis, some U.S. government agencies are not represented on the island, despite its relative importance.

This includes the FBI, which maintains representatives in 12 Asian locations, including Cambodia, a far smaller country than Taiwan.

2 Ex-NASA Officials Take Issue With Investigation (ORS)

By Michael Cabbage

The Orlando Sentinel, November 29, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL -- Two former NASA officials cast doubt this week on a pair of allegations outlined in a federal probe of space agency Inspector General Robert Cobb.

An oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, is reviewing preliminary findings from an investigation into Cobb's conduct to determine what, if any, action to take. An internal report from the probe, obtained by the Orlando Sentinel, details the findings from 69 allegations made against Cobb, a former White House ethics lawyer.

Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. In a Nov. 17 letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Cobb described the report as "replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies."

One of the allegations investigated in the report states that Cobb did former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe's "bidding" by terminating a contract with the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers for the agency's annual chief financial audit. NASA's inspector general is responsible for independently monitoring the agency.

Investigators wrote that O'Keefe was "not happy" with the audit, and after discussing the matter with then-Inspector General Roberta Gross, she "subsequently [was] asked to resign." The report notes "Cobb [was] selected" to replace Gross and "Cobb subsequently terminate[d] the contract with PWC [PricewaterhouseCoopers]."

In an interview, O'Keefe said that the chronology in the report omitted several important details and ignored the timing of events that would have shown they had no connection.

It "was a completely unrelated set of events," said O'Keefe, now chancellor of Louisiana State University. "It was not even in the same time span that we're talking about here."

The report makes no mention that more than a year passed between Cobb's arrival at NASA in 2002 and the end of the PricewaterhouseCoopers contract. Nor does the report state that the contract was allowed to expire instead of being terminated.

Paul Pastorek, NASA's former general counsel, made those points in an e-mail to the Sentinel on Monday. Neither Cobb nor his office "canceled the contract at any time," Pastorek wrote.

"It expired on its own terms. As the PricewaterhouseCoopers contract came to its natural conclusion, it was competed and another nationally recognized and well qualified firm won the competition."

O'Keefe also discussed the report's contention that Gross was asked to resign because he was unhappy with the audit. Factors behind her departure, he said, included her lack of awareness about systemic NASA accounting problems turned up by the audit.

Gross, a widely respected veteran investigator, told the Sentinel in an interview Tuesday that she monitored the audit closely, but NASA accountants did not produce needed records in a timely fashion.

"Of course, I knew the agency had problems with its records," Gross said.

"For him [O'Keefe] to say I didn't know there were problems misconstrues what happened."

O'Keefe said the overly contentious relationship between the inspector general's office and other NASA departments was another reason he asked for Gross' resignation. O'Keefe cited an ongoing turf war with NASA's security office. Gross contends the tension was caused by her staff "doing their jobs."

One of the report's allegations appears related to that rivalry between the inspector general's office and NASA security personnel.

Several current and former employees in Cobb's office accused him of failing to investigate claims that NASA security specialists were carrying firearms aboard commercial aircraft without legal authority. One of the report's findings related to that allegation was an excerpt from an e-mail Cobb sent telling his staff they would get along with the security office "whether they like it or not."

A copy of the Feb. 14, 2003, e-mail obtained by the Sentinel shows it had no connection to the firearms issue, but instead was a message from Cobb to his employees in the aftermath of the space shuttle Columbia accident. The e-mail praised the work of his staff and asked them to get along better with security personnel while working on shuttle debris collection and removal.

Fairfield Woman Pleads Guilty To Attempted Extortion (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A Fairfield woman pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge that she threatened to kill a man's son if he did not pay her $197,000, federal authorities said.

Pamela Boccanfuso, 44, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to mailing threatening communications. She faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when she is sentenced on March 20. She also must pay $50,000 restitution to a previous victim of an extortion scheme in 2004.

In February, the victim received a seven-page typewritten letter threatening to kill his son if he did not deliver $197,347.72 to the author, later identified as Boccanfuso. In the letter, Boccanfuso accused the victim's son of supplying drugs to Boccanfuso's son, nearly killing him and causing significant financial hardship due to medical and rehabilitation costs associated with his drug addiction.

About a week later, the victim received a second letter that directed him to place an advertisement in the Connecticut Post on Feb. 22 with a contact number. The FBI subsequently placed an advertisement in the newspaper that day listing a cellular telephone number as directed.

A few days later, the victim received several telephone calls between 3 a.m. and 3:45 a.m. over the number provided in the ad. The woman told him to place the money in a plastic bag and drive to Interstate 95 south, and that he then would receive another telephone call.

The victim told the caller that he could not raise that amount of money that quickly. Later, at about 3:45 a.m., the victim received another telephone call from the same female caller who said she had spoken to "her uncle" and that the man had two weeks to raise the money or his son would be killed.

On March 10, the FBI captured an incoming telephone number and identified it as belonging to a public telephone in Norwalk. Around the same time, a law enforcement surveillance team observed a woman, later identified as Boccanfuso, using that telephone.

Boccanfuso consented to a search of her car, which resulted in the seizure of gloves, an electronic voice changer and an Orbits gum box with the cellular telephone number identified in the Connecticut Post, authorities said.

Boccanfuso said she had telephoned the victim because she had been instructed to do so by unknown individuals who were threatening to disclose intimate pictures of her if she did not follow their instructions, authorities said.

A search of her home recovered a handwritten note containing instructions for the making of an extortion payment and other evidence, authorities said.

John Robert Gulash, Boccanfuso's attorney, said the claims in the February letter related to drugs were not true. He declined further comment.

Atlanta Homebuilder Faces Up To 40 Years In Jail For Wire Fraud (ABC)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, November 29, 2006

A metro Atlanta homebuilder and seller has pleaded guilty to selling incomplete or non-existent houses in Forsyth County, Ga., and arranging more than $5 million in fraudulent mortgage loans for the houses.

Jeffery Alan Teague (also known as Jeffrey Allen Bryant), 49, pleaded guilty late Nov. 27 in federal district court to two counts of wire fraud for a scheme to defraud mortgage lenders by arranging loans to buy incomplete homes in the names of California, New York, and Florida "investors." Teague provided the lenders with false Certificates of Occupancy, stating the houses securing the loans were "completed to code" and "suitable for occupancy."

Teague was arrested by the FBI on Aug. 3 in connection with the execution of a series of search warrants on his offices and the incomplete Forsyth County houses.

He now faces a maximum sentence of 40 years in prison and a fine of up to $500,000. Sentencing is set for Feb. 9 before U.S. District Judge Thomas W. Thrash.

According to information provided by U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias, from 1999 to 2001 Teague, using the name "Jeffrey Allen Bryant" and operating as the builder/seller "Quantum Builders" and "Premium Property Management," defrauded mortgage lenders by obtaining more $10 million in loans for the purchase of non-existent and incomplete houses in Rockdale County from Bryant/Quantum Builders. These loans were obtained in the names of unqualified "straw borrowers," using fraudulent appraisals with photographs of completed houses and false Certificates of Occupancy provided by Teague.

Following detection of this scheme, Teague moved to Maryland, but returned to Atlanta in 2006 under the name Jeffery Alan Teague and "The Pacific Group Inc., d/b/a Value Homes Ltd." Teague again began to arrange mortgage loans for the purchase of incomplete houses in Forsyth County from Teague/Value Homes in the names of California, New York and Florida

"investors." In 2006, Teague also collected "investor" money for property in subdivisions in Fayette and Fulton Counties which he did not own.

"This case highlights the problems created by mortgage fraud where the builder is involved in the fraud and out-of-state 'investors' sign loans without inspecting the properties," Nahmias said. "Even the partially built houses in this case may be subject to condemnation as the portions completed were not built to code, thereby leaving mortgage lenders with little security for their loans and 'investors' with nothing to resell."

San Quentin's Execution Team Is Called Incompetent (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

A brief filed on behalf of killer Michael Morales finds broad problems with death penalty cases.

California's procedures for executing prisoners by lethal injection fall short of standards set by the veterinary profession for animal euthanasia and were formulated with less care than methods in China, the world leader in capital punishment, according to a brief filed Tuesday in San Jose federal court by attorneys for a death row inmate.

In addition, the brief asserts that the execution team at San Quentin State Prison is "unlicensed, untrained, unprofessional and incompetent" to carry out its duties.

The brief was lodged as U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel prepares to rule on perhaps the most fiercely fought of a number of legal challenges in several states to lethal injection, the dominant method of execution in the nation. Fogel is expected to rule by the end of the year in the case of Michael Morales, who argues that California's injection methods create an unnecessary risk of excessive pain and as a consequence violate the 8th Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation "conducts its executions in an outdated, cramped gas chamber with an undersized and dark anteroom," from which prison staff are supposed to assure proper administration of a three-drug protocol, the brief says.

The brief also says the state uses chemicals "mixed by untrained and unsupervised prison staff, while ensuring that there is no meaningful oversight or review."

Earlier this month, the California attorney general's office issued a ringing defense of the state's procedures, maintaining in its brief that "there is no evidence that any prior execution resulted in the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."

But the 274-page brief filed by Morales' attorneys finds fault with virtually every aspect of California's administration of capital punishment, frequently citing statements by state personnel during the proceedings.

For example, the execution team leader, identified only as Witness No. 5, said that for the last eight executions, he did not require team members to practice mixing sodium thiopental, which is supposed to anesthetize the inmate before the two other drugs — pancuronium bromide, which paralyzes the inmate, and potassium chloride, which causes cardiac arrest — are administered.

One of the key arguments in the Morales case, and in several other lethal injection challenges around the country, is that the anesthetic has not been properly administered, with the result that the inmate experiences excruciating pain but cannot express it because he is paralyzed.

Witness No. 4, a licensed vocational nurse, said in a deposition that she was not trained to mix thiopental. The first time she prepared it was the night of an execution, she said.

The Department of Corrections "has failed to comprehend both the importance of properly preparing [the drug] and the difficulty of doing so," according to the brief filed by defense lawyers David A. Senior, Kathleen T. Saenz and Benjamin D. Weston of Century City. Attorneys Ginger Anders of Washington, John Grele of San Francisco and Richard Steinken of Chicago helped prepare the brief.

In response to a question from the judge, the defense brief indicated that it might be less risky to use a single drug. Still, Morales' lawyers cautioned that there would still be risks. Significant problems with the execution chamber and drug delivery apparatus, including cramped quarters, poor lighting and bad sight lines, still exist.

Fogel asked the lawyers how the procedure could be improved. But Morales' lawyers said that they were ethically constrained in their answers, saying they could not "be put in the position of designing for the state its execution procedure."

In response to another question from Fogel, defense lawyers said many of the dangers in monitoring the inmate, inserting the IVs and injecting the drugs "flow from the fact" that the state continues to execute prisoners in San Quentin's old gas chamber, instead of in a facility designed for lethal injection.

"It is common sense that a facility should be designed to accommodate the specific elements of the procedure that will be performed in that facility. The veterinary profession has recognized this and advocates using dedicated rooms for euthanasia," the defense brief stated.

DOJ_NMG_0099529

Defense lawyers noted that a witness for the state, Dr. Robert Singler, observed that "the cramped quarters and positioning of the gurney rendered placing the IVs more difficult than in a clinical setting." Execution staffers have repeatedly experienced difficulty inserting IVs to deliver the lethal drugs, the brief pointed out. It noted that several other states have built a facilities for lethal injections.

Defense lawyers said there may be a better execution anesthetic than thiopental. But as long as the protocol includes pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride, "it is imperative" that the state provide for a clinical bedside evaluation of anesthetic levels by a trained professional, the brief said.

The defense said it "should not be that difficult" for the state to retain such a doctor, although a brief filed by the California attorney general's office earlier this month asserted that such a requirement would effectively shut down capital punishment in California because leading physicians' organizations have urged their members not to participate in executions.

Morales' lawyers criticized state officials for failing to adequately research either their original lethal injection protocol or a modified procedure adopted in the face of his legal challenge. In contrast, they said, Chinese government officials conducted detailed experiments on animals before executing humans by lethal injection

Morales' lawyers argued that the state needed to bring its execution procedures into the open.

"For the past 14 years," they said, the Corrections Department has undertaken the recruiting, screening and training of execution team members "in total secrecy. That secrecy has permitted the execution system at San Quentin to operate in an unbelievably dysfunctional manner."

NC Execution Delayed For Mental Tests (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - ALBEMARLE, N.C.-A judge ordered an execution delayed for 60 days Monday so psychiatrists can evaluate a man who wore a Superman T-shirt while representing himself at trial and pleaded with jurors to sentence him to death.

Guy Tobias LeGrande, 47, had been set to die Friday for the 1993 murder of Ellen Munford, whose estranged husband offered to pay him $6,500 from a $50,000 life insurance policy.

The stay of execution granted Monday by Stanly Superior Judge William R. Bell includes 45 days for psychiatrists to submit their observations and evaluations to the court.

Death penalty opponents argue that LeGrande is one of the nation's most extreme examples of a mentally ill person who never should have been allowed to represent himself. Prosecutors suggest his courtroom antics were parts of an elaborate act.

Defense attorney James Coleman, a Duke University law professor, says a psychiatrist who recently examined LeGrande's records concluded that he is psychotic. The defense said LeGrande believes that the governor has already pardoned him and that he will receive billions of dollars from the state once freed.

A defense attorney who represents LeGrande without his permission said he doesn't know whether LeGrande will cooperate with the doctors.

"Mr. LeGrande doesn't want any of this to occur because in his mind he has been pardoned," attorney Jay Ferguson said.

Michael Parker, the current district attorney, said transcripts from LeGrande's 1996 trial show he appeared to know what he was doing much of the time. LeGrande's outbursts came at the end of the trial, when he didn't get the verdict he wanted, Parker said.

Beyond the issue of whether LeGrande should have been allowed to represent himself, his defenders question whether the state should execute an inmate they believe is mentally ill. Both the American Bar Association and American Psychiatric Association oppose executing defendants with severe mental disorders.

LeGrande's attorneys also are challenging the motivations of trial witnesses, saying they likely were paid for their testimony.

Protecting Reporters' Phone Records (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A journalist's ability to protect the identity of confidential sources has been further eroded by the Supreme Court's refusal this week to stop a prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two New York Times reporters. This is the latest legal blow to the diminishing right of journalists to shield informants who often provide information of great interest and importance but who might be punished if their identities were known.

The case arose from a Chicago grand jury investigation into who told the two reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government planned to take against two Islamic charities in late 2001. The government contends that the reporters, in performing the normal journalistic practice of calling the charities for comment, effectively tipped them off to impending raids and asset seizures, undermining the effort.

Rather than drag the reporters into court, where they could have protected their sources by refusing to testify, the prosecutor subpoenaed their phone records for 11 days in 2001. A trial court prohibited the government from obtaining the records from the phone companies, but a divided appeals court reversed that decision. Now the Supreme Court, in refusing to intervene, has effectively allowed the prosecutor to search through the records in hopes he can pinpoint the source of the leak.

This is a bad outcome for the press and for the public. The phone records reveal the identities of lots of sources having nothing to do with the leaks. The appeals court's disingenuous suggestion that The Times might redact irrelevant records would simply have helped point to possible leakers.

The public will be ill served if this case reduces the willingness of officials to reveal important but sensitive information. The privilege granted to journalists to protect their sources needs to be bolstered with a strong federal shield law that would preserve the public interest in newsgathering and dissemination of information.

CIVIL LAW:

Justices Today Tackle Consumer Protection (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court today takes up a hotly contested business case with major implications for the nation's banking industry and, more broadly, for states' ability to set consumer protection and other laws that are tougher than federal standards.

The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, pits Michigan regulators, supported by consumer groups and state attorneys general, against the banking industry, federal officials and business groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. A decision is likely by July, when the court recesses for the term.

"This is really the front lines of the ongoing, evolutionary struggle over the balance of power between the federal government and the states," says Columbia Law School professor Thomas Merrill.

The states and federal government have shared jurisdiction over the banking industry. In the past several years, however, the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC) has issued rules that, among other things, expanded its authority to oversee not just national banks, but their subsidiaries.

In response, Wachovia Mortgage, operating under a Michigan charter, changed its status in 2003 to become an operating subsidiary of Wachovia Bank and told Michigan regulators it was now subject to OCC regulation. Michigan moved to bar Wachovia Mortgage from operating in the state, and Wachovia sued.

The Michigan Office of Financial and Insurance Services, headed by Linda Watters, says the OCC rules have transformed state-charted subsidiaries into "creatures of the federal government" without the permission of states. Michigan argues that the OCC's pre-emption of state regulations exceeds its power under federal law and infringes on state sovereignty in violation of the U.S. Constitution.

Banking groups, which have won in the lower courts, say the OCC has federal law and court precedent on its side. Vance Beck, associate general counsel of Wachovia, says transforming Wachovia Mortgage into a subsidiary allows the bank to operate under one federal standard rather than a costly, inefficient patchwork of state laws.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has filed a legal brief in support of the OCC, noting the decision could affect a wide swath of businesses.

The case comes as financial products have become more complex and states have passed a rash of laws to combat predatory mortgage and other lending.

Consumer groups say the case will, at a minimum, affect hundreds of banks and weaken consumer protections. They say state banking regulators have more expertise in such areas as mortgage lending and far more enforcement personnel than the OCC, and that the OCC has brought only a handful of consumer-protection cases.

"The notion that states should lose their ability to protect consumers when they're dealing with national banks or their operating subsidiaries is pretty disturbing," says Ellen Harnick of the Center for Responsible Lending.

AARP, National Consumer Federation and other groups supporting the Watters complaint assert that the OCC, rather than working on behalf of consumers, has in recent years frequently intervened on the side of national banks or their operating subsidiaries against consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0099531

While the debate is now in court, it could move to Congress. Incoming House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., would like to set national standards to combat predatory mortgage lending.

Key Test Of State Power For Supreme Court (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, November 29, 2006

For 11 years, the conservative wing of the US Supreme Court did something decidedly unconservative. It sought to tip the balance of power between the national government and the states.

This so-called federalism revolution was aimed at bolstering the status of the states as dual sovereigns in the face of an ever-expanding sphere of federal power. The justices wrote of state sovereignty and the dignity of the states in terms reminiscent of Colonial distrust of the kind of draconian central authority wielded by the British crown.

But by the time Chief Justice William Rehnquist died in 2005, the "revolution" resembled little more than a constitutional skirmish.

Now with two new members of the Supreme Court, it is unclear whether the justices might again take up the mantle of states' rights. Will a majority seek to boldly build on the string of federalism precedents handed down by the Rehnquist court, or will the judicial minimalism of Chief Justice John Roberts leave it to federal regulatory agencies and Congress to police the constitutional contours of federal-state power?

The high court's first significant opportunity to address those questions arrives in a case set for oral argument Wednesday.

At issue in Watters v. Wachovia Bank is whether a federal agency has the power to preempt state regulations governing national mortgage companies doing business within a state's borders. Put another way, the issue is who regulates mortgage companies affiliated with national banks, state regulators or federal regulators.

Traditionally, mortgage companies had to comply with state registration and other requirements. But in 2001, the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which regulates national banks, issued a new rule that subsidiary companies of national banks are governed by federal, not state, regulations.

That action preempted state laws and rules governing mortgage companies and other national bank subsidiaries operating in a particular state.

The current case arose in Michigan. Wachovia Mortgage Corp., a subsidiary of Wachovia Bank, had long done business there. The mortgage company was set up as a Michigan corporation. But because it is a subsidiary of a national bank, company officials said after the OCC rule change that they did not have to comply with Michigan regulations, only federal ones enforced by the OCC.

Linda Watters, who heads Michigan's Office of Insurance and Financial Services, insisted that the company would have to comply with state laws if it wanted to continue to conduct business there.

The dispute went to court. A federal judge and a federal appeals court panel ruled for the company. Two other federal appeals courts have also ruled against state governments in similar litigation.

Michigan is now asking the Supreme Court to reverse the lower court decision, in part, according to state lawyers, because the OCC's preemptive actions encroach on an area of traditional state power enforced by principles of federalism guaranteed in the 10th Amendment.

"In the absence of Congressional authorization, the OCC has no independent power to preempt the validly enacted legislation of a sovereign state," writes Michigan Solicitor General Thomas Casey in his brief to the court.

Lawyers for Wachovia disagree. "These rules are within the OCC's delegated rulemaking authority," says Robert Long in his brief. Any protections of state power under the 10th Amendment are abrogated by Congress's constitutional power under the commerce clause to regulate national banking, Mr. Long adds.

The Bush administration is backing Wachovia and the OCC. Federal agencies have the power to issue regulations that preempt state laws even when Congress has not specifically authorized such preemption, says Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief.

The case is being closely followed by bankers as well as other nationwide businesses that face a patchwork quilt of differing state regulations. Federal preemption offers a significantly more efficient means of conducting business nationwide.

"For some of us, we're not even sure how the 10th Amendment ended up in this case," says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the US Chamber of Commerce. "We have two new members of the court, and they have yet to show their cards in cases involving federal preemption," she says. "We see this as a pretty clear case that uniform national law is of primary importance."

Also watching the case are attorneys general from the nation's 49 other states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico, who are urging the justices to uphold Michigan's power to regulate companies doing business within its own borders.

"If [the OCC rule] is allowed to stand, it would render states powerless to protect their residents from abusive and discriminatory consumer practices by state- created entities that are operating subsidiaries of national banks," writes Caitlin Halligan, New York solicitor general, in a friend-of-the-court brief filed by the states.

Consumer protection is an area traditionally regulated by the states, Mr. Casey writes in the Michigan brief. In contrast, he says, the primary mission of the OCC is to ensure the safety and soundness of the national banking system.

There are 40 full-time OCC staff members in a central office to investigate consumer complaints against national banks and their subsidiaries, Casey says. By contrast, there are nearly 700 full-time examiners and lawyers at the state level who handle consumer complaints, he says.

Lawyers for National City Bank offer different numbers in their friend-of-the-court brief. Of OCC's 1,800 examiners, they say, 300 spend all or part of their time enforcing bank compliance with consumer-protection laws.

The OCC receives 70,000 consumer complaints a year, the National City Bank brief says, and in 2004 returned $4 million in wrongful fees and charges to complaining customers.

The brief says that state and local consumer-protection efforts "provide no real benefit to consumers." It adds that federal examiners located on-site in large national banks effectively monitor not only the financial soundness of the bank's operations but also compliance with federal consumer-protection laws.

The Power To Destroy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

The Supreme Court today is hearing Watters v. Wachovia, a case whose lineage goes all the way back to McColluch v. Maryland in 1819. In that seminal case on the powers of the federal government, Chief Justice John Marshall famously ruled that Maryland could not levy a tax against the Bank of the United States because "the power to tax involves the power to destroy," and states lacked authority under the Constitution to "destroy" federal entities through taxation.

The Bank of the United States is long gone, but in Watters v. Wachovia states are still trying to exercise authority over federally chartered banks. The refrain in today's case could well be that the power to regulate is the power to destroy. Linda Watters, the petitioner in the case, is Michigan's state banking regulator. In 2003 she tried to bar Wachovia Mortgage Corporation from making loans in Michigan unless it submitted to direct state regulation.

Wachovia Mortgage happens to be a wholly owned, North Carolina-based subsidiary of Wachovia Bank, a national bank chartered by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, or OCC. And so Wachovia argued that its subsidiary, like the parent bank, was not subject to state regulation or registration when it came to banking activities that the parent company was authorized to conduct under federal law.

That the power to destroy is no exaggeration is illustrated best by a similar case involving Wells Fargo. California's banking regulator came within 72 hours of shutting down all Wells Fargo mortgage-lending activities in the state after the bank announced that it would no longer submit to state regulation of its mortgage-lending subsidiary. Only prompt judicial action prevented Wells Fargo's entire portfolio of mortgages in the state from being wiped off its books.

Banks have been winning cases such as Watters, in part because federal law is clear that national banks are not subject to state regulation when they conduct business authorized by the National Bank Act and regulated by the OCC. The only ambiguity is whether this federal pre-emption of state law applies equally to subsidiaries and the parent companies. But even that is a slender reed, because the subsidiaries in question aren't doing anything that the parent companies couldn't do themselves. After its brush with death in California, Wells Fargo absorbed the offending subsidiary into the parent company, despite winning in court, rather than face future state threats.

This hasn't stopped all 50 state Attorneys General from filing an amicus brief supporting state regulation of national bank subsidiaries. It should surprise no one that the brief was authored by none other than New York AG Eliot Spitzer, who has made a specialty out of intruding on traditional federal authority. Mr. Spitzer has already tangled with the OCC (and has so far lost) over national mortgage lenders, and he is not one to forget a slight. His case is to be heard by an appeals court next week.

Supporters of state regulation cry "federalism," and this paper yields to no one in trying to restrict Washington to its Constitutionally delegated powers. But the Constitution contains the Commerce Clause for a reason. If banking across state lines isn't interstate commerce, it's hard to know what is. Given that the appeals courts have sided with the banks in earlier cases, one is left to hope that the Supreme Court has taken Watters in order to eliminate whatever uncertainty remains when it comes to state regulation of national banks.

NWA Strike Appeal Argued (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099533

The union representing flight attendants at Northwest Airlines asked an appeals court Tuesday to overturn a judge's ruling and allow them to go on strike.

Arguing before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a lawyer for the Association of Flight Attendants-CWA, Edward Gilmartin, said the law allows for a strike because Northwest made unilateral changes in its employees' contract terms and working conditions, including imposing pay cuts.

A focus of the argument was on the federal Railway Labor Act, which governs labor relations at U.S. airlines.

The appeals court will decide whether New York U.S. District Court Judge Victor Marrero properly overruled a bankruptcy court judge over the summer when he stopped the flight attendants from engaging in any strike activity.

Northwest is operating in bankruptcy protection, and it imposed the cuts after union members twice voted down negotiated settlements with the airline. Northwest maintains it needs the cuts to exit bankruptcy.

A lawyer for Northwest, meanwhile, said that the airline wants peace with its flight attendants and urged a federal appeals court to support a judge's decision to block the workers from striking.

And the U.S. Justice Department, represented by Assistant U.S. Attorney Heidi Wendel, argued that a strike, "would come at the expense of the public."

Northwest lawyer Brian Leitch told the court that the airline would continue to negotiate with representatives of its 7,300 active flight attendants who were prevented from striking on Aug. 25 after the company imposed the pay cuts.

"Northwest recognizes we still have to achieve an agreement with our flight attendants," Leitch told the three-judge panel. "It's just good business."

The bankruptcy judge let Northwest slice pay and benefits for its flight attendants. The union has said the cuts amounted to 40 percent.

At Tuesday's hearing, lawyers for the Air Line Pilots Association appeared in court in support of the AFA's appeal.

Northwest said it believes the appeals court will uphold the judge's ruling. The Eagan-based airline outlined to the court "why it believes that provisions of the Railway Labor Act apply during the airline's Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings," said company spokesman Roman Blahoski.

"We feel very confident that the appeals court will uphold the Railway Labor Act and our right to go on strike," said Ricky Thornton, a spokesman for the AFA at Northwest.

The three-judge panel, which didn't immediately rule, acknowledged that it had never considered a case quite like it.

Chief Judge Dennis Jacobs cautioned the lawyers to keep in mind that there was more to the dispute than flight attendants and an airline company that carries 130,000 passengers a day on 1,200 flights.

"There's a third party — the public interest," Jacobs said. He noted that Congress has purposely structured labor laws regarding the transportation industry to ensure "the ability to travel from here to there."

Another judge, John Walker Jr., interrupted AFA attorney Gilmartin shortly after he said Northwest tried to win concessions through the courts that it was unable to get at the bargaining table.

"That's one way to look at it," Walker said. "Another way is to say that this is a company in financial distress looking to get reorganized."

Judge Reene Raggi said Northwest did what the law permitted it to do by seeking permission from the bankruptcy judge to impose pay cuts.

In a related development, Northwest and the AFA are scheduled to continue their mediated negotiations on a consensual contract on Dec. 12 in Minneapolis. The airline remains committed to negotiating a consensual agreement with its flight attendants. The AFA has repeatedly said that talks are at an impasse.

Schools Appeal Ruling On No Child Suit (AP-Y)

By Terry Kinney, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

School districts in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to revive a lawsuit challenging the way government-mandated programs are funded.

The National Education Association and districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law, President Bush's signature education policy. They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government.

Chief U.S. District Judge Bernard A. Friedman in Detroit dismissed the lawsuit in November 2005.

Attorney Robert Chanin, representing the Pontiac, Mich., school district and the other plaintiffs, told the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday that states submitted compliance plans based on their understanding of the level of government support that would be provided. But Congress appropriated far less than needed, leaving local school districts to make up the difference, he said.

Government attorney Alisa Klein told the panel that the intent of the law was never to fully fund the provisions laid out in No Child Left Behind.

The law requires states to revise academic standards and develop tests to measure students' progress annually. If students fail to make progress, the law requires states to take action against school districts.

The three-judge appeals court panel took the case under advisement and did not say when it will rule. The outcome would apply directly to the districts in the case, but could affect how the law is enforced in schools across the country.

Justice Dept. Settles Saraland Housing Discrimination Claims (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

SARALAND, Ala. (AP) — The Justice Department reached a housing discrimination case settlement Tuesday with a landlord in Saraland accused of trying to force a white renter out of an apartment after learning she had a biracial daughter.

The settlement, which includes a $40,000 damages payment, stems from a federal complaint alleging that Beulah Stevens violated the federal Fair Housing Act in her actions against Michele Jones, according to the Justice Department.

Although Jones is white, the complaint states that Stevens tried to force Jones out of the apartment "upon learning that her child is biracial and that she associated with African Americans," the agency said in a news release. It also said Stevens was accused of using racial epithets when speaking about black people.

According to the complaint, two fair housing tests carried out by the Mobile Fair Housing Center — now called the Center for Fair Housing, Inc. — showed that Stevens, who manages 19 rental properties, treated white testers who asked about availability of rental units more favorably than black testers.

Stevens said Tuesday that the claims were baseless.

"There's not a prejudiced bone in my body," she told The Associated Press in a phone interview. "I like black people. I grew up playing with black people, eating with them and everything else."

Stevens said her objection to Jones was based on other legitimate grounds.

Under the settlement, Stevens agreed to pay more than $40,000 in damages and penalties, to post a non-discriminatory rental policy, to undergo training on the requirements of the Fair Housing Act and to submit periodic reports to the Justice Department.

The settlement still needs to be approved by the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama.

"This case shows that the Department of Justice and this office believe that housing discrimination is a serious violation of the law," said U.S. Attorney Deborah J. Rhodes of Mobile. "We will enforce federal laws against racial discrimination."

N.Y. Mayor Meets With Dead Groom's Family (CNN)

CNN.com, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK (CNN) -- New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg met Tuesday with the family of a man shot and killed by police early Saturday in an incident that has sparked community outrage and could lead to a federal investigation.

Sean Bell, 23, was shot to death by police officers outside a Queens nightclub hours before he was to be married to the mother of his two children.

Two others -- 31-year-old Joseph Guzman and 23-year-old Trent Benefield -- were seriously wounded in the incident.

Bloomberg told reporters he met for an hour with Bell's family and fiancee to express his condolences and discuss the investigation of the incident. (Watch Bell's father explain his son's fear of police)

Community leaders have demanded to know why NYPD officers fired as many as 50 rounds -- one officer alone fired 31 shots -- at the unarmed group of men as they were leaving Bell's bachelor party early Saturday morning. (Watch police acknowledge 'contagious shooting')

"They are obviously feeling a terrible pain, and the one thing that they would like the mayor to say is the one thing the mayor can't say -- that there is nothing the mayor can do to bring back their son or their fiance," Bloomberg said of Bell's loved ones.

Bell was pronounced dead Saturday at Jamaica Hospital in Queens. An autopsy showed he was struck four times in the neck and torso.

DOJ_NMG_0099535

As of Tuesday, Guzman remained in critical condition after being shot at least 11 times and Benefield was in stable condition with three bullet wounds, said a representative of Mary Immaculate Hospital in Queens where the two are being treated.

All five police officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave Sunday pending an investigation by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown.

Bloomberg said Brown's office was investigating the incident diligently and trying to determine whether a grand jury should be involved.

"District Attorney Brown is the one who now has responsibility for trying to ascertain what happened," Bloomberg said.

Bloomberg rejected claims that the incident was racially motivated, citing an NYPD policy against ethnic profiling.

Many black leaders have said the victims, all African-American, were unjustly targeted because of their race.

"There's no evidence that race had anything to do with it," Bloomberg said. "The police officers were as diverse as the people in the car." (Watch how high-capacity police weapons may bear part of blame)

Federal law enforcement officials said the Justice Department was nearing the formal opening of a federal civil rights investigation into the fatal shooting.

Justice Department officials acknowledged the matter remained under review and that federal authorities in Washington and New York continued to monitor events in the aftermath of the shooting.

Officials declined to confirm that a decision to formally investigate the case could be announced as early as Tuesday or Wednesday.

FBI officials asking not to be identified said they expected the Justice Department "very soon" to request agents for the federal probe.

"Until that happens, this investigation is completely in the hands of the Queens district attorney," said one FBI official.

The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division frequently investigates cases in which law enforcement actions taken against members of minority groups prompt complaints of police violations of federal civil rights statutes.

Shooter: They Knew I Was Cop (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar And Corky Siemaszko, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, November 29, 2006

The undercover cop who fired the opening salvo in a 50-shot barrage that felled a Queens man on his wedding day told his story yesterday for the first time.

The detective insisted he identified himself as a cop well before he fired on the car carrying Sean Bell and his buddies.

"This cop screamed, 'Police!' and he had his shield out," attorney Philip Karasyk told the Daily News.

The News is withholding the name of the Brooklyn-born detective to protect his safety and the undercover operations he has worked on.

The detective held his fire despite Bell clipping him with his Nissan Altima, said Karasyk, who refused to name his client, even as police sources confirmed his identity.

"Once the car hit him, he jumped to the side," Karasyk said.

But when the cop saw the man sitting in the passenger seat - whom police sources identified as Joseph Guzman - reach into his waistband, the officer fired the first of 11 rounds at the men.

Four other officers, believing they were being shot at, also opened up on the car, Karasyk said. When the gunfire was over, Bell was dead and Guzman and another man, Trent Benefield, were badly wounded.

"The other officers believed the shots were coming from the vehicle," Karasyk said. "They only did so in this case because they were in mortal fear for their lives."

Queens District Attorney Richard Brown has vowed to get to the bottom of the Saturday morning shooting that has outraged black New Yorkers - and that Mayor Bloomberg said looked like "excessive force."

Karasyk, however, said the five cops involved in the shooting - none of whom ever fired his gun on the job before - had no qualms about telling their stories before a Queens grand jury.

"That's our offer to the prosecutors - to waive immunity," Karasyk said.

The lawyer's client is a Hispanic officer in his late 20s.

A 66-year-old relative told The News that the detective is a good cop.

"Only God knows what happened," he said. "Police never shoot for no reason. Maybe he's got a reason."

The Justice Department is monitoring the unfolding investigation, but Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslyn Mauskopf emphasized it is not independently collecting evidence or interviewing witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0099536

At an NAACP meeting in Queens last night, black leaders called for the feds to appoint a special prosecutor if Brown doesn't obtain an indictment.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said police were questioning a new witness. Sources said that witness was China Flores, who had told The News that a fourth man nearly jumped in Bell's car before the shooting.

Police are still searching for that fourth man, who is believed to have left the Kalua Cabaret in Jamaica, Queens, with the victims - and to have disappeared shortly before the shooting started. Police also believe that the mystery man may have been armed.

All five officers have been placed on paid leave and ordered to surrender their guns.

Life-long friends Guzman and Benefield took Bell out for a bachelor bash at the club - unaware that cops investigating drugs and prostitution were staking out the joint.

Two undercover detectives - Karasyk's client and a female officer - were inside. NYPD guidelines permitted them to have two drinks; Kelly said it wasn't yet known whether Karasyk's client was drinking because he hasn't been questioned pending the grand jury probe.

When Bell and his pals left at 4 a.m., Karasyk's client followed. Kelly conceded on Monday that it was unusual for an undercover officer to pursue suspects; normally, the undercover signals his colleagues to move in.

Karasyk said his client followed because he heard Guzman say outside the club that he was going to get a gun to settle a beef with another club patron.

Many in the African-American community believe there was a racial component to the shooting because Bell and Benefield are both black.

Detective Mike Oliver, who fired 31 shots, and Officer Mike Carey, who fired three times, are both white - as is Lt. Gerard Napoli, the supervising officer who did not fire his weapon. The two other officers who fired the remaining shots are both black. Their names have not been revealed.

Investigators have a mountain of evidence to go through, and there also are more than 50 people to interview, delaying the empaneling of the grand jury. If charges are brought, all the cops' names will come out.

Rally Held For Elderly Woman Slain By Police (AJC)

By Saeed Ahmed, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 28, 2006

About 70 residents gathered outside the house of Kathryn Johnston Tuesday evening, some holding placards condemning police, others venting angrily about the botched narcotics raid that claimed the life of the elderly woman a week ago.

"I'm enraged," said Walterine Jones, 50. "I mean, my God, if they can do this to an elderly woman like her, what does it mean for the safety of the rest of us."

The rally participants marched to a church for a community meeting, bringing the crowd to about 300.

Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington addressed the crowd, saying he became concerned after community response to the shooting.

When he learned that the information he received conflicted with what a confidential informant told the Internal Affairs Unit, he brought in the FBI to lead the investigation, he said.

"I am not new to police misconduct," he said. "I've worked in Washington, D.C., and New Orleans. I've made this move based on law enforcement and my gut feeling."

Marchers to the church carried signs that mocked the police, passed around by rally organizers, the New Black Panther for Self-Defense.

"Warning taxpayers & black citizens. Don't dial 911. The police will kill you," said one.

Another was a cartoon of a smiling uniformed officer holding a phone, with the caption: "They gave me administrative leave ... with pay. Kill a black citizen and get paid."

The message was a reference to Pennington's decision to place on paid leave the sargeant and seven detectives who are part of it.

Residents angry

Even without the signs, there was plenty of anger to go around among those who gathered in front of a makeshift memorial outside the now-boarded up house where Johnston died in a gunbattle with officers.

Residents said that while crime is rampant in the area, the stretch of Neal Street where Johnson lived alone for almost two decades was home to other elderly residents.

DOJ_NMG_0099537

"There's crime that needs to be tackled here, that's true. But this road right here, there's never been any drug dealing here," said Michael Jaye, 46, who has lived in the area since he was 4.

"But the police don't come here to fight crime. They come to knock heads," he added. Johnny Colbert, 27, echoed many of the attendees' suspicion that police made up the description of "Sam," who they said was the man who sold drug to an undercover informant.

"There are a lot of 'Sam' around here. They are all make-believe by the police," he said.

As some of the attendees pumped fists into the air and shouted "Black Power" at the exhortation of the organizers, a handful of stoic GBI and FBI agents stood by watching.

On a nearby porch, an elderly woman leaned on the railing, straining to catch what was happening.

She too would have walked down and shown her support, she said. But she was too feeble to, she said.

The meeting, at the Lindsay Street Baptist Church on North Avenue, was organized by State Sen. Vincent Fort and Rep. "Able" Mabel Thomas, both Democrats from Atlanta.

"I just don't understand how you bust in someone's house and don't know who lives there," said Mary Thomas, an usher at the church. "My daughter and I said this could be any of us."

Joe Cobb, who works in the neighborhood, said he never believed Johnston or anyone else sold drugs at the house.

"What's unfolding just reinforces what I first thought: the police lied," he said.

Services Held For Woman Slain By Atlanta Police (AJC)

By S.a. Reid , Rhonda Cook, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 29, 2006

Friends and family who gathered at an East Point funeral home Tuesday for the funeral of Kathryn Johnston said they just want to know the truth about the drug raid that led to the elderly woman's death.

"When this occurred, we were shocked that this could be real," said Johnston's niece, JoAnne Trawick. "I've always believed from the beginning that this was a mistake."

Commenting on revelations that the informant narcotics officers say led them to the Johnston's house is accusing the officers of asking him to lie about his role, Trawick said, "I hope he is telling the truth.

"Nobody wins in this situation," Trawick said, outside Gus Thornhill's Funeral Home. "We just want to see the truth come to light."

Vera Washington, Johnston's sister-in-law, said she suspected police "were lying all the time. A woman that age would not be selling drugs."

The Rev. Markel Hutchins, who has acted as spokesman for the family, said Johnston's family is encouraged by the FBI's entry into the investigation of the Nov. 21 gun battle that left Johnston dead and three narcotics officers wounded.

"They had zero confidence before yesterday," Hutchins said. "Now their confidence is increased."

"Finally, the truth is coming out so that her name will not be seen in such a bad light," said family friend Carletta Sutton. "I think that a number of people expressed concern that her memory and her name has been sullied by the allegations that drugs have been sold from her house."

A neighbor of Johnston's, Utamu Onaje, said Johnston practiced holistic health and "didn't even take medications, let alone drugs.

"She should have been able to be safe in her hown house," Onaje said.

Johnston's funeral service drew about 100 people, including members of the New Black Panthers Party for Self-Defense and Atlanta City Council members C.T. Martin and Mary Norwood.

The Rev. Robert Melson offered words of comfort and encouragement as Johnston lay in a steel gray, closed casket topped with a spray of pink and white carnations mixed with baby's breath.

Melson prayed for justice and for God to bring peace to the souls of Johnston's family and friends.

"Sleep on mother," he said, referring to Johnston. "We love you, but God loves you best."

Kelly Hill, a young friend, described Johnston as " the strongest person I've ever known "and said she often spoke, as senior citizens sometime do, of being ready for death and that the time was near.

"I never thought I'd see her leave this earth the way that I did," said Hill during her emotional remarks at the service.

Atlanta police Chief Richard Pennington confirmed Monday that the informant now claims police asked him to lie about his role in an alleged drug buy that led to the shooting.

The informant, who has not been identified, complained to department officials that the drug investigators involved in the bust had asked him to go along with a story they concocted after the shooting, said Pennington. He said the informant had been placed in protective custody.

The informant told an Atlanta television station that the officers asked him to lie to provide them cover in the shooting.

Pennington confirmed the television station's account of what the informant had claimed and said it mirrored what the informant had told his internal affairs unit over the weekend.

"The informant said he had no knowledge of going into that house and purchasing drugs," Pennington said. "We don't know if he's telling the truth."

8 officers suspended with pay

All seven narcotics investigators and a sergeant have been suspended with pay pending the investigation, Pennington said. Their names were not made public.

"The complete truth will be known," Pennington said.

After nearly a week of unanswered questions prompted by the northwest Atlanta shooting of Johnston, the chief on Monday called for an unusual multi-agency review of the incident.

Pennington announced the investigation at a news conference that featured officials from the U.S. attorney's office, the FBI, the Georgia Bureau of Investigation and the Fulton district attorney's office.

David Nahmias, the U.S. attorney in Atlanta, said federal agents "come to this investigation with an open mind," but he cautioned that anyone who lies could face federal charges.

"No one should get in the way of the truth," Nahmias said.

Johnston was shot to death last Tuesday night as the drug investigators burst into her house at 933 Neal St. Johnston was shot twice in the chest by officers who have said that they were returning her fire.

The 88-year-old woman, whose age was previously reported as 92, wounded three of the officers with a rusty revolver her niece said she had bought her aunt for her protection. One officer was hit three times, including once in the center of his bulletproof vest, while the other two where shot once each. None of their wounds were life threatening.

Police officials have said the officers went to Johnston's small brick house after the informant purchased drugs there from a man identified only as "Sam." Police have obtained an arrest warrant for Sam.

In a court affidavit released Monday, Jason R. Smith, an Atlanta narcotics officer, said that the informant had used $50 of city money to buy crack cocaine from Sam at the Neal Street house. Smith, who could not be reached for comment Monday night, described the informant as a reliable source who has helped police make drug arrests in the past.

In the affidavit, Smith said Sam greeted the informant at the front door and spoke briefly to him on the porch. Sam disappeared into the house and reappeared with two bags of crack cocaine, which the informant later turned over to the officers, according to the affidavit. Smith's statement also said that the informant had alleged that Sam had installed surveillance cameras at the house and monitored them constantly.

Smith's affidavit was sufficient to persuade Fulton County Magistrate Kimberly Warden to sign a warrant allowing the officers to enter the house without knocking at the door. Smith asked for the special "no-knock" authorization because of the possibility that officers would be injured or evidence would be destroyed. Warden signed the warrant shortly before 6 p.m., about an hour before the shooting.

However, the informant has since denied to police and a local television station that he purchased the drugs. He also said there was no person named Sam.

The informant, who said he worked with Atlanta police for four years, also told WAGA-TV that he hadn't been to 933 Neal St. His identity hidden, he told the TV station that one of the drug officers called him soon after the shooting with instructions.

Quoting the officers, the informant told Fox 5 News: " 'This is what you need to do. You need to cover our [rear]. ... It's all on you man. ... You need to tell them about this Sam dude.' "

Pennington said investigators were trying to determine the truth. "I don't know if he went in or not," he said.

Many questions and conflicting accounts have surfaced since police shot the woman, described by neighbors as feeble and afraid to open her door after dark. At first police said that the drug buy was made by undercover police, but later they said the purchase was made by an informant. Early on, police said narcotics were found at the house after the shooting, but on Sunday investigators said they had found only a small amount of marijuana, which police don't consider a narcotic.

Also, even though the affidavit said that the house was outfitted with surveillance cameras, Pennington said the informant had told internal affairs investigators that police officers had asked him to lie about the cameras. Pennington could not confirm whether the cameras existed.

From the beginning, it has been unclear why police targeted the woman's house, and the affidavit and warrant documents shed little light. The documents do not suggest that police had been keeping the house under surveillance and provide no rationale for entering it other than the informant's alleged buy earlier in the afternoon. The raid did not produce the cocaine, money, computers and other equipment related to the drug business alleged in the affidavit. The documents listed the only resident as Sam, who was described as at least 6 feet tall and 250 to 260 pounds. Johnston's family said she lived alone.

Court officials initially refused to release the affidavits and search warrant even though state law requires that such records be made available immediately. The documents were made public Monday, nearly a week after the incident.

"There are many unanswered questions," said Pennington, who returned Sunday after being out of town for the Thanksgiving holiday when the shooting occurred.

Mayor Shirley Franklin, who has said little publicly about the shooting, said she had discussed the allegations with Pennington. Franklin said the chief has "my confidence that they will be transparent and honest and very thorough in their review. ..."

"I certainly share the concern that all of us have on the loss of life," Franklin said. "We were not expecting something like that could happen in the city of Atlanta."

Shootings By Police Spur Debate (USAT)

By Larry Copeland, Usa Today

USA Today, November 29, 2006

ATLANTA — An 88-year-old woman killed last week in a shootout with plainclothes police who burst into her home was laid to rest Tuesday amid a burgeoning national debate over police use of deadly force.

Kathryn Johnston was killed Nov. 21 when she fired at undercover narcotics agents who had obtained a "no-knock" search warrant for her home after telling a judge that a confidential informant had bought drugs there earlier in the day.

The FBI is leading a probe of the incident, in which Johnston wounded three officers, after the informant told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV that he never bought drugs at the house but that a narcotics officer had instructed him to say that he had. "I'm telling them, I never went to that house," he says in an interview in which his face was disguised.

Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington says the man, who has not been publicly identified, "told us he had no knowledge of going to that house and purchasing drugs. I don't know if he's telling the truth."

Seven narcotics investigators and a police sergeant have been placed on paid leave until the inquiry is completed, a routine procedure in such cases.

More than 200 people rallied in Johnston's northwest Atlanta neighborhood Tuesday evening to demand answers in the shooting, one of several that have put police use of deadly force under increased scrutiny.

In New York City early Saturday, Sean Bell, 23, was killed after he left a bachelor party at a strip club that was the target of an undercover police investigation. Police fired more than 50 shots at a car carrying Bell and two friends, both of whom were wounded.

NEW YORK SHOOTING: Bloomberg meets with family

The district attorney in DeKalb County, an Atlanta suburb where 12 people have been killed by police this year, says she may present evidence to a grand jury.

Rep. Cynthia McKinney, D-Ga., whose district includes DeKalb County, is seeking congressional hearings on police use of deadly force nationwide, according to a letter she sent to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and incoming House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich.

"While I support police officers in their efforts to combat crime, our citizens have become alarmingly frightened ... that some, if not most, of these police involved shootings may have been preventable," wrote McKinney, who is leaving office in January after losing a re-election bid.

Charles Steele, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, an Atlanta-based civil rights organization, called "for an evaluation of adequate and proper communication efforts by police departments nationwide. These senseless deaths ... must cease immediately."

Some criminal justice experts cautioned against over-reacting to the shootings.

"Police departments have become far more scrupulous in training and accountability and are recruiting people to try to minimize the number of police-involved shootings," says Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a think tank in Washington, D.C.

"There are much tighter controls on the use of force. Police departments have significantly narrowed the conditions under which police can use deadly force," he said.

He says there were 80 to 100 police-involved shooting fatalities a year in New York during the 1970s; in recent years, that has fallen to 10 to 15.

Robert J. Kane, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University in Boston who specializes in police authority and accountability, says the shootings by police stem from a more aggressive approach nationally to policing.

DOJ_NMG_0099540

"They come at a time when police officers are rapidly expanding the use of police paramilitary units and highly aggressive drug enforcement units," Kane says. "In the 1990s, you had a community policing movement. Police departments were encouraged to share some crime prevention responsibility with the public. Around 1996, you had this movement toward zero-tolerance strategies. ... A lot of cities are creating police paramilitary units. They drive around and look for trouble, and they often find trouble."

In Johnston's northwest Atlanta community, a gentrifying neighborhood that has pockets of crime and drug activity, neighbors say Johnston was not involved in anything illegal.

"That lady was no drug dealer," says Vickie Harris, 33, who has lived in the neighborhood for about eight years. Police, she says, "made a mistake. They ought to just admit it."

Police Shootings And New York: Lessons Learned (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK

Call it a tale of two shootings. In each, an unarmed black man is killed in New York in a hail of bullets fired by police, fearing, rightly or wrongly, for their lives.

But the different responses of city leaders to last weekend's shooting of Sean Bell in Queens and the 1999 death of Amadou Diallo in the Bronx tell a tale of a city's evolution and its ability to learn the importance of acknowledging a community's outrage and responding to it. Such a changed response is evident not just in New York, but in other cities across the country.

Almost as soon as Mayor Michael Bloomberg heard Saturday that police fired 50 times on three possibly unarmed black men, he began reaching out to political, religious, and community leaders, assuring them a full, fair investigation would take place. By Monday morning, the mayor, police commissioner, and dozens of black leaders - many still angry - came together at City Hall.

In the immediate aftermath of the 1999 death of Mr. Diallo, a West African immigrant shot in the entry to his apartment building, then-Mayor Rudolph Giuliani defiantly defended the police. He didn't meet with local black leaders until weeks later. Thousands of protesters poured into the streets, prompting more than 1,700 arrests.

"You learn from your errors," says Douglas Muzzio, a political analyst at the School of Public Affairs at Baruch College in New York. "The reaction reflects in part the mayor's personality and the police commissioner's professional personality, but they learned from what Giuliani did, and they're not going to make the same mistakes."

New York's reaction is emblematic of changes in community/police relations across the country. From Cincinnati to Atlanta to Los Angeles, police departments have realized they need the cooperation and support of minority communities - those that usually felt the brunt of the "get tough" crime initiatives of the 1990s. In each city, fumbled political reactions to a charge of police misconduct - whether it was the 1991 beating of Rodney King in Los Angeles or the 2001 shooting of a young black man in Cincinnati - have taught lessons about the importance of reaching out, urging calm, and dealing with nothing but the facts.

"There's now a more proactive, customer-service-oriented attitude and response in the aftermath of these incidents because police departments all over the country now understand their aggressive enforcement actions are typically felt disproportionately in the minority communities, and that further strains police/community relations," says Jack Riley, acting director of the Center on Quality Policing at the RAND Corp. in Pittsburgh. "With crime rates heading back up, the last thing you want to do is alienate a constituency you need to help keep crime level."

In New York, at a press conference with community leaders this week, Mayor Bloomberg remarked several times that no one was more "disturbed" than he and Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly by last Saturday's shooting. Mr. Bell and two friends were leaving a strip joint after a bachelor party when an undercover officer, who was part of a larger operation at the club, thought he heard one of Bell's group say, "Yo, go get my gun." When the officer approached the car, an altercation erupted and police started firing. It's unclear whether the officer identified himself as a policeman or what prompted the gunfire that killed Bell and wounded two others, one critically.

"To me, it is unacceptable and inexplicable how you have 50-odd shots fired, but that's for the investigation to find out what happened," says Bloomberg. "We will tell everyone everything we know when we know, and we will not speculate."

Bloomberg also said he did not believe the shooting was racially motivated. Two of the shooting victims were black, and one was Hispanic. Two of the officers involved were black, two were white, and one was Hispanic. All five have been suspended.

"This is a much better response than the Giuliani administration [to the Diallo shooting], much more open and much more direct," says City Councilman Leroy Comrie of Queens. "A lot of people in this city are uncomfortable with the police department and its tone on the streets, but so far I'm satisfied [that] the mayor and the police commissioner have done their utmost to provide as much detail as possible."

Most political analysts are applauding the city's response so far, but some say it's unfair to compare the way Mr. Giuliani and Bloomberg handled the two shootings. Giuliani, who defeated the city's first African-American mayor, had strained relations with the minority community from the start. In reforming the city's finances, he also took on its various interest groups, including those in the black community, according to political analyst Fred Siegel, author of "The Prince of the City: Giuliani, New York and the Genius of American Life." Finally, the Diallo incident occurred at a time when the mayor's personal and marital problems had become regular public fodder.

"The Diallo affair comes at the beginning of Giuliani's personal meltdown," says Mr. Siegel. "This isn't a criticism of Bloomberg. I just don't think it's a fair comparison."

Other analysts say the city is also different as a result of 9/11 and the work Bloomberg has done in repairing relations with the black and Hispanic communities. He's worked to keep lines of communication open on a regular basis.

"You can't just have people talking to each other at a time of crisis. There has to be a foundation for communication. Otherwise, you're just managing the consequences of the crisis," says Mr. Riley of RAND.

50 Shots (WSJ)

By Joseph D. Mcnamara

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Around 4 a.m. on Saturday, Nov. 25, several New York City police officers in plain clothes fired an estimated 50 shots at a car, wounding two black men and killing a third, 23-year-old Sean Bell. Some police bullets penetrated nearby homes. Although an undercover officer had called for back-up, indicating that the three suspects had a gun, no weapon was found in the aftermath.

Inescapably, comparisons were made between Mr. Bell (who was to have been married later on Saturday) and Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant killed in a volley of 41 bullets by four NYPD plainclothes officers in February 1999. Mr. Diallo had committed no crime and was attempting to enter his own hallway when one of the undercover officers yelled, "Gun!" The four officers were acquitted in a trial held outside the city, based upon their defense that they reasonably believed their lives were in danger.

In both cases, the NYPD accurately cited statistics indicating that it had a comparatively low shooting rate, and that shootings by police were not rising. And in both instances, New York's black leaders and black communities reacted with understandable outrage that unarmed black men were killed with such a volume of gunfire. Both sides seemed to be talking past one another, instead of to each other.

After the Diallo case, I wrote that I, my father, older brother and countless other relatives had collectively served the NYPD for more than a century and a half and that none of us would have fired at Mr. Diallo. I say the same about the lethal volley that took Mr. Bell's life, based on initial reports.

Simply put, the police culture in our country has changed. An emphasis on "officer safety" and paramilitary training pervades today's policing, in contrast to the older culture, which held that cops didn't shoot until they were about to be shot or stabbed. Police in large cities formerly carried revolvers holding six .38-caliber rounds. Nowadays, police carry semi-automatic pistols with 16 high-caliber rounds, shotguns and military assault rifles, weapons once relegated to SWAT teams facing extraordinary circumstances. Concern about such firepower in densely populated areas hitting innocent citizens has given way to an attitude that the police are fighting a war against drugs and crime and must be heavily armed.

Yes, police work is dangerous, and the police see a lot of violence. On the other hand, 51 officers were slain in the line of duty last year, out of some 700,000 to 800,000 American cops. That is far fewer than the police fatalities occurring when I patrolled New York's highest crime precincts, when the total number of cops in the country was half that of today. Each of these police deaths and numerous other police injuries is a tragedy and we owe support to those who protect us. On the other hand, this isn't Iraq. The need to give our officers what they require to protect themselves and us has to be balanced against the fact that the fundamental duty of the police is to protect human life and that law officers are only justified in taking a life as a last resort.

There appear to be important differences between the killings of Mr. Diallo and Mr. Bell. Mr. Diallo was no threat to anyone. First reports are that the car occupied by Mr. Bell deliberately struck an undercover officer after he had identified himself. In addition, it is clear that the current police commissioner and mayor have established much better relations with the black community than their predecessors. Both Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Commissioner Raymond Kelly have been as critical of the current shooting as permitted under due process. Yet when all is said and done, those with official responsibility to ensure that the innocent are protected, not harmed, by the police must constantly evaluate all police training, tactics, arms and attitudes.

L.A. Officers Cleared In Child's Killing (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

The police board says toddler Suzie Peña's death in a gun battle was the fault of her father, but mistakes were made.

The LAPD officers who stormed a South L.A. auto shop last year, killing 19-month-old hostage Suzie Peña during a gun battle with her father, followed department rules and should not be punished, the Police Commission ruled Tuesday.

But the oversight panel found problems in the way the Los Angeles Police Department field command responded and managed the crisis and singled out for potential discipline two officers who fired their weapons from the periphery very early in the 2 1/2 -hour siege.

"There was a systemic breakdown at the command and leadership level," Commission President John Mack said. "This incident is nothing short of tragic. It's tragic for all of us. The officers involved, and the community at large. It is a loss for Los Angeles and will be remembered as a sad and tragic day in our history."

One SWAT officer was wounded in the gun battle with Jose Raul Peña, who held his daughter in his arm as he repeatedly fired his gun at officers at his Watts car sales business in July 2005.

The commission announcement came hours after the district attorney cleared of criminal wrongdoing the 11 police officers who fired their weapons, even as the toddler's family and community activists demanded that the panel discipline the officers involved in the confrontation.

The commission announced its finding after a nine-hour, closed-door meeting with Police Chief William J. Bratton in which the panel unanimously backed all of his recommendations on which officers acted in and out of policy.

Mack and other panelists said the SWAT standoff highlighted shortcomings in the way the LAPD handles such incidents — including communications among elite units — that must be immediately addressed.

Specifically, the commission wants to hold commanders managing the scene more accountable for the actions of officers on the ground. The panel ordered Bratton in the future to review the actions of commanders with the same degree of detail that officers' actions receive.

Other reforms proposed include modifications for the use of urban police rifles and better training for officers as well as commanders and an examination of how to better storm a building in hostage situations.

Altogether, 13 officers, three sergeants and one lieutenant were ordered to undergo additional training because of concerns about their tactics during the incident.

The commission went out of its way to clear the handful of officers who actually stormed the building at the end of the standoff. In fact, the panel said many officers involved in the case "took courageous steps to defuse a frightening situation."

They noted that Suzie's father fired 15 of his 39 rounds at the officers in the final moments of the conflict while holding his daughter in his arms.

But they also found that two officers who fired and missed Peña from the periphery of the site near the beginning of the confrontation violated department policy in their tactics and the firing of their weapons.

Suzi's mother, Lorena Lopez, said afterward that she was disappointed that the officers involved in the final confrontation were not found to have violated policy.

"I did not get justice," Lopez said, adding that she would press ahead with her lawsuit "to get justice."

Bratton acknowledged the command and control concerns and said some officers will be disciplined and receive training as a result of failing to follow department policy on tactics and the use of force.

"This was not a good day for anybody," Bratton said. "It was a tragic day."

But, he added that officers did an "outstanding job" overall, given the chaotic situation.

"I want to commend the men and women of this department who in every instance of this incident behaved courageously, marching toward danger, every one of whose interest and intent was to save the life of the hostages," Bratton said.

His use of the word "outstanding" drew a sharp rebuke from Luis Carrillo, the attorney for Lopez.

"The police could have waited before storming in like cowboys," Carrillo told the chief and commission as he and the family stormed out of the meeting. "It was not an outstanding day when a baby died at the end of the day."

Hours earlier, the Los Angeles County district attorney's office announced that it had declined to file criminal charges against the officers involved in the standoff.

A report by that office found that the officers acted in defense of their own lives when they shot and killed Peña and "inadvertently hit with rounds" and killed Suzie, who was being used as a shield.

DOJ_NMG_0099543

In a 10-page letter, Deputy Dist. Atty. Renee S. Cartaya wrote that the 11 officers "acted lawfully in self-defense and in defense of others when they used deadly force against Jose Peña." Prosecutors noted that Peña was using cocaine, engaged in a series of gun battles and had become irrational and told police he was fictional gangster Tony Montana from the movie "Scarface."

Police commissioners and prosecutors were particularly affected by tapes of telephone conversations during the siege.

Peña told an officer by phone earlier, according to prosecutors, "I'm going to hell. Me and the baby will go to hell before I ever leave this baby with my wife."

A 15-month investigation was unable to determine which of the officers killed the child as they tried to rescue her from her father's arms.

Commissioners agreed with Bratton that ultimately, Jose Peña was responsible for the toddler's death.

According to the district's attorney's account, the final confrontation began about 6:20 p.m. after Peña cut off communications and appeared with a pistol in his waistband.

He was holding the child by a backdoor and refused an order to put her down.

Seeing Peña trying to draw his weapon, Officer Dennis O'Sullivan, positioned on top of an armored vehicle, fired at him, according to the report.

SWAT Officer Chester McMillion then ordered an emergency assault after seeing Peña flinch as if he had been struck.

Once inside, officers found that Peña had fled to an inner office. SWAT officers heard gunshots and saw bullets come through the wall of the office, the report said.

Deploying a flash-bang device, Officers Dan Sanchez, Eduardo Perez, William Casey and Robert Gallegos Jr. entered the office and a gun battle ensued. Sanchez was shot in the shoulder by Peña.

Seeing Peña slump behind the desk with the baby on his lap, an officer rushed forward to grab the child only to realize Suzie had been fatally wounded. Simultaneously, prosecutors said, Peña reached for his pistol and Perez and Gallegos shot him in the head.

The toddler's family disputed the district attorney's finding that the officers acted in self-defense.

"There were plenty of police officers. The SWAT team was there," said Suzie's sister Ilsy DePaz, who was rescued from the scene by police.

"I don't see how they were acting in defense," she said. "You don't shoot a flash-bang grenade into a small office and expect for a little baby to come out alive."

Man Pleads Guilty In Shrine Desecration (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - WEST BEND, Wis.-A 21-year-old man pleaded guilty Monday to desecrating one of Wisconsin's most popular religious shrines to commemorate "Satan's birthday."

Tyler Groth pleaded guilty to felony criminal damage to religious property, and could face up to a year and a half in jail when he is sentenced Jan. 11.

Groth and his 17-year-old cousin, David J. Groth, were accused of spraying paint on statues and spray painting a devil's face at several locations in June at the Basilica of Holy Hill, National Shrine of Mary, in Erin.

It was to commemorate the date 06-06-06, and Tyler Groth told investigators the date is "Satan's birthday." In the Bible, the Book of Revelation describes triple sixes as the mark of the Antichrist.

Groth agreed to plead guilty in exchange for the dismissal of two unrelated misdemeanor graffiti charges, his attorney said.

David Groth had pleaded no contest to the same charge. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 11.

Judge Orders Hearing On Voting Districts (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, November 29, 2006

OSCEOLA COUNTY -- - A federal judge who ruled that Osceola's countywide elections for commissioners violates the U.S. Voting Rights Act on Monday ordered a hearing in the case next week.

The announcement came just days after competing proposals by the county and the U.S. Department of Justice were submitted to the court.

U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell set aside two hours for the 2 p.m. hearing Dec. 7 at the federal courthouse in Orlando, 80 N. Hughey Ave. He had ruled that the current countywide system penalizes Hispanics in a "racially polarized" county.

DOJ_NMG_0099544

The Justice Department, which proposed single-member-district elections for all five commission seats, asked for the hearing with its filing Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors offered two options with slightly different district lines.

The county's attorneys proposed a plan that would have two commissioners elected at-large and five from single-member districts.

All three plans center on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside.

Both sides have disputed the other's methodology in drawing the districts to account for Osceola's exploding growth since the 2000 census.

Hispanics make up about a third of the county population, but only one has ever been elected to the commission, under single-member-district voting a decade ago.

Osceola has spent nearly $2 million in fees for attorneys and experts defending itself since the Justice Department sued last year.

Mark Pino, Henry Pierson Curtis, Christopher Sherman, Gary Taylor and Willoughby Mariano of the Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

Treasury Ordered To Make Bills Recognizable To Blind People (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-By keeping all currency bills the same size and texture, the U.S. government has denied blind people meaningful access to money, a federal judge said Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said the Treasury Department has violated the law, and he ordered the government to come up with ways for the blind to tell bills apart.

He said he wouldn't tell officials how to fix the problem, but he ordered them to begin working on it within 10 days. The American Council of the Blind has proposed several options, including printing bills of differing sizes, adding embossed dots or foil to the paper or using raised ink.

"Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations," Robertson wrote. "More than 100 of the other issuers vary their bills in size according to denomination, and every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired."

Government attorneys argued that forcing the Treasury Department to change the size of the bills or add texture would make it harder to prevent counterfeiting. Robertson was not swayed.

"The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, at least on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable," he wrote.

He said the government was violating the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability in government programs. The opinion came after a four-year legal fight.

"It's a landmark decision. I believe it will benefit millions of people," said Jeffrey A. Lovitky, attorney for plaintiffs in the lawsuit.

U.S. Currency Discriminates Against Blind, Judge Rules (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A federal judge here ruled on Tuesday that the government illegally discriminated against blind people by printing its paper currency on bills of the same size that could not be distinguished by touch.

The judge, James Robertson of Federal District Court, ordered the Treasury Department to start discussing within 30 days potential remedies, including different note sizes for different denominations and raised numerals and perforated dots on the bills.

“Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency,” Judge Robertson wrote, “only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations.”

The judge pointed out that euro notes came in bigger sizes for higher denominations and had raised numerals as well as foil patches in different shapes. Japanese notes have rough patches to help identify them by touch. Swiss francs feature intaglio printing and perforated numerals, and other countries use sequences of perforated dots.

“The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,” Judge Robertson wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0099545

The Treasury Department refused to comment on the decision or on whether it would appeal the order, which came after a four-year court fight between the government and the American Council of the Blind.

The Treasury Department had argued that making bills identifiable by touch would create an undue financial burden for the government. It had estimated that the most expensive approach — printing different sizes for different denominations — would cost $178 million for new printing presses and as much as $50 million for new plates.

Judge Robertson said that cost would be small compared with the $4.2 billion that the government spent on currency production in the past 10 years.

He also rejected as "utterly unpersuasive" government pleas that new tactile features might undermine the anticounterfeiting features. He also dismissed the government's argument that such features might undermine the greenback's international acceptance, saying, "This contention is not only not supported but, on its face, absurd."

Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and government affairs for the American Council of the Blind, said the decision addressed a constant problem for people with little or no eyesight.

Paper currency "is one of the biggest parts of everyday life, and we just don't have access to it," Ms. Al-Mohamed said. About 937,000 people in the United States are legally blind, and an additional 2.3 million people have "low vision" even when wearing corrective lenses.

The American Council of the Blind had argued that American paper currency was "inaccessible" to blind people and violated the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination in government programs against people with disabilities.

Judge Robertson said people with severely impaired vision were inherently vulnerable to being cheated if they had to depend on other people to distinguish among a $1 bill, a $20 bill or a $100 bill.

In 1995, he added, the National Academy of Sciences concluded that three features could be incorporated into American banknotes: distinctive sizes for each denomination; increasing the size and contrast of numerals; and varying the notes' colors to help people with limited vision.

In 1996, the government redesigned banknotes and added two features: one larger number at a slightly different height from the rest of the bill, and an infrared symbol to encourage the development of handheld currency readers for the blind.

Judge Robertson said those changes fell "well short" of what the National Academy of Sciences had recommended and were mainly intended to prevent counterfeiting.

Currency Changes Ordered To Help Blind (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the Treasury Department must change currencies -- potentially changing the size, shape or feel of each denomination -- so blind people can use them.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said that by making different denominations of bills the same size and shape, the government has violated the Rehabilitation Act and denied blind people a way to use money.

The judge did not provide a solution, but ordered Treasury to find one.

Government attorneys argued that adding texture or changing the size of bills would be costly and make it harder to prevent counterfeiting.

The American Council of the Blind, which filed the suit in 2002, proposed a number of solutions that are used in other countries.

In Britain, each denomination is a different size, said Melanie Brunson, the Washington association's executive director. In Canada, currency has a series of dots in its corners, differentiated by denomination. And other countries use different patterns of raised dots or lines.

"Our intent was to get Treasury to focus enough attention to incorporate those [ideas] or come up with something else to meet the needs of people who can't read them visually," Mrs. Brunson said.

About 937,000 Americans are legally blind, which means that their vision is no better than 20/200 when corrected.

Judge Robertson said that if other countries can print denominations that blind people can use without counterfeiting problems, then so can the United States.

The Treasury Department did not return calls for comment.

Government lawyers argued that changing the size of currency could cost up to $228 million in initial costs and $52 million annually to make currency in different sizes. The least expensive change, adding a raised numeral, would cost $45.5 million initially and $16 million annually. The government estimated it would have to spend another $70 million to $90 million in public education for any changes.

DOJ_NMG_0099546

"If additional savings could be gained by incorporating the new feature into a larger redesign, such as those that took place in 1996 or 2004, the total burden of adding such a feature would be even smaller," wrote Judge Robertson, who was appointed by President Clinton in 1994.

In 1996, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing began inserting color and larger faces on bills to prevent counterfeiting.

Blind people must ask other people for assistance, fold different denominations in different ways, or keep different denominations in separate parts of wallets or purses, putting them at risk of being cheated, the American Council of the Blind argued in court.

Members of Congress have proposed legislation changing the size and shape of currency, but it has never passed, Judge Robertson wrote in his opinion. The 1996 redesign of the $20 bill included a larger font to identify the $20, which helped people with reduced vision, but did not help blind people.

The judge found that the similarities among the bills is a violation of the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination in government programs on the basis of disability.

"We believe this is a very significant step," Mrs. Brunson said. "This is the first time a judge has ruled that a failure to provide means of identifying currency is a violation of the Rehabilitation Act."

The judge ordered a status conference in about 30 days.

Eight Face Charges In Boot-camp Death (TALLDEM)

By Stephen D. Price, FLORIDA CAPITAL BUREAU

Tallahassee Democrat, November 29, 2006

'Today is a good day for me,' says Martin Lee Anderson's mother

Eleven months after 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson died, a protest march on the state Capitol and complaints that the investigation took too long, State Attorney Mark Ober on Tuesday charged seven drill instructors and a nurse with felony aggravated manslaughter of a child in the teen's death.

For Anderson's parents the charges were late but an answer to their prayers.

"Today is a good day for me," said Anderson's mother, Gina Jones, unable to control her emotions. "I'm finally getting justice for my baby."

Gov. Jeb Bush, who spoke with Anderson's parents Tuesday, said he, too, was glad the investigation had concluded.

"In spite of, admittedly, my frustrations at the delays of this, I'm pleased that (State Attorney Mark Ober) did his job well," Bush said.

Charged are Henry Dickens, Charles Enfinger, Patrick Garrett, Raymond Hauck, Charles Helms Jr., Henry McFadden Jr., Kristin Schmidt and Joseph Walsh II, according to a filing by Ober.

If convicted, the defendants could receive up to 30 years in prison.

Late Tuesday, Ober said that all seven of the drill instructors had been arrested and booked at the Bay County jail. Officials expected to arrest the nurse, Schmidt, later in the evening.

Ober's charges said in part that the defendants "did cause the death of Martin Lee Anderson by culpable negligence, without lawful justification or excuse, by neglecting Martin Lee Anderson by failure or omission to provide Martin Lee Anderson with care, supervision or services necessary to maintain his physical or mental health."

Ober's nine-month investigation cleared higher-level officials. In a letter to Bush, Ober said Guy Tunnell, former director of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement; State Attorney Steve Meadows; Bay County Sheriff Frank McKeithen and Bay County Medical Examiner Dr. Charles Siebert, who performed the first autopsy on Anderson, had acted properly in the aftermath of Anderson's death.

Anderson, who was sent to the juvenile boot camp on a probation violation, collapsed during exercises at the boot camp Jan. 5 and died early the next day at Sacred Heart Hospital in Pensacola.

In a letter to Bush, Ober explained how Anderson fell during a running exercise and drill instructors grabbed him, held him by the arms, applied pressure-point applications and covered his mouth while forcing him to inhale ammonia.

A surveillance video of the incident showed drill instructors kicking and punching Anderson.

An autopsy done by Siebert concluded Anderson died from natural causes related to sickle-cell trait.

A second autopsy done by Hillsborough County Medical Examiner Dr. Vernard Adams found that Anderson died from suffocation by drill instructors who forced ammonia tablets into his nose while covering his mouth.

Anderson's death and video of his beating captured nationwide attention and calls in the state legislature to close all boot camps.

DOJ_NMG_0099547

Last spring, Bush signed the Martin Lee Anderson Act, which, among other things, would create "STAR" academies, or boot camps modeled after a program in Martin County that places more emphasis on juvenile prevention programs and follow-up counseling.

Anderson's parents have sued the Bay County Sheriff's Office; the Department of Juvenile Justice, which contracted with the sheriff's office to operate the camps; and the seven drill instructors who now have been charged in the boy's death, seeking more than $40 million in the wrongful-death suit.

The charges bring to an end an investigation many said was too long.

In April, college students staged a sit-in at the Capitol to protest the fact that no one had been charged. Thousands of protesters, including Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton, marched and rallied at the Capitol that same week, demanding arrests in Anderson's death.

Last week the state NAACP and the Black Caucus threatened to have a silent protest during the inauguration ceremony of Gov.-elect Charlie Crist if charges in Anderson's death had not been filed.

Ober said in a statement to Bush that his office had to review more than 20,000 pages of documents in the case and conducted a multitude of interviews of witnesses.

"In the pursuit of justice, we have conducted a thorough investigation and have ignored demands from those calling for a rush to judgment," the statement said.

In a meeting with Ober on Tuesday morning, Anderson's mother said the special prosecutor explained why the investigation took so long.

"I was impatient, but it was worth it," Jones said.

Ben Crump, Anderson's parents' attorney, called Ober "courageous" for filing the charges against the drill instructors and nurse. Since the investigation took so long, Crump said he and Anderson's parents began to doubt any charges would come.

"This aggravated manslaughter of a child equals, to us, humanity and justice for Martin Lee Anderson," Crump said. "Our faith was tested."

State Sen. Tony Hill, D-Jacksonville, said, "We, the members of the Black Caucus, can feel some relief knowing some justice has been brought to the family of Martin Lee Anderson."

Pam Bondi, spokesman for Ober's office, said all the defendants will be tried together and will be arraigned sometime in January.

In a press conference in front of the Leon County Courthouse on Tuesday, Ober said, referring to the charged drill instructors: "This conduct cannot and will not be tolerated in our society, and none of us are above the law."

When asked if the charges were a tough call, Ober said, "We make a lot of tough calls every day."

Anderson's parents said the months they've waited for charges in their son's death has caused many sleepless nights. On Tuesday morning, they said they felt relieved.

Anderson's father, Robert Anderson, said, "Tonight, I will get me some rest."

7 Guards, Nurse Charged In Death Of Teen At Florida Boot Camp (USAT/AP)

By Melissa Nelson, The Associated Press

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Case led to dismantling of military-style program

PENSACOLA, Fla. — Seven former guards at a juvenile boot camp were charged with aggravated manslaughter of a child Tuesday for the pummeling of a 14-year-old boy who later died. The action was caught on security videotape, and the case led to the dismantling of Florida's military-style detention system for young offenders.

Also charged was a nurse seen on the tape watching as guards repeatedly kneed and hit Martin Lee Anderson during a 30-minute scuffle on Jan. 5. Guards said the boy was uncooperative and had refused to participate in exercises.

The teen collapsed in the exercise yard at the camp in Panama City and died at a hospital the next day.

The death sparked protests at the state Capitol and led to a shake-up in Florida's criminal justice system and the resignation of Florida's top law enforcement officer.

If convicted, the former guards and the nurse could each get up to 30 years in prison. Bail was set at $25,000 apiece.

Nurse Kristin Anne Schmidt was expected to surrender Tuesday evening, said Pamela Bondi, a spokeswoman for special prosecutor Mark Ober.

Attorneys for three of the former guards — Charles Helms, Joseph Walsh and Raymond Hauck — said their clients denied any wrongdoing. Phone messages were left for lawyers representing Schmidt and two other former guards.

Anderson had been sent to the boot camp for violating probation in a theft case. Boot camps often use grueling exercise to instill discipline in juvenile delinquents.

DOJ_NMG_0099548

An initial autopsy found Anderson died of complications of sickle cell trait, a usually benign blood disorder. After cries of a coverup, a second autopsy was conducted by another medical examiner, and it concluded Anderson suffocated because of the actions of guards.

Vernard Adams, the doctor who did the second autopsy, said the suffocation was caused by hands covering the boy's mouth, as well as the "forced inhalation of ammonia fumes" that caused his vocal cords to spasm, blocking his airway.

The guards said in an incident report that they used ammonia capsules five times on Anderson to gain his cooperation.

"Today is a good day for me," said Gina Jones, Anderson's mother. "I'm finally getting justice for my baby."

Benjamin Crump, lawyer for the boy's parents, who have been demanding for months that the guards be charged with murder, said the videotape leaves no doubt the guards are guilty.

"You wouldn't do this to your dog," Crump said. "Stuffing ammonia tablets up his nose, pulling his neck back, covering his mouth."

In April, college students staged a two-day protest in Gov. Jeb Bush's office. Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton joined the students for a march on the state Capitol.

Florida Department of Law Enforcement chief Guy Tunnell, who started Bay County's boot camp when he was sheriff there, resigned after he compared Jackson to Jesse James and Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., to Osama bin Laden in an agency meeting. Bush signed a bill in May to replace the boot camps with programs that offer job training and counseling.

Va. Will Let Vt. Decide Visitation For Lesbian Parent (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 28 -- A Virginia appellate court sidestepped the issue of civil unions Tuesday in ruling that, because two former lesbian partners filed for their union in Vermont, that state's courts have jurisdiction in a custody battle.

The Court of Appeals of Virginia remanded the dispute between Janet Miller-Jenkins and Lisa Miller-Jenkins to a lower Virginia court and advised it to issue a new judgment recognizing Vermont's authority.

"By so holding, we do not address whether Virginia law recognizes or endorses same-sex unions entered into in another state or jurisdiction," the court wrote in its decision.

An attorney for Janet Miller-Jenkins called it a victory.

"This is exactly what we have been arguing since January of 2005 -- that the Virginia trial court had no business under either Virginia or federal law interfering with the decision of the Vermont family court," Joseph Price said.

Lisa Miller-Jenkins will continue to pursue the case, said her attorney, Erik Stanley.

The women were Virginia residents in 2000 when they traveled to Vermont to join in a civil union. Lisa Miller-Jenkins conceived a child through artificial insemination in 2001 while the couple were together, and a child, Isabella, was born the following April. They eventually moved to Vermont in August 2002.

In the fall of 2003, the women separated. After moving back to Virginia, Lisa Miller-Jenkins filed for a dissolution of their civil union, an action akin to a divorce, and sought custody of Isabella.

In June 2004, a Vermont family court granted Janet Miller-Jenkins visitation rights; that October, a Frederick County court issued a contradicting decision.

In August, the Vermont Supreme Court ruled that Vermont courts had exclusive jurisdiction in the custody battle, and on Tuesday, Virginia Appeals Judge Jere M.H. Willis Jr. agreed.

Lawyers Debate Why Blacks Lag At Major Firms (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Thanks to vigorous recruiting and pressure from corporate clients, black lawyers are well represented now among new associates at the nation's most prestigious law firms. But they remain far less likely to stay at the firms or to make partner than their white counterparts.

A recent study says grades help explain the gap. To ensure diversity among new associates, the study found, elite law firms hire minority lawyers with, on average, much lower grades than white ones. That may, the study says, set them up to fail.

The study, which was prepared by Richard H. Sander, a law professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, and was published in The North Carolina Law Review in July, has given rise to fierce and growing criticism in law review articles and in the legal press. In an opinion article in The National Law Journal this month, for instance, R. Bruce McClean, the chairman of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a major law firm, took issue with the study's "sweeping conclusions" but not its "detailed data analysis."

DOJ_NMG_0099549

James E. Coleman Jr., the first black lawyer to make partner at Wilmer Cutler & Pickering, a prestigious Washington law firm now known as WilmerHale, said Professor Sander was overemphasizing grades at the expense of other qualities like writing skills, temperament and the ability to analyze complex problems.

"I don't think you can do what he is trying to do, which is to use purely objective data to explain what is happening in law firms," said Professor Coleman, who now teaches law at Duke and is a co-author of a response to Professor Sander called "Is It Really All About the Grades?"

Achieving racial diversity at all levels is an urgent issue, law firms say, but they acknowledge that gains among new associates disappear by the time new partners are elected. "We've seen stagnation and even decline when it comes to race," said Meredith Moore, the director of the New York City Bar Association's diversity office.

The new study proposes an explanation. It found that the pool of black lawyers with excellent law-school grades is so small that firms must relax their standards if they are to have new associates who resemble the pool of new lawyers.

Professor Sander found that very few blacks graduated from top-30 law schools with high grades.

Yet grades, according to many hiring partners and law students, are a significant criterion in hiring decisions, rivaled only by the prestige of the law school in question. For instance, Professor Sander found, "white law school graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.5 or higher are nearly 20 times as likely to be working for a large law firm as are white graduates with G.P.A.'s of 3.0 or lower."

The story for black students appears to be different. Black students, who make up 1 to 2 percent of students with high grades (meaning a grade point average in the top half of the class) make up 8 percent of corporate law firm hires, Professor Sander found. "Blacks are far more likely to be working at large firms than are other new lawyers with similar credentials," he said.

But black lawyers, the study found, are about one-fourth as likely to make partner as white lawyers from the same entering class of associates.

Professor Coleman attributed that largely to law firms' failure to provide minority associates with mentoring, encouragement and good assignments. "It's such a high-pressure place that places so much emphasis on getting it right that a young associate easily loses confidence," he said. "But to succeed you have to take risks."

No one disputes that firms are failing to retain and promote most of the minority lawyers they hired, at salaries that can start at $135,000.

"Black and Hispanic attrition at corporate firms is devastatingly high," Professor Sander wrote, "with blacks from their first year onwards leaving firms at two to three times the rate of whites. By the time partnership decisions roll around, black and Hispanic pools at corporate firms are tiny."

Less prestigious firms are much less likely to hire minority lawyers with substantially lower grades than white lawyers, Professor Sander said in an interview.

"Black associates report experiences at small firms — in mentoring, job responsibility and contact with partners — that are generally indistinguishable from the experiences reported by white associates," Professor Sander said. Those experiences suggest that minority lawyers at small firms have a good shot at partnership, but Professor Sander said he did not have direct evidence on that point.

Critics generally concede the raw numbers. But they offer different reasons for the gap between hiring and promotion. Some point to old-fashioned racism. Others say that firms act institutionally in hiring but leave work assignments to individual partners. Those partners often provide poor training, rote assignments and little mentoring to minority lawyers.

That should be unsurprising given the credentials gap, said Roger Clegg, president of the Center for Equal Opportunity, which opposes hiring preferences based on race.

"If everyone in the law firms knows you're hiring according to a double standard, you actually may end up compromising the confidence that partners and others have in the ability of people hired on the basis of preference," Mr. Clegg added. "It actually reinforces stereotypes."

The experience of white female associates provides a series of contrasts. Women at large firms have slightly better grades than men, yet they are also underrepresented in classes of new partners. But women do not report the absence of mentoring and choice assignments that minority associates do.

"Strikingly, women's self-reported work experiences — in terms of mentoring, level of responsibility and access to partners — are positive and indistinguishable from the self-reports of white men," Professor Sander said. "Consistent with this picture, white women's attrition rates as entering and midlevel associates are nearly as low as those of white men."

Associates typically work for about eight years before being considered for partnership. "As women of all races approach the seventh year of their tenure, and contemplate the compatibility of big-firm partnership with their family and quality-of-life goals," Professor Sander said, "many women pull out of the running for partners and seek out less demanding jobs."

Though many supporters of affirmative action question Professor Sander's conclusions, most academic experts say his empirical work is sound.

"He makes a good case," said Kenneth G. Dau-Schmidt, an authority on the economic analysis of legal problems at the Indiana University School of Law. "What the data tells him is that there's a mismatch going on and it's hurting black students."

In their response to the Sander study, Professor Coleman and Mitu Gulati, another law professor at Duke, wrote that the Sander paper would aggravate the problem it described.

"The harm of the Sander article," the two professors wrote, "is that it will contribute to the stereotyping that already undermines the success of black associates in elite corporate law firms."

Stephen F. Hanlon, a partner with Holland & Knight, a national law firm, said the Sander study overlooked a positive reason for high attrition rates among minority lawyers. Female and minority lawyers, he said, are often hired away from law firms by corporate law departments, and that will have an impact over time.

"We have trained a very bright generation of women and minority lawyers who have gone to our corporate clients and who now decide whether to hire us," Mr. Hanlon said.

Supporters of affirmative action acknowledge that trend, and add that high rates of minority attrition should be unsurprising given the grinding, mercenary culture of most law firms.

"Minorities, when they look at management structures and see that so few make it, they probably give up," said Veta T. Richardson, the executive director of the Minority Corporate Counsel Association.

Even Professor Sander's critics say he has started an important discussion.

"We have done our share of stone throwing," Professor Coleman and Professor Gulati wrote in their response, "but that should not take away from the fact that Professor Sander has identified a real problem that needs serious study, and that his study has added considerably to the limited body of available, public research, even though his conclusions are, at best, premature."

ANTITRUST:

Court Allows U.S. Suit Vs. Realtors To Proceed (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, MarketWatch

Market Watch, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A federal court in Chicago has allowed the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors to proceed, the department said Tuesday.

The court rejected the association's argument that last-minute changes to its policies prevented judicial scrutiny, the department said.

In denying the association's motion to dismiss the case, the court said that "NAR has failed ... to demonstrate that this case should be dismissed at the outset," according to the Justice Department.

In September 2005 the department's antitrust division filed a lawsuit charging that NAR rules limit competition from real-estate brokers who use the Internet to serve their customers. The lawsuit alleged that the association's policy threatened to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.

The Realtors association denies it discriminates against discount brokers or others who use the Internet to compete with conventional brokers.

Listings Lawsuit OK'd (BSUN/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Baltimore Sun, November 29, 2006

The National Association of Realtors lost a bid to dismiss a U.S. government antitrust lawsuit challenging its limits on access to multiple listings by consumers who use lower-cost Internet brokers.

The ruling by a federal judge in Chicago lets the Justice Department proceed to pretrial fact-finding to try to prove that the Realtors and member brokers engaged in an "ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy" to restrain competition.

U.S. District Judge Mark R. Filip rejected the Realtors' argument that the government had no case after the trade association in May 2005 changed the policy that limited online access to listings by customers of brokers who operate "virtual office Web sites."

The Realtors' "contention that the United States has failed even to plead a claim is unpersuasive," Filip wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0099551

The trade association "and its members have entered into a collective action that purports to regulate how they will compete in the marketplace," the judge said.

The government's complaint, filed in September 2005, said the Realtors' rules limited competition by preventing customers of online brokers from receiving full access to multiple listings. The Realtors' policy lets traditional brokers block competitors from having full online access to multiple listings.

The Chicago-based Realtors' group changed its policy after the Justice Department said it planned to sue to challenge the rules as anticompetitive, according to Filip's opinion. The modified policy still contains features that the government claims are anticompetitive, the judge wrote.

The government has argued that the original policy had "enduring effects" in some markets and that the modified rules have "not eliminated all effects," Filip wrote.

"We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to presenting our case at trial," J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy attorney general for antitrust, said in a statement released by the Justice Department.

Steve Cook, a Washington-based spokesman for the trade association, said the ruling "was very much expected and we are confident we can win on the merits of the case."

Filip, who was appointed to the federal bench in 2004 by President Bush, announced his ruling from the bench in September and released the opinion outlining his reasons late yesterday, Cook said.

Court Issues Opinion Related To DOJ Vs. NAR Lawsuit (INMAN)

Judge explains rejection of attempt to dismiss case

U.S. District Court Judge Mark Filip, in a 29-page opinion released Monday, offered a detailed explanation on why he earlier rejected a motion by the National Association of Realtors trade group to dismiss an antitrust complaint brought by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Filip last month denied the Realtor group's motion to dismiss the lawsuit, which was filed in September 2005 and amended in October 2005. The lawsuit alleges that the trade group's policies governing the online display and sharing of property information are overly restrictive and can harm consumers and stifle innovation.

The National Association of Realtors in December filed the motion in U.S. District Court in Chicago in an attempt to toss out parts of the lawsuit that target the association's former online listings policy, known as the Virtual Office Website (VOW) policy and so-called "opt-out" provisions of its policies that allow brokers to withhold online listings from other brokers.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said there "were no surprises" in the judge's opinion. The rules of the court dictate that the judge must assume that the allegations brought by the Justice Department are true in weighing the association's motion, Janik said -- the lawsuit has not yet reached the trial phase and both sides are still gathering evidence.

"He was very careful in his wording. I didn't view anything he had sent out as significant (to the overall case)," she added. "We knew it was a long shot but we thought it was worth making. The sooner we can end this litigation, the better."

J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement, "We are pleased that the court has allowed the lawsuit to proceed and we look forward to representing our case at trial. The (division) is committed to preserving competition in this vital sector of our nation's economy."

While the Realtor group announced the withdrawal of its VOW rules and the adoption of modified Internet listings rules after receiving notice that the Justice Department intended to file the lawsuit, Filip said in his opinion that Justice Department is entitled to proceed with its case against both the old policy and the modified policy, the Internet Listings Display (ILD) policy.

The Justice Department has alleged that the VOW and ILD policies are part of a "single, ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy," according to the opinion, and that the "two policies are part of a continuing conspiracy among NAR and its member brokers to restrain competition from VOW brokers." NAR has argued that there is no ongoing conspiracy because the modified policy replaced the old policy, though the Justice Department alleged that the two policies have "a common purpose driven by a common motive -- to restrain the competitive threat posed by Internet-based brokerages."

The court found that the Justice Department's allegations provided sufficient basis for both policies to be included in the lawsuit, as it has argued that "the allegedly anti-competitive effects which flowed from adoption of the initial VOW policy have had enduring effects, at least in certain markets, such that ... the modified VOW policy ... has not eliminated all the effects of the initial VOW policy."

Russ Cofano, a Seattle-based lawyer who has represented real estate industry clients and ran a real estate technology company, said he thought it was interesting to read the judge's statement that the court could choose a remedy for proven anti-competitive practices that "can go beyond the prohibition of those practices which ... were found to constitute the illegal conduct." The court also stated that the alleged "effects of the initial VOW, and the ways by which it allegedly would impair competitive forces and incentives in relevant markets, cannot be cabined from this case at the outset, as (NAR) apparently desires."

Cofano said, "The court is basically saying that relief to the United States -- in a claim like this -- is not limited only to stopping a policy. It can go well beyond that." If the Justice Department is able to prove its allegations, Cofano said that potentially opens up the door to a range of actions that the judge could take, he said. "That creates an unknown risk for NAR as to what the relief might be" if the Justice Department can prove its case, Cofano said.

He also stated that it was "strategically the right thing to do" for the Realtor association to ask the judge to dismiss aspects of the Justice Department's complaint. "I think the court has given them insight," he said. "I would presume (NAR officials) are reading this very carefully. Some of the language in the opinion certainly is instructive."

The judge's opinion states that the Realtor group's original VOW policy is relevant because "issues about the intent of the NAR in passing it will potentially help to illuminate (NAR's) intent generally as either benign or improper." The opinion also noted the potential for NAR to reinstate the original VOW as a justification for not tossing out provisions of the Justice Department complaint.

The Justice Department has alleged that members of an NAR working group for VOW policy wrote that aspects of the policy "would be 'abused beyond belief,' with traditional brokers selectively withholding listings from particular VOW-based competitors," and that the chairman of the working group "took comfort in the fact that the rule did not require brokers to disclose to clients that their listings would be withheld from some prospective purchasers as a result of the brokers' opt-out decision, thus providing brokers 'flexibility without conversation,' " court documents state.

In his opinion, Filip stated that the Justice Department has "alleged substantial concrete evidence that, if credited and true, could be understood to reflect that the new VOW policies were developed and utilized with anti-competitive animus, as well as with a recognition that the VOW policies would harm American consumers." Janik said that the association denies that there was any animus -- or willful antitrust violations -- in adopting the policies.

About 200 Realtor boards implemented the Realtor association's original VOW policy, the Justice Department has alleged. The association has advised that local boards do not adopt controversial provisions of the VOW policy and that the boards do not adopt the ILD policy.

While the modified VOW policy provides a so-called "blanket opt-out" provision that allows a broker to withhold online listings from other MLS participants provided that the broker does not display the other participants' listings, the judge's opinion states that NAR "does not meaningfully challenge" the Justice Department's facts "that the opt-out is of more detriment to a VOW broker than to a broker that does not use a Web site to deliver listings to a client, or that the opt-out undermines brokers who have a referral-based business model."

Robert D. Butters, a lawyer for Arnstein & Lehr LLP in Chicago who has represented real estate brokerages, technology companies and MLSs, said that the potential for the Justice Department to present evidence for anti-competitive intent in NAR's adoption of the original online listings policy "is particularly threatening in my view for NAR's subsequent defense of the case."

The Justice Department spent two years investigating the original VOW policy, and Butters said the evidence that the Justice Department has introduced already "could just be the tip of the iceberg."

Butters also said that the judge's opinion "didn't draw much distinction between the blanket and selective opt-out" provisions in the ILD and VOW policies. The original VOW policy approved in 2003 provided a selective opt-out provision that allowed participating brokers to pick and choose which brokers they would share their listings with, while the modified VOW policy -- also known as the ILD policy -- provided a blanket opt-out provision requiring that brokers who withhold listings from other participants cannot show those participants' listings on their own Web sites.

"The court pretty much treated the opt-out issue as a singular issue," in the opinion, Butters said.

The judge's opinion states, "Underlying (NAR's) argument is an assumption that the 'blanket' opt-out imposes higher costs on the broker deciding to opt-out, and thus it is less likely to be used than the selective opt-out," and adds that the Justice Department's allegations do not "depend upon a 'selective' or 'targeted' opt-out right."

"This judge clearly gets it," Butters said. "He understands how VOWs operate and the potential they have for making the marketing process far more efficient and consumer-friendly. He clearly comprehends that."

Supreme Court Justices Hear Weyerhaeuser Logging Case (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Supreme Court on Tuesday questioned whether forest products giant Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller competitor out of business by paying too much for logs that Weyerhaeuser allegedly didn't need.

DOJ_NMG_0099553

The case focuses on the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest and pits a defunct company, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., against Weyerhaeuser and the Bush administration.

Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to Ross-Simmons stemming from a jury verdict that found the larger company had violated federal antitrust law.

Ross-Simmons accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder sawlogs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills.

Arguments before the Supreme Court Tuesday turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty.

Companies often attack competitors by selling products at a lower price, benefiting consumers in the short term. A high legal standard must be met for a company engaging in such conduct to be found to have acted illegally. But there is no such apparent benefit in the Weyerhaeuser case. Isn't that a reason not to apply the elevated standard? asked Chief Justice John Roberts.

"We don't think so," replied Andrew Pincus, representing Weyerhaeuser. Pincus pointed out that buying at a higher price in this instance would benefit the sellers supplying logs to Weyerhaeuser.

Kannon Shanmugam, a Justice Department lawyer from the solicitor general's office, suggested that Weyerhaeuser's conduct may well have been helpful to the marketplace.

"Aggressive bidding no less than price-cutting is usually pro-competitive," Shanmugam told the justices.

Justice Antonin Scalia suggested Weyerhaeuser's conduct might make perfect sense - paying more to ensure that its mills had an adequate supply of logs.

That prompted Justice David Souter to interject that those circumstances apparently aren't present in this case. Evidence presented by Ross-Simmons, Souter said, is that the supply of logs was limited.

Supreme Court Hears Sawmill Suit (SEAPI)

By JENNIFER A. DLOUHY, HEARST NEWSPAPERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The lawyer for a now-defunct sawmill told the U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday that timber giant Weyerhaeuser Co. broke federal antitrust laws by overpaying for more logs than it needed and then cutting its prices on the finished lumber used to make guitars and furniture.

The strategy drove the smaller timber processor, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., out of business at the same time it allowed Weyerhaeuser to strengthen its foothold in the Pacific Northwest alder saw-log market, said the lawyer, Michael Haglund.

"Weyerhaeuser artificially increased the log market above where it otherwise would have been," Haglund said. "We have a situation where they warehoused large -- unprecedentedly high -- volumes of lumber because they" wanted to keep it out of competitors' hands.

Ross-Simmons now wants Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser to pay nearly $80 million in damages for the business tactics, which it says were part of a ploy to monopolize the market. The Longview-based sawmill says Weyerhaeuser's tactics forced it out of business in 2001 by driving prices for saw logs higher than it could afford and by depleting the supply of the trees.

The price of alder saw logs and that of finished lumber made from the material are usually tied together. But from 1998 to 2001, Ross-Simmons argued in court filings, the price of saw logs rose even as the price of finished lumber dropped.

In its defense, Weyerhaeuser contends it was only making smart business decisions and could afford to pay more for the logs because it was more efficient at processing the wood.

The two lumber mills are feuding over the appropriate legal standard for determining when buying practices are predatory, and therefore a violation of federal antitrust laws.

A federal district court in Portland ruled in favor of Ross-Simmons and said the lumber company did not have to prove Weyerhaeuser took a financial loss to prevail. Instead, the district court found, it was enough that Ross-Simmons proved in court that Weyerhaeuser had decided to cut its profit margin on finished lumber made from alder saw logs.

Ross-Simmons won a verdict of $78 million, an award that was affirmed by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said Weyerhaeuser had intended to monopolize the alder saw-log market in the Pacific Northwest.

Weyerhaeuser appealed to the Supreme Court. The company has the backing of the Bush administration, which says aggressive buying tactics make for good business competition by ensuring that companies have access to enough raw materials to manufacture more products.

Businesses far outside the Pacific Northwest are watching the case because it will force the justices to draw the line between savvy business strategies and illegal anti-competitive behavior.

Tactics that may appear underhanded may simply be aggressive -- but legal -- business competition, said Andrew Pincus, Weyerhaeuser's lawyer.

"It's very hard to distinguish ... between hard-fought competition and anti-competitive intent," Pincus said. "Increasing the prices that are paid for inputs -- like lowering sales prices -- is a mechanism by which a firm competes. It's a result that we would expect from a buyer's ordinary competitive instincts."

Chief Justice John Roberts noted that while predatory selling can benefit consumers by lowering prices, predatory buying does not help them. Given that, Roberts asked, shouldn't predatory buying be judged by a looser standard?

Justice John Paul Stevens seemed concerned that a ruling for Weyerhaeuser would mean an end to cases in which there is clear evidence -- such as internal company memos -- that a business paid more for raw materials as part of a ploy to drive a competitor out of business.

In the absence of evidence, Justices Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg wondered how to judge what motivates a company's buying practices.

"If you're trying to decide whether people are hogging goods unnecessarily for bad purposes or (are) storing up nuts for winter for good purposes, then a very good key to that is (whether) these people expect in the long run to make money out of this," Breyer said.

The Supreme Court is expected to rule on the case by July. The case is Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons, 05-381.

Judge Issues Restraining Order in Bay Area Newspaper Sale

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- A previously undisclosed internal memo prompted a federal judge Tuesday to temporarily block the consolidation of some of the San Francisco Chronicle's business operations with those of rival newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc.

Denver-based MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from Hearst Corp., owner of the Chronicle.

In July, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston let the deal go through, ruling against an antitrust lawsuit that claimed the deal would create a monopoly on readership and advertising in the region.

But in issuing Tuesday's restraining order, she said a memo had recently surfaced showing Hearst had an undisclosed motive for investing in the deal -- to consolidate its Bay Area advertising and distribution operations with those of the Chronicle's competitors -- a possible antitrust violation.

"Such agreements would alter the court's analysis of this case as a whole," Illston wrote, and would "increase the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anticompetitive, and illegal."

Illston said she previously "accepted defendants' representations that Hearst's involvement in the transactions was solely that of a passive equity investor."

"Though defendants offered no explanation why Hearst was willing to help finance an acquisition that would only make its competition stronger, the court did not understand that Hearst expected, or would later receive, any quid pro quo," the judge wrote.

The April 26 letter is from Hearst Senior Vice President James Asher to Joseph Lodovic, president of MediaNews.

"The Hearst Corporation and MediaNews Group, Inc. agree that they shall negotiate in good faith agreements to offer national advertising and Internet advertising sales for their San Francisco Bay area newspapers on a joint basis," it reads, "and to consolidate the San Francisco Bay area distribution networks of such newspapers."

Lodovic said Tuesday that there has been no further dialogue between the two companies about shared advertising or distribution.

"So she basically issued an order that has no immediate effect whatsoever," he said. "There is nothing planned."

Paul Luthringer, a spokesman for New York-based Hearst, said the publisher had no comment.

Illston was skeptical the two companies haven't been working together behind the scenes, saying in her ruling that "the parties have engaged in more than just an abstract agreement to negotiate at some later date."

MediaNews and Hearst last week joined forces as part of a newspaper industry consortium that will try to generate more online advertising revenue by working with Yahoo Inc., the Internet's most trafficked site. William Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive and chairman-elect of The Associated Press, played an instrumental role in forming the alliance involving more than 150 dailies in 38 states.

Illston said the "Yahoo Internet advertising deal announced recently suggests that Hearst and MediaNews have made significant progress towards cooperative deals somewhat similar to those discussed in the letter."

San Francisco real estate magnate Clint Reilly filed the antitrust lawsuit seeking to block McClatchy's sale of the Bay Area papers to MediaNews. His laywer, Joseph Alioto, said he recently discovered the memo on cooperation while scouring boxes of documents in the case.

"It's not just a smoking gun," Alioto said. "It's a picture of the bullet coming out of the nozzle."

Peter Scheer, executive director of the California First Amendment Coalition, speculated that Illston will eventually issue a permanent order blocking MediaNews and Hearst from cooperating in the ways the April 26 letter discusses.

"If that's the $64,000 question, the $65,000 question is: Does Hearst want to be in the deal with MediaNews and does MediaNews want to be in with Hearst if they are barred by the judge from cooperating in those ways?" Scheer said.

Reilly, a former San Francisco mayoral candidate, unsuccessfully sued to block the 2000 sale of the Chronicle to the Hearst Corp.

Hearst paid $660 million for the Chronicle. But to assuage antitrust concerns, it gave away its flagship San Francisco Examiner and subsidized the Examiner's new owners with $66 million over three years. The Examiner survived as a free daily tabloid.

Illston said Reilly's antitrust case will go to trial sometime in April 2007.

Sacramento-based McClatchy got the newspapers targeted in Reilly's suit as part of its $4 billion acquisition of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc.

McClatchy subsequently struck deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's former 32 daily papers for $2 billion.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Judge Restrains Advertising Deals Between Bay Area Newspaper Companies (ALAMTS)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Alameda (CA) Times-Star, November 29, 2006

A federal judge issued a temporary restraining order Tuesday to keep the Bay Area's two major newspaper companies from inking deals to consolidate their national advertising sales and distribution operations.

Evidence of talks between MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. -- the San Francisco Chronicle's owner, and a party to MediaNews' recent purchase of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times -- raises the specter of antitrust violations, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston of San Francisco wrote in Tuesday's order.

She'll hold a hearing Dec. 6 on whether her order should become a preliminary injunction, barring any such deals at least until a lawsuit challenging MediaNews' acquisitions goes to trial in April.

Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. this year bought the now-defunct Knight Ridder Corp.'s 32 newspapers for $6.5 billion. From among those, the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times were then sold for $736.8 million to Denver-based MediaNews Group -- which also owns this newspaper -- and the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press were sold for $263.2 million to New York City-based Hearst Corp.

In a separate, simultaneous pact, Hearst agreed to give the St. Paul and Monterey papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-Bay Area assets.

San Francisco businessman, political consultant and former mayoral candidate Clint Reilly sued July 14 to halt the deal, claiming it would create a Bay Area newspaper monopoly with higher subscription and advertising rates and diminished journalistic quality, jobs and union contracts.

Illston refused his initial plea for a TRO to prevent the sale's closing, but Reilly went back to her last week with new evidence found among documents provided by the newspaper companies.

An April 26 letter from Hearst Senior Vice President James Asher to MediaNews President Jody Lodovic IV said the two companies "shall negotiate in good faith agreements to offer national advertising and Internet advertising sales for their San Francisco Bay area newspapers on a joint basis, and to consolidate the San Francisco Bay area distribution networks of such newspapers." The letter also said they would jointly seek a deal with online classified advertising companies.

Illston wrote Tuesday that this "casts serious doubt on several key findings underlying" her July ruling.

She had taken the companies at their word that Hearst's involvement was solely that of a passive equity investor, but the April 26 letter now suggests "Hearst's investment was specifically tied to an agreement by MediaNews to limit its competition with Hearst in certain ways" -- a quid pro quo for Hearst's help in MediaNews' purchase of the newspapers.

The judge wrote she's no longer sure the Chronicle is a strong competitor for MediaNews' papers: "The principal source of revenue for newspapers is advertising. The principal costs presumably include distribution and printing. The April 26 letter suggests, at the very least, an intent to limit some aspects of competition between Hearst and MediaNews in advertising and distribution."

The companies "have engaged in more than just an abstract agreement to negotiate at some later date," Illston wrote; these and other companies' recent announcement of an Internet advertising deal with Yahoo! "suggests that Hearst and MediaNews have made significant progress towards cooperative deals somewhat similar to those discussed in the letter."

If a Bay Area-wide ad buy becomes national advertisers' only option, "the agreement might well be per se illegal," she wrote. Having one geographic market's only two "competitors" in cahoots "would raise a significant risk of price manipulation." And colluding on distribution to cut costs "also may raise barriers to entry by other competitors," she added.

MediaNews President Jody Lodovic IV said Tuesday's order means little because "nothing was being planned as relates to those things outlined in the letter... Quite frankly, there has been no further discussions since that time and there's nothing imminent."

"This is not the real battle here -- the real battle is what happens at trial in April," he added.

A Hearst Corp. spokesman declined comment Tuesday.

Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, called Tuesday's order "a strong statement by the court, and we think it's the beginning." He said he expects that as Hearst and MediaNews executives give depositions in December and January, "this house of cards is going to crumble... This concealed, secret, clandestine agreement was the knot that held this whole thing together."

Restraining Order In Sale Of Bay Area Papers (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, November 29, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge issued an order today temporarily prohibiting the owner of The Chronicle from collaborating with the owner of the San Jose Mercury News and other Bay Area newspapers in local distribution and national advertising sales, saying the proposed agreement might be monopolistic.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston denied a request to halt further consolidation of operations at the Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times by their new owner, MediaNews Corp., while she considers the legality of the firm's purchase of the newspapers. But in a temporary restraining order that barred joint distribution and ad sales by MediaNews and Hearst Corp., Illston said newly disclosed evidence of the proposed collaboration between the companies has increased "the likelihood that the transactions at issue here were anti-competitive and illegal."

The judge said she "is not convinced that an agreement between the only two competitors in a market, to share distribution networks, does not raise serious competitive questions."

The restraining order will be in effect until a Dec. 6 hearing on an injunction that would keep the ban in place until April 30. That is when a lawsuit by Clint Reilly, a real estate investor, former political consultant and onetime San Francisco mayoral candidate, is scheduled to go to trial.

Reilly is seeking to block MediaNews' purchase of the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, arguing that the deal, combined with MediaNews' financial arrangement with Hearst, would create a newspaper monopoly in the Bay Area.

Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said today's ruling could be the first step toward upsetting MediaNews' purchase.

"This agreement (on distribution and advertising) was the knot that ties the whole package together, and when this unravels, the whole package unravels," Alioto said.

"They're trying to monopolize the entire Bay Area," Alioto said of MediaNews and Hearst. They did it secretly ... and they got caught."

MediaNews President Jody Lodovic said the ruling would have little impact because the companies had no immediate plans to collaborate on advertising or distribution, and hadn't even discussed the subject since the proposal was outlined in an April 26 letter from a Hearst executive. He said the idea hadn't been discarded, but "there's no urgency to anything."

"To the extent that it makes sense to do some things like joint distribution, we will explore it," Lodovic said. But he noted that the letter, which Illston quoted in today's ruling, contained the stipulation that any arrangements between the companies would follow the law.

Hearst spokesman Paul Luthringer declined to comment on the ruling.

MediaNews, which already owned the Oakland Tribune, Hayward Daily Review, Marin Independent Journal, San Mateo County Times and other Bay Area dailies, bought the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Corp. this summer for $736.8 million. McClatchy had acquired the newspapers in March as part of its purchase of the Knight Ridder chain.

Hearst, which owns The Chronicle and 11 other newspapers, put up $263 million to acquire two other McClatchy papers, the Monterey County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press, which it agreed to transfer to MediaNews. In exchange,

Hearst gets a share in MediaNews papers outside the Bay Area. That share was not revealed at the time, but Illston said today it was 30 percent.

In July, Illston denied a request by Reilly to block the MediaNews purchase while she considered his antitrust suit. Reilly renewed his request for a restraining order after learning of the proposed collaboration in advertising and distribution.

The previously sealed April 26 letter, sent by Hearst senior vice president James Asher to Lodovic and signed by both men, contained an agreement to negotiate plans to consolidate the companies' Bay Area distribution networks and jointly offer national advertising and Internet ad sales.

Illston said the letter "casts serious doubt on several key findings" that were the basis for her July order refusing to block the transactions.

She cited the two companies' assertion that Hearst was merely a passive investor in MediaNews. The judge noted that Hearst had not explained why it was willing to help finance an acquisition that would strengthen its competitor, and said the April 26 letter "suggests, at the very least, that Hearst's investment was specifically tied to an agreement by MediaNews to limit its competition with Hearst in certain ways."

At the same time, she said, the letter indicates that The Chronicle may not continue to be a strong source of competition for the other Bay Area newspapers, as she assumed in her earlier ruling.

In addition, Illston said, if national advertisers who wanted to place ads in any Bay Area newspaper had the sole option of buying space in all papers owned by the two companies, the arrangement might well violate antitrust law.

Supreme Court Hearing Abstract Patents Case (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court heard oral arguments today in an abstract case involving automobile gas pedals that could apply the brakes to the recent dramatic growth in patents issued nationwide.

Frustrated justices flipped through engineering diagrams as they pondered a question at the heart of many patent disputes -- was the invention of an adjustable pedal with electronic sensors truly unique in this case, or just an "obvious" combination of existing components that anyone with a little skill in the field could have designed?

For the past two decades, critics have said the federal appeals court that handles all patent cases has made it easy to get patent protection for such "obvious" or minor innovations. Many companies have built their businesses on the patents upheld through that process.

Chief Justice John Roberts and several of his colleagues sharply criticized the lower court's test for invalidating patents on grounds that they are obvious advances. They said it was too rigid, leading to patents that fell short of real innovations.

But some of those same justices pondered how to loosen the standard without making it too vague, and what impact changing it would have on existing patents.

Justice David Souter wondered if 100,000 new patent lawsuits would be filed the morning after a court decision invalidating the current standard.

And Justice Antonin Scalia, who derided the existing obviousness test as "gobbledygook," at the same time asked, "Does it make sense to assume patents are valid that have been issued under an erroneous test for 20 years?"

The case, which pits Canadian-based automotive parts maker KSR International Co. against rival Teleflex Inc. of Pennsylvania, is the most significant of several cases the Supreme Court has taken recently involving the overburdened U.S. patent system.

That system has strained over the past two decades to keep up with a flood of patent applications from new fields, such as biotechnology and personal computing. From 1985 to 2005, annual applications have nearly tripled and the number of patents issued each year has more than doubled, to 165,485.

If the justices loosen the standard for invalidating a patent because it is simply an obvious improvement over existing products, it could cut the number of patents issued and open the door to new lawsuits, said Steve Maebius, an intellectual property attorney and partner with partner with Foley & Lardner, LLP.

"Clearly, it is a ruling that will have the potential to cut across all industry, and affect everything from computers to biotech," he said. "I think the court will have a real challenge to strike the right balance here."

Supreme Court Patent Case Comes Down To Stating ‘obvious' (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

DOJ_NMG_0099558

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — In unusually spirited arguments Tuesday, several Supreme Court justices challenged the prevailing standard for when an invention is too closely tied to existing works to qualify for patent protection.

However, some justices also worried that changing the rules of "obviousness" would throw into doubt the validity of many existing patents.

Justice David Souter asked whether there would be "100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning" if the standard used by a lower federal court that oversees patent appeals were changed. He wondered if such a change would "produce chaos."

Justice Antonin Scalia said that the current lower-court test for determining whether an invention is innovative or "obvious" is "gobbledygook," but he also questioned "what happens to the presumption of validity" for patents if the justices change the standard.

The case — brought by Teleflex and KSR International, dueling manufacturers of adjustable gas pedals — touches on concerns that patents are being issued for products and processes whose differences from existing works are too small to matter.

Justice Stephen Breyer noted that some lawyers have claimed that judges on the lower federal court have "leaned too far in the direction of never seeing a patent they didn't like."

The dispute is receiving national attention because it goes to the heart of determining what is truly new — and when inventors should be entitled to the exclusive right to make and sell an item. The case's resolution could make a difference in money for research and development of a product and, ultimately, in what consumers pay for it.

After Teleflex accused KSR International of violating the patent on a Teleflex gas pedal, KSR countered that Teleflex never should have gotten a patent on its pedal because it was "obvious," based on other works.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit ruled that KSR failed to make a sufficient case for "obviousness." The court said KRS did not show that existing technology offered a "teaching, suggestion or motivation" for the new gas pedal device.

James Dabney, representing KSR, said the test for what's obvious should be whether someone in the industry would have been capable of adapting existing technology for a new result, not whether "motivation" was there.

Justices Breyer and Scalia complained that the lower court's test was difficult to apply. Chief Justice John Roberts said it "complicates the inquiry" over what's obvious.

Thomas Goldstein, representing Teleflex, argued that the teaching-and-motivation test is neither confusing nor problematic. He said it helps prevent "hindsight" from distorting assessments of whether a variation is obvious. He said the Federal Circuit looks at whether an invention "was apparent or not apparent to a person of ordinary skill at the time of the invention."

Prior Art, Teaching, Skill? It Must Be A Patent Case (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — To be eligible for a patent, an invention must be novel, useful and, according to the statute, not "obvious" to a person of "ordinary skill" in the field. While the meaning of the term "obvious" might appear to be obvious, a lively and surprisingly entertaining Supreme Court argument on Tuesday demonstrated that it is anything but.

The question was how patent examiners and judges should evaluate the obviousness of a new product that combines, albeit in a novel way, two or more existing products. Since most inventions use elements of what patent law calls "prior art," this case presents the court with what is widely viewed as its most important patent case in years.

The patent in dispute is for an adjustable gas pedal, designed to work in vehicles equipped with electronic engine controls. In the past, gas pedals that could be adjusted for the driver's comfort worked mechanically. The new version, produced by a Canadian company, the KSR International Company, under contract to General Motors, combined an adjustable pedal with an electronic sensor.

Claiming that it had already patented such a product, a rival company, Teleflex Inc., sued. KSR argued that Teleflex's patent was invalid because the combination of the two elements was obvious. A federal district judge in Detroit agreed, and dismissed the infringement suit.

But the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has jurisdiction over all patent appeals, overturned that decision. It ordered the district court to reconsider the case under a test that makes obviousness harder to prove — and therefore makes patents easier to obtain and defend. It is the validity of that test that is at issue in the case, KSR International Co. v. Teleflex Inc., No. 04-1350.

The Federal Circuit's test for obviousness is usually referred to as the teaching-suggestion-motivation test. Under the test, a patent cannot be rejected as obvious unless the party challenging it can show that at the time of the invention, there existed a

"teaching, suggestion, or motivation" that would have led a person familiar with the field to put existing products together. Meeting that test often requires a jury trial, making patent litigation prolonged and expensive.

James W. Dabney, the lawyer representing KSR, told the justices that the Federal Circuit had improperly displaced "skill and ingenuity" as the benchmark for obtaining a patent and replaced it with what amounted to an "entitlement" to patent protection. But the Supreme Court itself "has rejected time and time again the notion that someone who was the first simply to take advantage of the known capability of technology was entitled to a patent," he added.

The federal Patent and Trademark Office agrees with the critique and entered the case on the side of KSR. Thomas G. Hungar, a deputy solicitor general, told the justices that "as the sole means of proving obviousness, the teaching-suggestion-motivation test is contrary to the Patent Act, irreconcilable with this court's precedents, and bad policy."

Mr. Hungar added, "It asks the wrong question and, in cases like this one, it produces the wrong answer."

But as Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. pointed out, the Federal Circuit had a rationale for adding its distinctive gloss to the concept of obviousness. "They say obviousness is deceptive in hindsight," the chief justice observed to Mr. Dabney. "In hindsight, everybody says, 'I could have thought of that,' " he said, adding that in the Federal Circuit's view, "if you don't have the sort of constraint that their test imposes, it's going to be too easy to say that everything was obvious."

The chief justice's comment came early in the argument; any implication that he was sympathetic to the appeals court proved premature. When it came time for the lawyer for Teleflex, Thomas C. Goldstein, to take the podium, Chief Justice Roberts made clear his disdain for the Federal Circuit's approach.

The test "adds a layer of Federal Circuit jargon that lawyers can then bandy back and forth," he said, adding, "It seems to me that it's worse than meaningless because it complicates the inquiry rather than focusing on the statute."

When Mr. Goldstein noted that "every single major patent bar association in the country has filed on our side," the chief justice interjected: "Well, which way does that cut? That just indicates that this is profitable for the patent bar." And when Mr. Goldstein referred to experts who had testified that the Teleflex patent was not obvious, the chief justice asked: "Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious? I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

Chief Justice Roberts made the comments with a smile, and the courtroom audience responded with laughter. Mr. Goldstein, an experienced Supreme Court advocate, was unfazed at finding himself the straight man in a courtroom comedy. He kept returning to his theme, which was that the Federal Circuit's test, properly understood, served the function of focusing the inquiry.

"Invention isn't at the end when you put the two things together," Mr. Goldstein said. "Invention is finding the problem, deciding what pieces of the prior art to use, and deciding how to put them together." He warned that there would be "genuine, dramatic instability" if the court disavowed the approach the Federal Circuit has used nearly since its creation in 1982.

Congress created the centralized court for the purpose of reducing instability in the patent system. Underlying the legal arguments was the deeper question of how patent law has fared in the court's hands — whether, as Justice Stephen G. Breyer put it, "they've leaned too far in the direction of never seeing a patent they didn't like." There was, Justice Breyer said, "a huge argument going on." With that observation, Mr. Goldstein readily agreed.

Justices Slam Nation's Patent System; Federal Circuit Chief Defends 'Obviousness' Test (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 29, 2006

In surprisingly blunt terms, Supreme Court justices Tuesday made it crystal clear that they are upset with the nation's patent system, the lawyers who litigate under it and the appeals court that referees it.

During a lively -- bordering on raucous -- hour of arguments on what makes an invention so obvious that it does not deserve a patent, justice after justice piled on criticism of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's three-part "teaching-suggestion-motivation" test for determining obviousness, an issue that arises in virtually every patent application and appeal. The test has been criticized as too patent-friendly, resulting in a proliferation of junk patents that stifle competition.

"Three imponderable nouns," is how Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the test, also calling it "gobbledygook" for good measure.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. called it "Federal Circuit jargon" that is inflexible and "worse than meaningless."

And when Justice Stephen Breyer said he had read the briefs in the case "15 times" and still could not understand the "motivation" prong of the test, Scalia chimed in, "Like Justice Breyer, I don't understand."

The implied message to the Federal Circuit seemed to be: If two of the brainier justices on the Supreme Court don't have a clue what you are talking about, a new test might be in order.

By the end of the arguments in KSR International v. Teleflex, it seemed obvious that the Federal Circuit's three-part test for obviousness will be modified, if not scrapped altogether. But what will replace it was less clear.

DOJ_NMG_0099560

After the argument Tuesday, the Federal Circuit's chief judge, Paul Michel, defended the test in a telephone interview, asserting, "The judges of our court are quite clear on what it is and how to apply it." He said the test goes back decades -- since before creation of the court in 1982 -- and has been applied with flexibility and common sense. "I wonder if some of the descriptions of the test I have seen lately are accurate."

Michel stressed that he did not attend Tuesday's high court arguments and was not responding to specific comments by any justice.

Under the Federal Circuit's test, anyone challenging a patent must show some evidence that there are prior teachings, suggestions, or motivations or incentives in the field that make the challenged item an obvious development rather than a patentable innovation.

Because it requires some kind of evidence, even in fast-moving technologies in which such evidence can be hard to document, the test has been attacked for making it too hard for examiners to deny a patent application and for competitors to topple existing patents. James Dabney, arguing against the test, told the Court the test makes it very difficult to challenge a patent claim, "no matter how small might be the difference between a patent claim and prior art."

Dabney, a partner in New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, represented KSR, a company that challenged Teleflex's patent for an adjustable gas pedal for cars. The Federal Circuit, using its disputed test, upheld the patent, prompting KSR's plea to the high court.

Dabney's adversary, Thomas Goldstein, who had the suddenly unenviable task of defending the circuit and its test, made a last-ditch effort that could limit the damage. He warned the justices that if they come up with a completely new test, millions of patents that were reviewed or upheld under the old standard for the past 20 years or more could be challenged in court.

"It will create genuine, dramatic instability," said Goldstein, partner in Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, who represented Teleflex. [Goldstein is a contributor to Legal Times.]

Goldstein's floodgate argument appeared to give pause to some justices. "Are there going to be 100,000 cases filed tomorrow morning?" asked Justice David Souter.

Goldstein also noted that all of the patent bar associations that filed briefs in the case were on his side, endorsing the Federal Circuit's test as a balanced and workable standard.

That brought a sharp rebuke from Roberts. "Well, which way does that cut? That just indicates this is profitable for the patent bar," he said.

At another point, Roberts also ridiculed the concept of hiring expert witnesses to testify that a certain innovation was not obvious from prior art.

"Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious?" Roberts asked aloud. "I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

After the argument, Goldstein said that if the Court does only minor tinkering with the standard, litigation might be limited, but if it adds significant new factors to the test, legal challenges to past patents could be "a huge problem."

During one of the hour's lighter moments, Breyer revealed his own aspirations as an inventor. He said that at his home -- he did not specify which one -- raccoons have been eating the mechanism on his garage-door opener that detects when a car is coming or going. He said he had the bright idea of putting the mechanism at the top of the door, rather than on the ground, to protect it from critters. "How could I get a patent for that?" Breyer asked.

High Court To Weigh Price Strategy In Weyerhaeuser Antitrust Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Companies often are accused of cutting prices unfairly to drive a competitor from the market, but is raising prices for the same purpose just as unfair?

The Supreme Court questioned whether Weyerhaeuser Co. drove a smaller rival out of business by paying too much for logs that the Federal Way, Wash., forest-products company allegedly didn't need.

Weyerhaeuser is fighting an $80 million award to the now-defunct Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. stemming from a jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser violated federal antitrust law. Ross-Simmons, of Longview, Wash., accused Weyerhaeuser of paying too much for alder logs and not using what it bought, with the goal of driving out competing sawmills that use the wood in furniture and other products.

Yesterday's oral arguments before the high court turned on what legal standard Ross-Simmons must meet in order to win in court and whether a jury instruction in the case was faulty.

Companies often attack competitors by selling products at a lower price, benefiting consumers in the short term. A high legal standard must be met for a company engaging in such conduct to be found to have acted illegally. But there is no such apparent benefit in the Weyerhaeuser case. Chief Justice John Roberts asked whether the lack of such a benefit was a reason not to apply the elevated standard.

"We don't think so," said Andrew Pincus, who was representing Weyerhaeuser. Mr. Pincus pointed out that buying at a higher price in this instance would benefit the sellers supplying logs to Weyerhaeuser.

Ross-Simmons lawyer Michael Haglund said there is evidence in the case that Weyerhaeuser warehoused large volumes of lumber rather than processing it.

(Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons)

During arguments about a patent dispute, several justices expressed discomfort with a legal test for when an invention is too obvious to patent.

KSR International Inc. and Teleflex Inc. have been locked in a dispute over gas-pedal designs. The Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a special patent-appeals court, determined a new design for vehicle gas pedals with electronic sensors qualified for a patent despite being a combination of existing inventions.

The Supreme Court will decide whether the Federal Circuit, through tweaks to a longstanding "obviousness" test in patent law, has made it too easy to get a patent on improvements to existing technologies. The Federal Circuit set a test that the challenger of a patent must prove existing "teaching, suggestion or motivation would have led a person of ordinary skill in the art" to think of the innovation.

Obviousness is a key element in defending against allegations of patent infringement because it allows an accused manufacturer the chance to prove a claimed invention is just the obvious next step in existing technology. If obviousness can be proven, the patent is invalid, and the infringement lawsuit is over. Several justices indicated they are unhappy with the current state of this obviousness test in patent law. "It adds a layer of Federal Circuit jargon on so that attorneys can barter back and forth," said the chief justice.

In the case, Teleflex created the gas pedal design to meet requirements from Ford Motor Co. for its F-350 truck by changing the usual location of electronic sensors in modern gas-pedal systems.

James Dabney, a New York attorney who represented Ontario-based KSR, said the design-patent claim was illegally broad. Thomas Goldstein, a Washington attorney who represented of Limerick, Pa.-based Teleflex, said the Federal Circuit's legal test was meant to "be inclusive" and give protection to innovations that haven't been created from existing patents.

Studios Push Anti-piracy Rules On Apple (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles And Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Apple Computer is coming under pressure from some of Hollywood's biggest movie studios to change the operating environment of its popular iTunes platform, amid growing concern about digital piracy.

The studios – Universal, 20th Century Fox, Paramount and Warner Bros – are in talks with Apple about making their films available for digital download on iTunes.

After months of discussion, a sticking point has emerged over the studios' demand that Apple limit the number of devices that can use a film downloaded from iTunes.

The studios want to avoid the experience of the music industry, which has yet to recover from years of illegal digital piracy. Apple must introduce a "new model" for feature film content delivery, said one studio executive involved in the talks.

With the average cost of a blockbuster film approaching $100m, movie studios had more to lose than music companies, he added. "We're very willing to do a deal but we're keen to get some concessions from Apple that will account for the differences between the value of music and television content and feature film content."

The talks between Apple and the studios come as retailers are scrambling to get to grips with digital delivery of film content. Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, is entering the nascent market, challenging Amazon and Apple with a different model that ties digital downloads to the sale of DVDs.

Customers buying the newly released DVD of Warner Bros' Superman Returns, will be able to download a digital version of the film on to a portable device, a personal computer, or both for a small extra payment.

NASD, NYSE Agree To Merge Some Oversight (WSJ)

By Randall Smith And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

IN A VICTORY for Wall Street, the two organizations that police brokerage firms unveiled, as expected, a plan to merge some of their operations -- the latest step in a deregulatory push in U.S. markets.

DOJ_NMG_0099562

Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the pact, saying it would streamline Wall Street regulation and raise the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. Some investor advocates said the merger could weaken protections for individual investors by effectively removing cops from the beat. No immediate job cuts are planned, with the regulators saying any reductions would come through attrition.

The National Association of Securities Dealers and NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange plan to combine routine examinations, enforcement and rule-making for the securities industry. The plan, which must still be ratified by 5,100 current NASD members, follows a campaign waged intermittently since 2000 by Wall Street's lobbying group, recently renamed the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox hosts a press conference to discuss the new combined regulation of the NYSE and the NASD2. Cox calls today's announcement "a new beginning" and says that the greater integration of world markets requires expanded oversight.

"In ushering in these changes, we'll be improving America's capital markets and making our nation more competitive," Mr. Cox said. He said the merger would eliminate "needless and often harmful duplication" of routine brokerage regulation, while leaving the NYSE free to police its own trading.

However, Jacob Zamansky, a lawyer who represents investors in disputes with Wall Street brokers, said: "I believe the merger is not in the interest of ordinary investors and is being done to promote the interests of Wall Street." He added, "When you have competition among regulators, they all try to do a better job. Generally in monopolies the service goes down."

The regulatory relief for Wall Street comes as both NYSE Group and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. are bidding to acquire exchanges in Europe. Both exchanges must persuade non-U.S. investors and overseas issuers of securities that they won't suffer from the increase in U.S. regulation, notably the Sarbanes-Oxley law that was passed in 2002 after the collapse of Enron Corp. and other post-bubble scandals and added layers of regulation for public companies trading in the U.S.

The tentative pact appears to favor the NASD, whose chairman and chief executive officer, Mary Schapiro, 51 years old, will become CEO of the merged organization, as yet unnamed. A 23-member board will be split evenly between the NASD and the NYSE, with three members named jointly.

Richard G. Ketchum, 55, CEO of the NYSE's regulatory unit, will become nonexecutive chairman, while retaining his current post. He said 470 of the 700 NYSE regulatory employees will join the NASD staff of 2,400, with the rest continuing to police NYSE trading.

Although the NASD itself had to be bolstered after a stock-price bid-rigging scandal in the mid-1990s, since then the smaller NYSE self-regulatory effort has been viewed as the weaker of the two organizations. Indeed, in 2005, the SEC criticized the NYSE for lapses in overseeing stock trading on its own floor.

The NASD, which has faced dissent among its smaller members over the cost of regulation, is offering $35,000 per firm, or a total of $178.5 million for its 5,100 members, "in recognition of anticipated cost savings" if the merger wins the needed votes. The NASD is also cutting fees paid by smaller firms, and it estimates that 200 firms regulated as brokerages by both agencies could save tens of millions in annual compliance costs.

The NASD will also pay the NYSE itself $103 million, Ms. Schapiro said, aimed at ensuring the merger is "revenue neutral" to shareholders of NYSE Group, which went public earlier this year, based on "lost regulatory revenues" during a transition period. The NASD has assets of $2.6 billion based mainly on its past sales of stock of the Nasdaq stock trading system.

Combining the two industry self-regulators, which are overseen by the SEC, picked up steam over the past three years, after the stock market began to rebound and investor memories faded of losses they had suffered.

As they vie to acquire European trading platforms, the two main U.S. exchanges are under pressure to maintain their market share amid the growth of non-U.S. markets. But foreign regulators have criticized the U.S. system for being multilayered. Mr. Cox said the new regulator will be "more capable of working with other regulators around the world."

Over the summer, pressure on the two regulatory groups, which had clashed in the past over control, ramped up. SEC Commissioner Annette Nazareth, a former director of SEC market regulation, began working with them on a compromise. So did former NASD chief Frank Zarb. "This new organization is an idea whose time has come," Mr. Ketchum said.

In addition to the NASD member vote, needed for bylaw changes, the merger requires a public comment period and SEC approval. Officials say they expect the regulator to be up and running by mid-2007.

Some other investor advocates said they supported the move. They included Joseph Borg, president of the North American Securities Administrators Association, and Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America, with Ms. Roper saying she didn't think investors had been helped by the presence of both regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0099563

Richard Herr, an analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, said the deal "takes some of the conflict out of the business model" of the NYSE, a reference to the fact that the Big Board has long sought trading business from the brokerage firms that it regulates. Mr. Herr spoke on a panel at a conference in Chicago sponsored by the Futures Industry Association.

Nasdaq, NYSE To Combine Regulators (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK — In one of the biggest changes in the regulation of the U.S. stock markets in more than 70 years, the two organizations responsible for policing the USA's major stock exchanges said Tuesday they will combine forces by the middle of 2007. Together, the combined regulatory group will oversee the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market.

The new group, which is yet to be named, will merge the NASD's 2,400 regulators and examiners with the 470 regulators at the NYSE. Currently, the NASD oversees about 5,100 brokerages, from small operations to big broker-dealers, while NYSE regulators focus on 180 major firms that dominate business on the Big Board.

Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox hailed the merger as a way to simplify a complex system.

“This could make our self-regulatory system more efficient and more robust from an investor protection standpoint,” he said. “Instead of two rulebooks, two separate regulatory staffs, and two completely different enforcement systems, we'll have a coordinated, integrated effort to keep our markets free of fraud and unfair dealing.”

Some details of the merger have yet to be worked out. Then the deal will need formal approval from the SEC. But Tuesday's announcement suggests that the merger, which has been encouraged by the firms that have been regulated by both parties, is virtually a done deal.

While the new group is officially a merger of equals, NASD Chairman and CEO Mary Schapiro will emerge as CEO of the new entity, while NYSE Regulation CEO Richard Ketchum becomes chairman. Ketchum will continue to run the NYSE's market surveillance programs, which will remain separate from the merged entity.

Joseph Borg, head of the North American Securities Administrators Association, praised the proposed merger but said state regulators retain an important role in enforcing U.S. securities laws.

“As the combined resources of the regulatory arms of the NASD and NYSE concentrate on international competitiveness and creating efficiencies in national markets, state securities regulators will continue to focus our energies on serving as the local cop on the beat protecting millions of Main Street investors, the backbone of the American economy,” Borg said in a statement.

“In general, this idea is a good idea,” said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, which has billions of dollars invested in the market through its pension funds. “The (SEC) is to be commended for pushing it forward.”

Mack-Cali Says It Will Vie For Reckson (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

A chief competitor of Reckson Associates Realty Corp. says it is teaming with financier Carl Icahn and New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe in their $4.6 billion competing bid to acquire Reckson, a real-estate investment trust.

Mack-Cali Realty Corp. said last night it expects to be admitted as a partner with Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe. "We believe the combined partnership will be a(n) ... enhancement, given our collective strengths," Mack-Cali Chief Executive Mitchell Hersh said in an interview. Mr. Macklowe, through a spokesman, declined to comment.

Mack-Cali, of Edison, N.J., competes directly against Reckson, of Uniondale, N.Y., in the suburban markets of New York. Mack-Cali wasn't contacted as a possible suitor when Reckson put itself up for sale, in part because of two failed merger negotiations between the two companies. Mr. Hersh has said he would have wanted a chance to bid on Reckson's suburban assets. Reckson had no comment on Mr. Hersh's statement last night.

However, earlier yesterday, Reckson notified Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe -- via email to the partnership and a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission -- that their request to bring in additional investors to comb through Reckson's books wouldn't be allowed under the terms of the confidentiality agreement. "We are concerned that you are making a request to bring on additional partners so late in the process of your review," wrote Peter Quick, Reckson's lead independent director.

The developments are the latest in a series of volleys between Reckson directors and Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn, who made an unsolicited competing bid for Reckson on Nov. 16 for $49 a Reckson share. Reckson announced Aug. 3 it would be bought by SL Green Realty Corp., a New York REIT, for $4.1 billion, plus $2 billion in debt assumption, in a cash-and-stock deal equal to about $46 a share today. The pending deal has been contentious because of a secondary transaction in which an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler was to buy back about one-third of the portfolio, all in New York City suburbs, for $2.1 billion -- a value some shareholders say was too low.

Mr. Quick's email pointed out that Reckson had given the partnership until today to provide detailed financial information about their proposed bid. A shareholder meeting scheduled for yesterday has been postponed until Dec. 6 while Reckson's directors consider the Icahn/Macklowe bid.

The email said SL Green had advised Reckson that allowing Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn to bring in additional partners isn't permitted under the merger pact. A spokesman for SL Green had no comment about Mr. Hersh's announcement. Under terms of the merger agreement, if Reckson decides that a competing bid is superior, SL Green would have an opportunity to make a counteroffer. If Mr. Hersh and Mr. Macklowe succeed in acquiring Reckson, it could prove awkward for SL Green and Mr. Rechler. SL Green coveted Reckson's New York City buildings and now risks seeing those in the hands of Macklowe Properties, which competes directly in the same Grand Central Terminal corridor of Manhattan. And Mr. Rechler risks losing his suburban portfolio -- particularly in Long Island where his family first made its name in real estate -- to Mack-Cali's Mr. Hersh, a rival. However, it wasn't clear last night whether the Icahn/Macklowe partnership would separate the suburban buildings from the New York properties if their competing bid for Reckson is successful.

Separately, Mr. Macklowe disclosed that several weeks before he teamed with Mr. Icahn to make a competing bid, he explored buying the REIT on his own, according to a SEC filing.

Iberdrola Bid For Scottish Power May Energize European Sector (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson and Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Spanish power company Iberdrola SA's £11.6 billion ($22.64 billion) offer for Scottish Power PLC could jump-start a long-awaited consolidation in the European power sector, which has been hamstrung by legal and political battles.

If successful, the deal, announced yesterday, would create Europe's third-largest power company by market capitalization with a combined value of about €46 billion ($60.7 billion) and ratchet up the pressure on others in the sector to bulk up.

Power companies across Europe have been struggling to consolidate for the past year, as they seek to boost their size to take advantage of deregulation of the sector by the end of 2007. Greater scale also would give them more purchasing leverage to deal with volatile prices for raw materials such as natural gas. Iberdrola estimates it could slash its capital expenditures by about €40 million a year for the next five years after the tie-up with Scottish Power, as it uses greater muscle to get cheaper prices for natural-gas contracts and wind turbines.

Other sectors, such as telecommunications, infrastructure and banking, have already begun cross-border consolidation in Europe, but political opposition and the lack of physical interconnections between many European countries have stymied power companies' efforts.

E.On AG of Germany, which last year made a 570-pence offer for Scottish Power that was rejected, is trying to acquire Endesa SA, Spain's biggest power company. But its bid is bogged down in courts. Gaz de France SA and Suez are trying to merge to create a French giant, but the deal has run into opposition from Suez shareholders concerned that the price is too low. Enel SpA of Italy, another power company flush with cash, had been interested in Suez as well but stopped short of making a bid.

Iberdrola's bid for Scottish Power is friendly, so it should avoid many of those pitfalls. The part-cash, part-stock offer of 777 pence a share was slightly less than the market anticipated, sending shares in both down. But it was recommended by Scottish Power's board, which said that linkup will help it achieve its objectives of diversifying and increasing size without negative merger effects such as layoffs.

The offer still must pass muster with shareholders at both companies and secure regulatory clearance from authorities in the European Union, the United Kingdom and the U.S., where Scottish Power has wind-power and gas-trading operations. Pending approvals, the deal could be finalized by late April, Iberdrola said.

Iberdrola is offering 400 pence and 0.1646 share for each Scottish Power share, a 21% premium to the average share price in the three months before Scottish Power said, early this month, it was in talks with potential bidders. Iberdrola plans to issue 245 million new shares, or 21% of the new company's capital, to finance the offer.

Iberdrola Chairman Ignacio Sánchez Galán said the deal would boost earnings per share from the first year and wouldn't jeopardize Iberdrola's single-A credit ratings.

Iberdrola shares have risen about 50% in the past year thanks to strong profitability, growth prospects and constant rumors of further consolidation in Spain. The shares now trade at higher multiples than most of its peers. That makes them a powerful currency for acquisitions. Iberdrola has also been able to tap into a flood of money made available by banks. Barclays PLC,

DOJ_NMG_0099565

Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, and ABN Amro Holding NV provided £7.9 billion through a credit facility for the deal, and Mr. Sánchez Galán said an additional seven banks offered loan facilities of €5 billion to €15 billion each.

"Our credit may not be unlimited, but it's pretty close," he said.

Spanish companies have one additional advantage over European rivals in cross-border takeovers. Under Spanish law, goodwill accumulated on foreign operations is tax-deductible. That has allowed Spanish firms such as Telefónica SA and Ferrovial SA to outbid rivals for numerous acquisitions across Europe.

For Iberdrola, the deal would boost its position in renewable energy, especially in wind power, at a time when European utilities are hunting for ways to produce cleaner energy to comply with strict environmental legislation.

The deal would also give the Spanish firm diversification of its business, adding deregulated power markets in the U.K. and the U.S. to its traditional base in Spain and Latin America. Iberdrola would also get Scottish Power's sophisticated gas- and financial-trading operations, people close to the deal said.

2nd-Biggest Spanish Power Concern To Buy ScottishPower (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean and Heather Timmons

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

MADRID, Nov. 28 — The Spanish power company Iberdrola announced Tuesday that it had agreed to buy ScottishPower for $22.5 billion, a move that would create one of Europe's largest utilities.

The board of ScottishPower said Tuesday that it would approve the bid, which would amount to 777 pence, or about $15 a share, slightly more than half of that in cash.

Iberdrola is Spain's second-largest power company behind Endesa and one of the world's leading producers of wind power. The deal with ScottishPower would enable it to increase its wind power capacity by as much as 50 percent, analysts said, and to broaden its access not only to the British market but also to the American one, where it has been looking to expand in recent months.

The deal would also allow the company to lower costs and to diversify beyond the Spanish market, where opportunities for growth are increasingly limited.

"Together we will be able to guarantee immediate synergies and to access future economies of scale," Ignacio Galán, the chief executive of Iberdrola, said in a statement.

"The resulting group will be very well positioned for the future European energy market and will have a strong platform for growth, especially in renewable energies, a market in which it will be world leader."

There has been heavy activity recently in Spain's energy market, with E.On of Germany and Gas Natural of Spain vying for Endesa.

The activity led analysts to speculate that Iberdrola saw itself as a possible takeover target as well.

"This deal is a way for the company's directors to protect themselves from takeovers from abroad and within Spain," said Jordi Padilla, the director of equities at Atlas Capital in Madrid.

Over the longer term, Mr. Padilla said, the deal could allow Iberdrola to eventually make a move for a Spanish energy company, like Gas Natural, without having to subject itself to Spanish regulations, which would probably require it to sell assets to avert monopoly concerns.

By joining with ScottishPower, he said, "a large part of its business would be outside of Spain, so regulatory authority could lie with the European Union rather than Spain if it decides to make a move for a Spanish company."

Iberdrola's offer was slightly lower than the 800 pence (about $15.50) some analysts said they had expected. But the price still struck many as elevated.

"Iberdrola is offering what we considered a high price for ScottishPower," Citigroup said in a note released. "We estimate a slightly negative impact in our Iberdrola evaluation, although we consider that the company's medium/long-term fundamentals could improve, particularly in the wind power business."

Spanish companies, buoyed by a robust economic expansion that has lasted more than a decade, have been aggressively looking abroad for investment opportunities in recent years, particularly in Latin America and, more recently, in Britain.

Grupo Ferrovial announced the takeover of the British airport company BAA in June for $20.5 billion. Last year, Telefónica acquired the British mobile phone company O2 for $31.5 billion, and in 2004 Grupo Santander acquired the British bank Abbey National.

Iberdrola, which is based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, has operations in 28 countries and had $15.3 billion in sales last year. The combined company would be worth $84 billion, the companies said.

ScottishPower, based in Glasgow, has been considered a takeover target for more than 18 months, after a foray into the United States failed to generate the expected revenue.

The company sold its United States unit, PacifiCorp, to Berkshire Hathaway in May 2005, recording a $1.7 billion loss. ScottishPower retains some wind power and gas storage businesses in the United States, however.

E.On of Germany made an unsolicited bid for ScottishPower in September 2005 that was rebuffed several times. E.On gave up the chase after offering 570 pence a share.

Philip Bowman, chief executive of ScottishPower, said in a statement that the deal with Iberdrola avoided "the negative consequences for employees" posed by most possible mergers. "The combination of the two companies will permit ScottishPower to develop on a global scale in an increasingly competitive environment, and the conditions offered by Iberdrola represent an attractive price for our shareholders," he said.

The deal, which Iberdrola said should be completed in April, is subject to approval from European regulators and shareholders of both companies.

Jack McConnell, first minister of the regional government in Scotland, told reporters Tuesday that he expected the European Union to take a close look at the deal. "Today's announcement will be of concern to Scottish consumers and the employees of ScottishPower," he said, according to The Associated Press.

Iberdrola said it expected cost savings of about $170 million once it acquired ScottishPower, a figure that analysts at Dresdner Kleinwort called "aggressive." But they added that because of Iberdrola's "high operating standards, we give them the benefit of the doubt."

Scottish Power OK's $22.5B Takeover Bid (HC/AP)

By Robert Barr, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle/AP, November 29, 2006

LONDON — Scottish Power PLC said Tuesday it has agreed to a $22.5 billion buyout offer from Spanish company Iberdrola SA that would create one of Europe's biggest utilities in a consolidating market.

But the cash-and-stock bid was lower than some had expected, and analysts said it opened the possibility of a rival bid even though Scottish Power's price finished below the offered price on Tuesday.

A Scottish official, meanwhile, raised concerns about the deal's impact on competition.

The proposal follows others in the European utility sector, where Germany's E.On AG is trying to buy Spain's Endesa SA and Gaz de France and France's Suez are planning to combine.

Iberdrola said the deal for Scottish Power could result in cost savings of as much as $170 million a year and Chairman Ignacio Sanchez Galan said Iberdrola intends to sell assets worth more than 1 billion euros ($1.2 billion) in the year after the deal is completed.

Jack McConnell, first minister of Scotland's regional government, expressed wariness, and said he would seek assurances from the European Union that the takeover would preserve competition.

"Today's announcement will be of concern to Scottish consumers and the employees of Scottish Power," McConnell told reporters, refusing to say whether he regarded it as good or bad for Scotland.

McConnell said he would seek assurances from European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso that the EU would evaluate the takeover consistent with its competition rules.

Sanchez Galan said the planned takeover will favor future consolidation in Spain's energy sector.

By acquiring Scottish Power, Iberdrola will gain a significant percentage of non-Spanish sales and will therefore face fewer restrictions on mergers and acquisitions from Spain's stringent industry regulators, he said at a news conference.

Under European Union takeover law, mergers and acquisitions must be reviewed by EU regulators if any of the companies involved have EU sales outside their home market accounting for one-third or more of total sales.

Sanchez Galan said Iberdrola's acquisition of significant European interests outside its home market will therefore pave the way for any potential Spanish deal "from both a legal and regulatory standpoint" by giving the EU the final say on the conditions for such a deal.

Iberdrola offered 400 pence ($7.75) in cash and 0.1646 new Iberdrola shares for every Scottish Power share, the company said in a statement. That meant the offer was equivalent to 777 pence ($15.06) per share.

"The combination of part cash and part Iberdrola shares just convolutes the offer somewhat," said Martin Slaney, an analyst at GFT Global Markets.

He said speculation had been the bid would be as much as 12 billion pounds, or 800 pence a share.

In trading on the London Stock Exchange, Scottish Power shares fell 0.8 percent to close at 740 pence ($14.34).

DOJ_NMG_0099567

The takeover is to be completed by April, subject to regulatory and shareholder approval, and Iberdrola is planning to issue 245 million new shares to finance the deal, director for corporate development Jose Luis del Valle told analysts on a conference call.

Sanchez Galan reiterated Iberdrola's target of paying a dividend of 1.50 euros per share ($1.97) in 2009.

Analyst Andrew Moulder of New York-based Creditsights commented that it was "hard to see a compelling rationale for the tie-up." The key to the deal, he said, is the development of the renewables business.

Iberdrola said the combined company would be a leading producer of renewable energy, with installed capacity of 5,707 megawatts of wind generation and 333 megawatts of hydroelectric power.

Global Insight analyst Matthew Hall, however, said the agreement would likely bring several benefits such as geographic diversification, greater economies of scale and operational synergies.

"With the companies largely residing in separate markets they seem well placed to keep job losses to a minimum, and regulatory concerns over market dominance are also likely to be reduced," he wrote.

Iberdrola, based in Bilbao, has business operations in gas and electricity in 28 countries. In 2005 Iberdrola reported revenue of 11.738 billion euros ($15.4 billion) and operating profit of 2.26 billion euros ($2.97 billion).

Scottish Power supplies gas and electric services to more than 5.2 million homes and businesses in the United Kingdom, and operates electricity generation and gas storage facilities in Britain, the U.S. and western Canada.

In March, Scottish Power completed the sale of its U.S. unit, PacifiCorp, to Warren Buffet's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. for $5.1 billion in cash. Berkshire Hathaway also assumed $4.3 billion in debt.

Scottish Power reported earlier this month that its net profit dropped 21 percent to 180.8 million pounds ($345.1 million) in the first half while revenue rose 23 percent.

Scottish Power Backs Iberdrola Bid (FT)

By Toby Shelley and Mark Mulligan
Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Iberdrola of Spain on Tuesday unveiled an agreed £11.6bn (€17.2bn, $22.5bn) takeover bid for Scottish Power which would create Europe's third-biggest integrated power utility.

The Spanish company, which has been in talks with the UK group for at least a month, said it had won a recommendation from the board of Scottish Power for its terms, finalised during intense negotiations at the weekend.

Under the terms announced on Tuesday, investors will receive 777p a share, with 53 per cent paid in cash and the remainder as 0.1646 of a share in the combined group.

There will also be a special 12p dividend for Scottish Power shareholders. New Iberdrola shares to the value of 21.4 per cent of the issued share capital of the combined group will be issued.

In early London trading, Scottish Power shares were flat at 746p on disappointment that the offer was not all cash. Iberdrola shares were down 1.5 per cent at €32.27 in Madrid.

The offer price is below the 800p that had been mooted in recent days, but early analyst reaction was that it was a good price for Scottish Power shareholders. One said it represented a premium of 40 per cent on his bank's calculation of the worth of the sum of the part of the group.

Peter Atherton, analyst at Citigroup, said it was very unlikely that a rival bidder could stretch the valuation as far as Iberdrola. The Spanish company benefits from an ability to write off goodwill against tax, which is reckoned to be worth 50p a share to its offer.

Mr Atherton said the only alternative would be a buyer breaking up Scottish Power, which is vertically integrated – but that would involve regulatory hurdles and might provoke opposition in Scotland.

The acquisition, which requires regulatory and shareholder approval, is expected to complete in April and to be earnings-enhancing from the start, according to Iberdola, which is one of the world's biggest producers of renewable energy.

Operating cost savings before tax of £88m a year are forecast, along with annual capital expenditure savings of £30m. However, one analyst said that most of the £88m appeared to come from group level overheads rather than synergies.

Ignacio Galán, Iberdrola chairman, said: "Together we will be able to guarantee immediate synergies and secure economies of scale in the medium and long term."

DOJ_NMG_0099568

The combination would create Europe's third largest utility – behind EdF of France and Germany's Eon – with an enterprise value of more than £43bn. But Iberdrola's successful search for a foreign tie-up, coupled with Eon's aggressive €37bn bid for Endesa, Spain's largest utility, comes as a blow for the Spanish government, which has attempted to foster the creation of national champions.

Just over a year ago Madrid backed a bid by Gas Natural, the gas supplier, for Endesa under which Iberdrola would have been offered up to €9bn in surplus assets.

Iberdrola is being advised by ABN Amro, while Morgan Stanley is acting for Scottish Power.

Power Merger Surge May Blow A Fuse (FT)

By Ed Crooks

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Iberdrola surprised no one in launching a bid for Scottish Power. But the question many were asking was whether it would be the last of its kind for some time.

A wave of mergers has swept through the European energy sector, and more consolidation has been widely expected.

But with two of the biggest potential deals bogged down in legal and political quagmires, and this latest one viewed by the markets with a jaundiced eye, it seems enthusiasm is fading.

The argument for mergers between European utilities, expounded most eloquently by Wulf Bernotat, chief executive of Eon, is that in the future a small number of big operators will dominate the market, and the smaller ones will fall by the wayside.

The European Union's energy market is being shaped by two forces - the pressure coming from the European Commission for more liberalisation and integration of national markets, to create a truly competitive EU energy market, and the intensifying competition between countries for scarce energy resources.

Only what Mr Bernotat describes as the "pan-European energy majors" will be able to cut their costs enough, by running centralised systems serving big customer bases, to compete in this single European market. And as the EU becomes increasingly dependent on Russia for its gas supplies, only those biggest companies will be able to stand up to Gaz-prom, Russia's monopoly.

Many analysts view those arguments as a rationalisation of decisions made for other reasons. European utilities have been awash with cash and have few opportunities to use it, so they are looking at acquisitions. But it is an argument that several companies have made, and it is one of the reasons Iberdrola cites for buying Scottish Power. The problem with the strategy is in its execution. Eon's bid for Endesa has faced determined government opposition and a series of court battles, and Eon has been forced to raise its offer significantly.

The proposed merger of the state-controlled Gaz de France with Suez, the private French utility, has been tied up in court and is the subject of ferocious controversy. Iberdrola does not look likely to face any such serious regulatory or legal obstacles in winning Scottish Power. But it has faced an unenthusiastic response from investors. Its shares have been falling since the talks with Scottish Power were revealed, and yesterday they lost another 2 per cent.

Iberdrola argues that the agreement will enhance earnings from the start because of cost savings and the tax break given to Spanish companies for writing off acquisition goodwill.

But several analysts suggested that even at 777p a share, lower than the 800p originally suggested, the price for Scottish Power looked very full.

High valuations are common across the European utilities sector.

So for companies considering launching a bid, the calculation is this: do they want to let themselves in for a long and painful struggle, at the end of which the rewards could be meagre?

Graham Weale, director of European consulting at Global Insight, suspects not. "These deals are extremely hard work, and whether any acquirer would be doing the right thing in buying an overpriced company is open to question," he says.

But for as long as utilities' profits remain high and money is cheap, there is always a chance that someone will make a move.

As one analyst puts it: "Are there more people out there who are ambitious fools? Probably yes."

The remaining two independent energy suppliers, Centrica and Scottish and Southern Energy, look more tempting than most because the UK market has been relatively accessible. But Peter Atherton of Citigroup says: "Both would extract very substantial premiums and just to get a deal done, RWE or EdF, for example, might not be prepared to go that far."

MORE 3rd UPDATE: Iberdrola To Buy Scottish Power For GBP11.6B (DJ)

By Alex MacDonald

Dow Jones, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099569

(This updates an item published at 0838 GMT with additional background information and CEO and analyst comments.)

LONDON (Dow Jones)--Spanish utility Iberdrola SA (IBE.MC) Tuesday agreed to buy U.K. utility Scottish Power PLC (SPI) in a combination of cash and shares that values the Scottish utility at GBP11.6 billion.

Iberdrola, Spain's second-largest utility by market capitalization, said its offer represents the equivalent of 777 pence a share to Scottish Power shareholders.

The Iberdrola proposal offers 400 pence in cash and 0.1646 of a new Iberdrola share for every Scottish Power share. It will also offer a special dividend of 12 pence a share. The cash component of the deal, including the special dividend, accounts for about 53% of the deal's value, or GBP6.1 billion.

Scottish Power, the U.K.'s fifth-largest energy supplier by number of customers, said it has agreed to the offer. The board of directors will recommend the cash and shares tie-up to shareholders in an extraordinary meeting at a later date.

The deal will need approval from regulators including the European Commission, the U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and U.S. state regulatory commissions or authorities, Iberdrola said.

The combined company would make Iberdrola the third-largest European utility by market capitalization behind Electricite de France (1024251.FR) and E.ON AG (EON) of Germany.

E.ON has bid for Spanish utility Endesa SA (ELE) in a planned deal that would create Europe's largest energy utility.

The planned Iberdrola takeover of Scottish Power would boost the combined company's annual revenues to GBP13.5 billion on a pro forma basis and give the company a strong presence in Spain, the U.K., the U.S. and other countries as well, Iberdrola said.

"The proposed integration of Scottish Power with Iberdrola is fully in line with our respective strategies ... it will create value for both our companies," said Ignacio Galan, chairman and chief executive of Iberdrola. "The new group will be well positioned (strong growth) ... particularly in renewable energy, a sector in which it will be a world leader. All of this will be positive for all our stakeholders."

Iberdrola expects to achieve GBP88 million a year in cost savings over the next five years by reducing corporate head count, combining wholesale natural gas purchases and implementing best practices, a person familiar with the matter said.

The company said it expects to save another GBP30 million from its combined capital expenditure program.

The combined company would have an aggregate installed generation capacity on a pro forma basis of 36,603 megawatts and one of the world's largest portfolios of wind farms - about 5,707 megawatts of installed wind generation capacity.

Iberdrola said it would have to issue shares equivalent to 21.4% of the combined company's issued share capital.

Andrew Moulder of independent credit and equity research company Credit Sights said Iberdrola's bid for Scottish Power looks expensive. "It's hard to see a compelling rationale for the tie-up," he said, adding that the synergies are likely to be small.

Moulder said the deal rationale would hinge "on what they do with the renewables business" and added that Scottish Power shareholders may be slightly dismayed that the 777-pence-a-share offer wasn't closer to 800 pence.

As of 1031 GMT, Scottish Power's shares were down 2 pence, or 0.27%, at 744 pence.

The cash and dividends component of the bid will be financed through a credit facility of GBP7.96 billion that Iberdrola has raised from ABN Amro Holdings NV (ABN), Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC (RBS.LN) and Barclays Capital, a division of Barclays PLC (BCS). About GBP6.1 billion will be used to fund the cash part of the bid while the remainder will be used to refinance Scottish Power's debt.

Philip Bowman, CEO of Scottish Power, welcomed the deal as a way to diversify the Glasgow-based utility's business at a time when increased mergers and acquisitions have led to a "massive change within the European utilities landscape."

"Scottish Power needs to expand its geographical presence, diversify operating risks, achieve greater economies of scale and have the financial strength to invest in substantially larger infrastructure projects over coming years," Bowman said. "This transaction achieves these objectives without the adverse social consequences for employees."

ABN AMRO advised Iberdrola on the deal, while Morgan Stanley (MS) advised Scottish Power on the deal.

Novartis, Focused On Medicine, May Shed Gerber (WSJ)

Nestlé Weighs Buying Unit It Has Long Sought as Part Of Deal Already on the Table

Novartis AG may be prepared to sell Gerber Products Co., one of the world's largest and best-known makers of baby food, and could have a willing buyer in Nestlé SA.

DOJ_NMG_0099570

Novartis, a Swiss pharmaceutical concern, already is in negotiations with Nestlé, also of Switzerland, to sell a medical-nutrition business. Nestlé executives are toying with the idea of trying to make the acquisition of Gerber part of the same deal, according to people familiar with the matter.

Novartis Chief Executive Daniel Vasella said in an interview yesterday that the company "probably would act opportunistically" if an offer for Gerber emerged, although he added that there was no auction for Gerber under way.

Reporter Dennis Berman2 has more on the potential pair-up.

Gerber, of Fremont, Mich., and Novartis's medical-nutrition business together would fetch between $4 billion and $5 billion, estimate people familiar with the matter. They figure Gerber alone would be valued at more than $3 billion.

Nestlé has been hungry for Gerber for more than a decade. Even though the market for infant purées and other mushy concoctions has been relatively slow growing, the profit margin for baby food is among the highest in the prepared-food industry, at 24% in the U.S., compared with 16% for all packaged food, according to Morgan Stanley.

If Novartis decides to part with Gerber, Nestlé may have to compete with others for the business. Numico NV of the Netherlands, the maker of Nutrica baby food and other brands, is also likely to be interested, as would private-equity firms, people close to those firms say.

Dr. Vasella said Gerber is growing and profitable but has been challenged by other baby-food brands undercutting its prices. And, he said, Novartis is trying to focus on medicines and vaccines. Dr. Vasella said nutrition, including Gerber, was a "more tangential" business for the company, although he also said that didn't mean the nutrition business necessarily had to be sold.

Gerber is part of Novartis's consumer-health division, which also includes over-the-counter medicines, animal-health products, medical nutrition and Ciba-brand contact lenses. The consumer-health unit had total sales of $7.3 billion last year, representing about 23% of Novartis's sales of $32.2 billion. The prescription-drug unit had sales of $20.3 billion last year.

Nestlé first tried to acquire Gerber in 1994, but lost to Sandoz AG, which later merged with Ciba-Geigy to form Novartis. Since then, Novartis has taken steps to broaden Gerber's business beyond jarred foods. In 2000, Gerber began selling a line of powders, oils and other toiletries for children, and in 2002 it launched microwavable meals for older toddlers. It also has a life-insurance unit. But the baby-food business has never been a good fit for a parent company that mainly sells medications.

Nestlé is the world's largest manufacturer of infant nutritional products, largely through its leading positions in fast-growing developing countries such as Brazil and China, as well as some European countries such as Spain. However, in the U.S., the world's largest infant-nutrition market, it has a small No. 3 position in infant formula, behind the two dominant players, Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Abbott Laboratories.

Nestlé has no presence in baby food in the U.S., where Novartis, thanks to Gerber, is dominant with a 79% market share, according to Morgan Stanley.

Infant nutrition is one of the best businesses in the food industry because it has strong customer loyalty and limited competition from private labels. Once parents find a formula or food for their babies that they like and trust, they tend to stick to it and are willing to pay higher prices. As a result, it is difficult for new companies to break into the business without buying an established brand.

That could make Gerber an attractive asset for Nestlé Chief Executive Peter Brabeck, who has steadily rearranged Nestlé's food portfolio in the past 10 years, shedding underperforming businesses and making major acquisitions in pet food, ice cream and diet products. Infant nutrition remains one of the last major gaps in Nestlé's portfolio, particularly in the U.S.

In the past several years, Mr. Brabeck has made Nestlé's nutrition business, from sports nutrition to clinical nutrition, a major priority, betting that growth and profits will come from health-related areas.

In 2005, Nestlé's sales from nutrition products amounted to 5.2 billion Swiss francs ($4.3 billion), half of that in infant formula and a third of it from baby food. Along with the Nestlé brand, it also owns the Neslac, Nan and Cerelac brands. Nestlé has a goal of raising annual growth in sales of nutrition products to about 10% in the long term from 6.1% achieved in the first nine months of this year. The company wants to raise the operating-profit margin in the division to 20% from around 17% now.

Novartis has also been realigning its business. The company is pursuing three main areas: inventing new prescription medicines; vaccines; and selling low-cost generic drugs and over-the-counter medicines.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices To Decide Merits Of Global Warming Petition (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — The Supreme Court will hear oral arguments on Wednesday on the questions of whether the federal government, particularly the Environmental Protection Agency, is authorized and obligated to take action to alleviate global warming.

Massachusetts, which has been joined by 11 other states, 3 cities and 13 environmental groups, will argue that the federal agency has shirked its legal responsibility to protect the public and ignored the requirements of the Clean Air Act.

Federal lawyers, in tandem with those of the auto industry, are arguing that existing law is inadequate to support far-reaching regulation, and that Congress, or the foreign policy arena, or both, are the appropriate venues to produce new global warming policies.

Calling the case "the most pressing environmental case in decades," Massachusetts's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, said, "The most indisputable fact in this case is that our climate is changing and that change is being caused by dangerous greenhouse-gas emissions."

He added, "The federal government's willing suspension of belief when it comes to global climate change has left it to the states to stand up and force action."

But, lawyers on both sides of the issue agree, the justices' answers to a more basic question — whether the plaintiffs have a right to bring the case — may have the greatest ramifications.

In deciding that issue, known legally as a question of standing, the justices may determine whether Massachusetts and its fellow petitioners have made a good enough case that the atmosphere and oceans are warming at a dangerous rate, fueled in part by human actions like burning fossil fuels, and that the petitioners have been harmed in the process.

Second, the court may decide whether any person or state injured by a worldwide phenomenon may seek legal redress even though it would only partly alleviate any damage.

The question of standing was not decided by the appeals court. That panel rejected Massachusetts's claim that the federal environmental agency was obligated to regulate the emission of heat-trapping chemicals from the tailpipes of new passenger vehicles. One judge said the harm the state had suffered was too generalized to give it standing. A second said the potential loss of coastal land was enough to give it automatic standing, and the third judge did not address the issue.

The case originally stemmed from a 1999 application by 19 environmental groups asking the E.P.A. to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions in new passenger vehicles.

"I think by far the issue that could have the most far-ranging impact is the standing issue," said Jeffrey Holmstead, who until recently was assistant administrator for air and radiation at the E.P.A. "Just because if the court determines that these petitioners don't have standing, what that means is the federal courts really won't be available for people who want to bring lawsuits related to climate change."

Mr. Holmstead, who is a partner at Bracewell & Giuliani, a lobbying firm, added, "From my perspective, I think that's not a bad thing because I don't think the courts are equipped to deal with issues like this."

Environmental groups are also concentrating heavily on the question of the agency's authority, under the Clean Air Act, to regulate carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases as air pollutants.

Paul D. Clement, the solicitor general, opposes this, saying in his brief not only that Massachusetts and the other petitioners lack standing, but also that the action they seek would have little impact on global climate change. The United States transportation sector, which is mostly made up of passenger vehicles, accounted for about 7 percent of worldwide fossil-fuel emissions in the 1990s.

E.P.A. action, he argued, "would therefore result in, at most, a tiny percentage reduction in worldwide greenhouse-gas emissions."

For Mr. Reilly, that is beside the point. He argues in the Massachusetts brief that under the Clean Air Act, the federal agency "is free to propose a comprehensive solution to the problem of climate change if it wishes to do so, but it is not free to reject the approach Congress explicitly set forth."

The question of the agency's authority to regulate carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases as pollutants "is the environmentalists' big issue," said Richard J. Lazarus, a law professor at Georgetown University. For the government, he added, a third issue, whether the agency is not just permitted to regulate greenhouse gases but is obliged to do so, may loom largest.

Supreme Court To Hear Case On Global Warming (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will take up its first-ever case on global warming today as it hears arguments from states and environmentalists seeking federal regulation of motor-vehicle emissions.

The Environmental Protection Agency contends that the problem of carbon dioxide emissions and other so-called greenhouse gases is too big and falls beyond its statutory mandate.

The court's work on the case will focus on the scope of the federal Clean Air Act rather than the debate over emissions' impact on the climate. However, the justices' ruling could shape the U.S. government's role in a pressing issue of the day and ultimately affect whether automakers will be required to build cleaner-running cars and trucks.

As the Bush administration has resisted forcing industries to control the greenhouse gases that the National Academy of Sciences and numerous scientific groups say cause global warming, California and 10 other states have made plans to enforce their own regulations for tailpipe emissions.

The case could have ramifications for those states because the authority to regulate emissions, even on the state level, derives from the Clean Air Act.

The case's significance is reflected in the more than 20 "friend of the court" briefs filed from a range of industry groups, scientists, and conservation and recreation interests. Rising temperatures have been linked to numerous environmental problems, including glacier thaw in Alaska, reduced water supply in the Great Lakes and lost coastal land in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts, along with 11 other states, three cities and several environmental groups, brought the case in an effort to force the administration to regulate emissions.

The dispute revolves around a part of the Clean Air Act that requires regulation of "any air pollutant" from vehicles that "may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The act defines "welfare" to include effects on climate and weather.

The EPA says the provision does not cover greenhouse gases and says that even if it did, the agency has the option to not exercise its authority based on policy considerations.

The states say the Clean Air Act plainly authorizes regulation of greenhouse gases and that if the EPA were to step in, it could address "sources responsible for some 60% of this country's carbon dioxide emissions — 23% from vehicles and the rest from the power plants left unregulated" by the EPA.

"We simply want the justices to tell EPA to get it right on the law," says Lisa Heinzerling, a Georgetown University professor assisting the Massachusetts attorney general.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement says in a brief on behalf of the EPA that the agency lacks the authority to take on global climate change, given the "extraordinary economic and political ramifications" of the issue. He contends the states lack legal standing to press the case because they have not shown they will be harmed by the EPA's decision to not regulate emissions in this country, "which involves only a tiny fraction of global greenhouse gas emissions."

The Sierra Club and other environmentalist groups hope the case increases pressure on the White House and Congress to act on climate change.

It's Not Up To The EPA (USAT)

By Jonathan Adler

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Several states and environmentalist groups are asking the Supreme Court to force the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to impose nationwide regulations on greenhouse gases, the most ubiquitous byproducts of modern industrial society.

The EPA only has the authority it has been delegated by Congress, and — as of yet — Congress has never given the EPA regulatory authority over greenhouse gases. Congress has not been silent on the matter of global warming, however. Since 1978, it has repeatedly addressed global climate concerns without once giving any indication that it sought to authorize federal regulation.

To the contrary, Congress has rejected specific regulatory proposals, endorsing non-regulatory measures in their stead. The Bush administration has also been reticent, but it should not be criticized for failing to exert regulatory authority it does not have. If current climate policies are inadequate and unwise, the place to seek redress is back in Congress, not the courts.

The petitioners argue that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new-vehicle tailpipes — and a superficial reading of the statutory text could suggest as much. Yet it is clear to all involved that the relevant statutory provisions were enacted to address local and regional pollution problems — such as soot, smog and acid rain — not global concerns such as climate change. If global warming requires regulation, that is a decision for our elected representatives to make.

This case also presents the important legal question of whether states and environmentalist groups have “standing” to bring their complaint to federal courts in the first place. Standing requires that a plaintiff show actual or imminent concrete injury.

This is easy to do when pollution harms a specific property or environmental resource, but it's much more difficult in the context of nationwide emissions anticipated to have global effects over many decades. The fact that climate change is a global concern is yet one more reason to leave the question to elected legislators and treaty negotiators.

Global warming is a real concern, but global warming policy ultimately belongs to the political branches, not the judiciary.

Greenhouse Courts (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin And Lee A. Casey Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Like it or not, the courts play a central role in the modern administrative state. When Congress began to delegate rulemaking powers to federal agencies in the 1930s and 1940s, it subjected their activities to numerous procedural safeguards, compliance with which, in the end, is adjudicated in court. This does not mean, however, that courts should always play the leading role. The Supreme Court is now considering two environmental law cases that superbly illustrate the circumstances in which judges should overturn unlawful administrative actions, and when they should affirm sensible ones.

The first, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy, is one of the many enforcement actions the EPA has brought, mostly against electric utilities, under a relatively obscure part of the Clean Air Act known as "New Source Review." NSR is a preconstruction permitting program that requires installation of advanced pollution control equipment. For 30 years, the EPA and the states controlled existing air pollution through a variety of other programs to comply with health-based standards. NSR was applied only when an industrial facility was built from scratch, adding new air pollution, or altered so fundamentally that its emitting capacity was increased.

Unfortunately, beginning in the late 1990s, the EPA asserted that NSR was necessary whenever plants changed or upgraded their equipment, even if there was no increase in their underlying emission capacity. Remarkably, the EPA also claimed that this was its position all along and that, as a result, electric utilities owed billions of dollars in penalties. This dramatic about-face was particularly shameful because the EPA knew about the industry's non-NSR-triggering repair and replacement practices for decades, never objected to them, and even confirmed to the states and the industry that their approach was correct.

Not surprisingly, the federal appeals court in Virginia concluded last year that the EPA's new interpretation was not only inconsistent with its regulations, but was unsupportable by the Clean Air Act's language. The case was then appealed to the Supreme Court, where government lawyers had the temerity to claim that, even if the EPA changed the rules of the game, no court can now consider the industry's arguments. Perversely, the government based this claim on a part of the act designed to ensure that citizens and industry are able to challenge meaningfully unlawful EPA actions.

The Duke Energy case shows the administrative state at its most abusive, and cries out for judicial intervention. The EPA can revise its NSR rules, but only in compliance with the statutory text, prospectively, and though the statutorily required "notice and comment" administrative process. It cannot change the rules midstream and then claim that companies have broken laws of which they were never properly informed. The correct judicial response here is to reverse EPA's actions, and to end the enforcement cases.

By contrast, in Massachusetts v. EPA -- being argued today before the Supreme Court -- the court should uphold the agency's decision not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from all of the new cars and light trucks sold in the U.S. The EPA refused to impose such rules, as a means of addressing global warming fears, because it believed that Congress did not mean to treat carbon dioxide, otherwise harmless to people, as a "pollutant" under the Clean Air Act. In addition, the EPA noted that there were still many scientific uncertainties about global warming, and that any solution must be global, involving developing as well as developed countries. The D.C. federal appeals court upheld this decision and the Supreme Court is now reviewing the case.

Here, the justices should dismiss the matter because the complainants -- states and environmental activists -- cannot meet the constitutionally required "standing" to maintain a lawsuit. The Constitution requires federal litigants to meet three elements before they have standing: (1) an individualized injury for which the law provides redress; (2) proof that the injury was actually caused by the challenged action -- here, the EPA's decision not to undertake a rulemaking; and (3) proof that the injury is likely to be redressed by the court order sought. The complainants in this and in other "global warming" cases have not and cannot meet these requirements.

First, their "injury," assuming it exists at all, is a series of actions (or inaction) that arguably impacts the earth's climate. This is not an individualized injury to some recognized legal interest. If manmade warming is happening, it affects every human being on the planet and is not "individualized." Second, proving that any particular government, corporate or individual action has contributed to global warming is also impossible. The earth has been warming since the end of the "little ice age" began to end around 1750, and humans have been pumping carbon dioxide into the atmosphere since the discovery of fire. Although scientists speculate that the increased use of fossil fuels is responsible for the warming trend, they cannot say how much carbon in the atmosphere is too much, or when that point was reached -- if it has been -- or whether the making of a rule regarding future regulation of a segment of the U.S. motor vehicle fleet can have any discernable impact on global climate at all.

Third, and most important, the complainants cannot show how a judicial decision requiring EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions would actually remedy the problem. They can only speculate that, if the U.S. begins to reduce at some future date carbon emissions from some motor vehicles, the rest of the world will follow suit not only for those types of vehicles but all other possible sources of emissions. But other countries may not. Most industrialized nations that have already promised, by the Kyoto Protocol, to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions are not meeting the agreed targets. Meanwhile, India and China refuse even to consider accepting binding emission reduction targets.

Technological advances will some day permit substantial greenhouse gas reductions and economic expansion at the same time. Indeed, the U.S. is the world's leader in the development and commercialization of revolutionary zero-emission manufacturing, power generation and automotive technologies. In the meantime, if economic growth is to be sacrificed because of global warming fears, the decision should be taken by Congress and the president, the people's elected representatives, and not by the courts.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey served in the departments of justice and energy under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. They have filed amicus briefs in both cases discussed here.

The End Of Ingenuity (NYT)

By Thomas Homer-Dixon

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

MAYBE Malthus was on to something, after all.

First, some background: Twenty-six years ago, in one of the most famous wagers in the history of science, Paul Ehrlich, John Harte and John P. Holdren bet Julian Simon that the prices of five key metals would rise in the next decade. Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues, all environmental scientists, believed that humankind's growing population and appetite for natural resources would eventually drive the metals' costs up. Simon, a professor of business administration, thought that human innovation would drive costs down.

Ten years later, Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues sent Simon a check for $576.07 — an amount representing the decline in the metals' prices after accounting for inflation. To many, the bet's outcome refuted Malthusian arguments that human population growth and resource consumption — and economic growth more generally — would run headlong into the limits of a finite planet. Human inventiveness, stimulated by modern markets, would always trump scarcity.

Indeed, the 1990s seemed to confirm this wisdom. Energy and commodity prices collapsed; ideas (not physical capital or material resources) were the new source of wealth, and local air and water got cleaner — at least in rich countries.

But today, it seems, Mr. Ehrlich and his colleagues may have the last (grim) laugh. The debate about limits to growth is coming back with a vengeance. The world's supply of cheap energy is tightening, and humankind's enormous output of greenhouse gases is disrupting the earth's climate. Together, these two constraints could eventually hobble global economic growth and cap the size of the global economy.

The most important resource to consider in this situation is energy, because it is our economy's "master resource" — the one ingredient essential for every economic activity. Sure, the price of a barrel of oil has dropped sharply from its peak of $78 last summer, but that's probably just a fluctuation in a longer upward trend in the cost of oil — and of energy more generally. In any case, the day-to-day price of oil isn't a particularly good indicator of changes in energy's underlying cost, because it's influenced by everything from Middle East politics to fears of hurricanes.

A better measure of the cost of oil, or any energy source, is the amount of energy required to produce it. Just as we evaluate a financial investment by comparing the size of the return with the size of the original expenditure, we can evaluate any project that generates energy by dividing the amount of energy the project produces by the amount it consumes.

Economists and physicists call this quantity the "energy return on investment" or E.R.O.I. For a modern coal mine, for instance, we divide the useful energy in the coal that the mine produces by the total of all the energy needed to dig the coal from the ground and prepare it for burning — including the energy in the diesel fuel that powers the jackhammers, shovels and off-road dump trucks, the energy in the electricity that runs the machines that crush and sort the coal, as well as all the energy needed to build and maintain these machines.

As the average E.R.O.I. of an economy's energy sources drops toward 1 to 1, an ever-larger fraction of the economy's wealth must go to finding and producing energy. This means less wealth is left over for everything else that needs to be done, from building houses to moving around information to educating children. The energy return on investment for conventional oil, which provides about 40 percent of the world's commercial energy and more than 95 percent of America's transportation energy, has been falling for decades. The trend is most advanced in United States production, where petroleum resources have been exploited the longest and drillers have been forced to look for ever-smaller and ever-deeper pools of oil.

Cutler Cleveland, an energy scientist at Boston University who helped developed the concept of E.R.O.I. two decades ago, calculates that from the early 1970s to today the return on investment of oil and natural gas extraction in the United States fell from about 25 to 1 to about 15 to 1.

This basic trend can be seen around the globe with many energy sources. We've most likely already found and tapped the biggest, most accessible and highest-E.R.O.I. oil and gas fields, just as we've already exploited the best rivers for hydropower. Now, as we're extracting new oil and gas in more extreme environments — in deep water far offshore, for example — and as we're turning to energy alternatives like nuclear power and converting tar sands to gasoline, we're spending steadily more energy to get energy.

For example, the tar sands of Alberta, likely to be a prime energy source for the United States in the future, have an E.R.O.I. of around 4 to 1, because a huge amount of energy (mainly from natural gas) is needed to convert the sands' raw bitumen into useable oil.

Having to search farther and longer for our resources isn't the only new hurdle we face. Climate change could also constrain growth. A steady stream of evidence now indicates that the planet is warming quickly and that the economic impact on agriculture, our built environment, ecosystems and human health could, in time, be very large. For instance, a report prepared for the British government by Sir Nicholas Stern, a former chief economist of the World Bank, calculated that without restraints on greenhouse gas emissions, by 2100 the annual worldwide costs of damage from climate change could reach 20 percent of global economic output.

Humankind's energy and climate problems are intimately connected. Petroleum's falling energy return on investment will encourage many economies to burn more coal (which in many parts of the world still has a relatively good E.R.O.I.), but coal emits far more greenhouse-inducing carbon dioxide for every unit of useful energy obtained than other energy sources. Also, many potential solutions to climate change — like moving water to newly arid regions or building dikes and relocating communities along vulnerable coastlines — will require huge amounts of energy.

Without a doubt, mankind can find ways to push back these constraints on global growth with market-driven innovation on energy supply, efficient use of energy and pollution cleanup. But we probably can't push them back indefinitely, because our species' capacity to innovate, and to deliver the fruits of that innovation when and where they're needed, isn't infinite.

Sometimes even the best scientific minds can't crack a technical problem quickly (take, for instance, the painfully slow evolution of battery technology in recent decades), sometimes market prices give entrepreneurs poor price signals (gasoline today is still far too cheap to encourage quick innovation in fuel-efficient vehicles) and, most important, sometimes there just isn't the political will to back the institutional and technological changes needed.

We can see glaring examples of such failures of innovation even in the United States — home to the world's most dynamic economy. Despite decades of increasingly dire warnings about the risks of dependence on foreign energy, the country now imports two-thirds of its oil; and during the last 20 years, despite increasingly clear scientific evidence regarding the dangers of climate change, the country's output of carbon dioxide has increased by a fifth.

As the price of energy rises and as the planet gets hotter, we need significantly higher investment in innovation throughout society, from governments and corporations to universities. Perhaps the most urgent step, if humankind is going to return to coal as its major energy source, is to figure out ways of safely disposing of coal's harmful carbon dioxide — probably underground.

But in the larger sense, we really need to start thinking hard about how our societies — especially those that are already very rich — can maintain their social and political stability, and satisfy the aspirations of their citizens, when we can no longer count on endless economic growth.

U.S. Opens Web Site On Crime For Tribes (TULSAW)

By World Washington Bureau

Tulsa World, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday the launch of a Web site that will focus on crime in Indian Country.

DOJ_NMG_0099576

"I am honored to deliver the promise that I made to provide a one-stop-shop that will enhance the prevention of and response to crime and the administration of justice in Indian Country," said Regina B. Schofield, assistant attorney general for the Office of Justice Programs.

"This will serve as a medium for talking about promising practices across the nation. Crime knows no boundaries, and the Tribal Justice and Safety Web site is another way we are using technology to prevent crime and violence from taking root in our communities."

The site's address is www.usdoj.gov/tribaljusticeandsafety.

It is designed to serve as a single source of information about law enforcement for tribes, including crime statistics and other public safety issues, as well as a source for tribes on how the Justice Department can help them in fighting crime.

Last year, Schofield launched the Justice Programs Council on Native American Affairs.

Gun Lake Casino Project Faces Further Delays (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - A southwest Michigan casino project by the Gun Lake tribe faces another delay after the government pushed back its timetable for taking land into trust for the project.

The Justice Department said in a court filing last week that the government does not plan to take 146 acres in Wayland Township into trust for the casino before March 5, 2007.

The Interior Department was originally set to take the land into trust Jan. 5, clearing the way for the Gun Lake tribe to begin construction.

The delay was noted Tuesday by Station Casinos Inc. in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Las Vegas-based company said it planned to "continue contributing significant financial support to this project, even though there can be no assurances when or if the necessary approvals will be obtained."

Michigan Gambling Opposition, an anti-casino group, sued in 2005 to block the government from taking the land into trust. U.S. District Judge John Penn in Washington is scheduled to consider government and tribal motions for dismissal on Wednesday.

James Nye, a Gun Lake spokesman, said the new March 5 deadline will "provide the judge with more time to consider making a ruling on the merits of the case, so we see this as significant progress toward the tribe obtaining trust land for the construction of its casino."

John Helmholdt, a spokesman for Michigan Gambling Opposition, said the group will likely file an appeal if the judge dismisses the lawsuit. If the judge denies the motion for dismissal, the group would likely seek a preliminary injunction to block the land from being taken into trust.

Native American? The Tribe Says No (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Native American tribes are facing allegations of greed and racism as they purge members from their rolls and deny the applications of others.

The expulsions have sent tremors through Indian country. Thousands of Native Americans have lost their cultural identities and access to tribal benefits, such as medical care, housing and education. Certain gaming tribes divide casino profits among members, in some cases thousands of dollars a month per person. Those expelled lose their cut.

Tribal officials say they're protecting legitimate members by making sure everyone in the tribe is qualified.

As sovereign nations, tribes have the final say in who can — and cannot — join. Each tribe determines what degree of Indian blood is necessary for membership, a requirement that varies among the 561 federally recognized tribes.

In California, at least 2,000 Native Americans have been taken off the rolls of their tribes since 1999, says Laura Wass, executive director of the Many Lightnings American Indian Legacy Center, an education and advocacy group in Fresno. Disenrollments have surged with the rise of Indian casinos, she says.

Thousands of Native Americans elsewhere have lost, or may lose, their tribal status. An upcoming vote at the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma could deny citizenship to more than 1,000 of the tribe's 260,000 members.

“The motive varies from tribe to tribe,” says Daniel Littlefield, director of the Sequoyah Research Center at the University of Arkansas, Little Rock, an archive for contemporary Native American issues. “I would say money is at the bottom of a lot of it.”

Mary Chapman of Fresno was disenrolled from the Picayune Rancheria of the Chukchansi Indians last month, along with 20 members of her family. About 250 members of the tribe have been disenrolled this year, Wass says, and about 400 others have received letters questioning their status.

DOJ_NMG_0099577

The 1,200-member tribe, which opened a casino in Coarsegold, Calif., in 2003, expelled Chapman because she didn't meet the eligibility criteria in the tribe's constitution, a complex set of categories based on ancestry, according to a disenrollment letter sent to her by the tribe.

Mark Levitan, attorney for the tribe, wouldn't discuss numbers. There is a moratorium on enrollment until the tribe completes an audit of every member's eligibility, he says, and tribal leaders "are a government that's responsible for following their own laws."

Chapman, 69, says she traces her Chukchansi lineage to her great-great-grandmother. She blames the tribe's move on casino-related greed, which Levitan disputes.

He says the tribe does not yet distribute casino profits to members and has to show it is meeting the needs of the tribe before it can do so.

"As far as they're concerned, I'm a non-Indian," Chapman says tearfully. "I feel totally displaced, totally homeless. Just kicked to the curb."

She feels helpless, she says, because there's nothing she can do: "There's no way to fight it."

State and federal courts do not have jurisdiction over Native American membership disputes, says Kevin Gover, law professor at Arizona State University and former assistant secretary of the Interior for Indian affairs.

"Congress has not given individual Indians the right to sue their tribes," he says.

Gover does not believe disenrollments are up because of gaming but says casino profits raise the stakes. He thinks expulsions are most often related to feuding families that form political factions.

"The majority family will throw the others out," he says. "It's clannish and unworthy of institutions that claim to be nations."

Yvette Champlain told The Providence Journal that she and dozens of her relatives were kicked out of the Narragansett Indian Tribe in Rhode Island this year because she questioned how the tribe spent $1 million it received from Harrah's Entertainment, which had been planning a casino with the tribe. "They don't want real accountability," she told the newspaper.

The casino plan was rejected by Rhode Island voters this month.

Tribal councilman Randy Noka declined to discuss the specifics of Champlain's case but says her allegations are false.

Members must be able to document that they're descendants of Narragansetts listed on a tribal roll from the 1880s, Noka says. The tribe has about 2,500 people enrolled.

"It has nothing to do with personalities or politics," he says. "Tribes have a responsibility to look out for their members. No one would expect to recognize someone that isn't a member of their family as a family member.

"You don't want anybody who may be looking to benefit from opportunities, who don't deserve them, to take away from someone who truly is a member," Noka says.

"If someone does have a definite interest in trying to prove themselves to be a member, and can prove it, they deserve every benefit other tribal members receive."

At the Cherokee Nation, a membership dispute centers on the Cherokee Freedmen, who are descendants of former slaves owned by Cherokees or, in some cases, descendants of free blacks who lived with the Cherokees. After the Civil War, the Cherokees, who had sided with the Confederacy, signed a treaty with the American government granting freedmen and their descendants tribal citizenship.

The tribe, which ratified a new constitution in 1976, has denied freedmen citizenship for much of the past three decades.

The tribe's highest court ruled in March that freedmen could obtain citizenship. Since then, more than 1,500 have enrolled, tribe spokesman Mike Miller says.

The dispute didn't end there. After Cherokee citizens circulated a referendum petition, Chief Chad Smith called a special election for February 2007 to consider changing the constitution. The proposed amendment would limit citizenship to those of Indian ancestry, based on membership rolls from the early 20th century. Those whose ancestors were freedmen would not be eligible.

Marilyn Vann's membership hangs in the balance.

"I've always considered myself a Cherokee Native American with African blood," says Vann, who says she is Cherokee, Chickasaw and black, and that being listed as a freedman means her Indian ancestry is ignored.

Vann, a petroleum engineer in Oklahoma City, says she was shocked when her citizenship application was rejected in 2001. She reapplied after the court's ruling in March and is now a citizen.

She wanted to join so she could vote and "have a voice in the affairs of the tribe," she says. "I did not come to my tribe to get something."

The Cherokees do not pay gaming profits to members. The money funds the government, social services and job creation.

Vann believes the tribe fears the freedmen's voting power. Littlefield's assessment is more blunt: "It's racism."

Some recently disenrolled members of the Pechanga Band of Luiseño Indians in California cite greed.

DOJ_NMG_0099578

John Gomez Jr., 38, helped found the American Indian Rights and Resources Organization last year to address civil rights issues. Gomez and about 130 adults in his family were disenrolled from the tribe in 2004. Another family of about 90 adults was kicked out earlier this year.

"Both were large families that opposed the leadership," he says.

The Pechanga Indians run a lucrative casino in Temecula, Calif., and split the profits among tribe members. Each member of Gomez's family used to get about $15,000 a month, he says. Once they were disenrolled, the payments stopped and the money went to remaining tribe members.

In an e-mailed statement, Pechanga Chairman Mark Macarro says courts have consistently upheld tribes' sole responsibility for determining their citizenship. He noted that a state court this month dismissed a suit brought by disenrolled members. His tribe has 1,370 members.

The allegation of casino-related greed "is ridiculous, irresponsible and simply distorts the facts," he says. "This is about determining who is a rightful citizen and who was enrolled under false pretenses."

Michael Madariaga lost his membership this year.

The tribe had hired John Johnson, curator of anthropology at the Santa Barbara Museum of Natural History, to trace the family's lineage.

Johnson determined that Madariaga's family can be traced to one of the original members of the tribe. "They did disregard my findings," Johnson says.

Madariaga, 43, and his family lost access to tribal benefits, including the monthly casino payout and meals for the elderly, he says. He lost his job at the casino. The children had to leave the reservation school.

Madariaga's 89-year-old grandfather, Lawrence, has prostate cancer. After his health insurance was cut off, he didn't take his medications for a few months, Madariaga says. Now, he's dipping into his retirement to pay for them.

Madariaga describes his grandfather as an integral member of the tribe who helped upgrade the water system and bring electricity and phones to tribe members. "He designed and helped build the health clinic," he says of his grandfather.

Madariaga says disenrollment "took a lot out of" his grandfather and grandmother, Sophia, 86.

"The anger, the stress, that's not good at their age and for their health," he says. "When they were cut off from the health benefits, they were very stressed."

But the hardest part hasn't been losing benefits and casino payouts, Madariaga says.

"What matters is taking away our heritage," he says.

"It's like taking your family and wiping them out of history."

FBI Appoints Veteran For Criminal Division (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

A veteran FBI supervisor who oversaw the investigation into the high-profile, unsolved death of a federal prosecutor in Baltimore was appointed yesterday to lead the criminal division of the bureau's Washington field office.

As head of the division, Jennifer Smith Love will direct all FBI investigations in Washington and Northern Virginia focused on violent, financial and organized crime; public corruption; civil rights violations; computer crimes; and drug-related offenses.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III yesterday announced the appointment of Mrs. Love, who had been chief of the FBI's communication-exploitation section, where she led FBI efforts to disrupt the ability of terrorists to communicate with one another.

Mrs. Love was the acting special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore field office and oversaw the bureau's investigation into the high-profile death of Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Luna, whose body was found Dec. 4, 2003, in a ditch in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Luna, 38, drowned after being stabbed 36 times with his own penknife and left facedown in a creek near Brecknock Township, Pa. Nearly three years later, the death has raised more questions than answers.

In May, during hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, questioned Mrs. Love's role in the Luna investigation, saying she and two other agents were "the subject of allegations" that they had conducted an unauthorized search of another agent's laptop computer.

Mr. Grassley said Mrs. Love's conduct was the subject of a later FBI investigation and a review by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. The FBI probe cleared Mrs. Love of any wrongdoing. The inspector general's review found "credible evidence" of wrongdoing to conclude the case should have been sent through the FBI's formal disciplinary process, rather than handled as a job-performance issue.

After serving as a new agent in New Orleans in January 1987, Mrs. Love went on to work in the Chicago field office and as the Baton Rouge resident agent, where she investigated white-collar crime, violent crimes and civil rights matters. As a street agent in all three offices, she was the case agent on numerous public corruption investigations that led to the successful convictions of numerous prominent public officials and police officers.

In 1997, she was appointed supervisory special agent in the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility at bureau headquarters in Washington, where she conducted investigations into accusations of employee misconduct. Two years later, she was appointed supervisory special agent in the Philadelphia field office where she led a white-collar crime and computer-intrusions squad.

During her tenure in Philadelphia, she oversaw the division's first undercover operation focusing on check-fraud rings.

In December 2002, she was named assistant special agent in charge of the Baltimore field office, where she initially headed the office's white-collar crimes, civil rights, administrative and surveillance programs, along with the Annapolis and Wilmington, Del., resident agencies. She concluded her assignment in Baltimore by being responsible for all of the FBI's criminal violations in the states of Maryland and Delaware.

In January 2005, Mrs. Love was promoted to section chief in the Counterterrorism Division at FBI headquarters, where she oversaw a multimillion-dollar budget, employee and information-security matters, training and continuing-education initiatives, and human-intelligence validation.

Mrs. Love is a 1983 graduate of Jackson State University in Jackson, Miss., where she received a bachelor's degree in accounting. Prior to joining the FBI, she worked as a cost accountant at McDonnell Douglas Corp. in St Louis and as a financial analyst in the FBI's St. Louis division.

Former FBI Secretary Admits Guilt (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

HONOLULU (AP) _ A former clerk-secretary on the F-B-I's organized crime-drug squad pleaded guilty today to getting information without authorization from a computer the bureau's Honolulu office.

The F-B-I's investigation of Charmaine Moniz led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people.

In addition to Moniz, the defendants include her husband, Eric, five Honolulu police officers and a Honolulu Liquor Commission inspector.

The F-B-I has said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004.

In court, Moniz said she got the information to warn her husband to stay away from certain people.

Moniz is to be sentenced April ninth. She faces up to five years in prison and a 250-thousand-dollar fine.

Witness Tells Of Role In Gang, And Killings (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

In walked the first member of the Stapleton Crew, described by prosecutors as a band of outlaws who shot, robbed and pummeled their way to power among the gun and drug rings of Staten Island.

He was 20 years old, 6 feet 3 inches tall and 320 pounds, and for court he had squeezed all that into a blue blazer with golden buttons.

His real name is Jessie Jacobus, but he gave his street handle as J-Dot, which he said was short for J-Doing Other Things.

The thing Mr. Jacobus was summoned to do yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn, in violation of what he called his principles, was to testify about the murder of two undercover detectives in March 2003.

Another member, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty if he is convicted of pulling the trigger to advance the activities of the crew, which prosecutors describe in legal parlance as a racketeer-influenced corrupt organization.

Mr. Jacobus has pleaded guilty to murder and admitted being the fourth man in the car when the detectives were shot; he is cooperating with prosecutors in exchange for a letter to his sentencing judge.

Federal prosecutors obtained the racketeering indictment and took over the case after the state death penalty was effectively halted in 2004. They said the two men had not seen each other since they were arrested three and a half years ago.

Mr. Jacobus walked across the courtroom with his back to Mr. Wilson. He turned at the witness stand, and the two seemed to lock eyes. Then he sat and promised to tell the truth about his role in the crew.

“I was supposed to be the strong-arm,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099580

Mr. Jacobus was 17 in 2003, a 10th-grade remedial school dropout, the son of a drug addict who moved up and down the East Coast. He started committing crimes at 14, though no one in the gang would let him hold a gun during robberies or revenge trips against a rival New Brighton gang.

As the strong-arm, Mr. Jacobus was relegated to rifling victims' pockets for money and contraband. It was also his job to probe their body cavities for hidden rocks of cocaine and extract them.

"Basically on the come-up, basically," Mr. Jacobus said. "I was making my way up."

He described a series of minor, violent assignments he had accepted to increase his status. Under questioning from an assistant United States attorney, Jack Smith, Mr. Jacobus said crew members acted as a team.

"A team was like, you know, um, basically like a basketball team, everybody plays a part," he said. "Some people sold drugs, some people robbed, you understand what I'm saying."

Photographs of the crew showed no women and no girls, just young men and boys in oversize athletic clothing smiling and contorting their fingers into gun shapes and gang signs. In one picture, they posed arm in arm before a refrigerator case at a bodega. Another was a souvenir of a trip to a Six Flags theme park.

Mr. Jacobus displayed vague knowledge of the drug-dealing operations, but he described robbing street-level marijuana and cocaine dealers. He said he had agreed to help Mr. Wilson rob a retail clothing store two blocks from the Stapleton Houses project where they lived.

The plan was to enter the store at midday, display a gun, take all the clothes and drive off in a rented van. His job would have been to gather the clothes, but the plan was eventually dismissed as foolhardy.

On March 10, 2003, Mr. Jacobus said, he agreed to help rob a man during a staged gun sale. The man who arrived was an undercover detective, James V. Nemorin, 36, accompanied by Detective Rodney J. Andrews, 34, whom he identified as his brother-in-law. Mr. Jacobus said he and Mr. Wilson got in the back seat of the detectives' car.

As prosecutors played a surveillance recording of that drive, relatives of the slain detectives sobbed and wailed, prompting Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis to clear the courtroom. He did not grant a defense motion for a mistrial.

As the tape resumed, Mr. Jacobus translated street slang for the jury ("burner" means gun, "hot" means under surveillance, "Shaolin" means Staten Island, even sitting around has several euphemisms) and filled in gaps in the recording.

He said Detective Andrews bought a pack of Newports and offered the cigarettes around. Detective Nemorin drove some more, then Mr. Wilson shot both detectives dead, starting with the passenger.

"Did the driver say anything?" the prosecutor asked.

"He was pleading for his life," Mr. Jacobus said.

They hid the gun in an apartment and returned to search the car. They did not find the $1,200 Detective Nemorin was carrying, but they did find a gun under the seat. Mr. Jacobus said Mr. Wilson told him, "They was going to get us before we got them."

On cross-examination, Mr. Jacobus said he had lied to the police after his arrest but told the truth since signing the cooperation agreement.

A defense lawyer, Ephraim Savitt, asked about the gang's name.

"When you were out on the street, before you were arrested, did you ever hear of the term Stapleton Crew?" Mr. Savitt said.

Mr. Jacobus said, "No, sir."

Afghan Police Aiding Drug Traffickers, U.N. Study Says (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Afghanistan's criminal underworld has compromised key government officials who protect drug traffickers, allowing a flourishing opium trade that will not be stamped out for a generation, an ominous U.N. report released Tuesday said.

The fight against opium production has so far achieved only limited success, mostly because of corruption, the joint report from the World Bank and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime said.

The findings show a "probability of high-level (government) involvement" in drugs, said Doris Buddenberg, the UNODC's Afghanistan representative and co-editor of the report.

The report in particular presented a strong indictment of the Interior Ministry, which runs the country's police, and said Afghanistan's criminal underworld could not operate without the support of the political "upperworld."

"The majority of police chiefs are involved," one senior police officer told the report's authors on condition of anonymity. "If you are not, you will be threatened to be killed and replaced."

DOJ_NMG_0099581

Without naming officials, the report said it was possible that powerful interests in the Interior Ministry are appointing district police chiefs "to both protect and promote criminal interests."

The result is a "complex pyramid of protection and patronage, effectively providing state protection to criminal trafficking activities."

The spokesman for the counter-narcotics ministry said there is no evidence that high-ranking officials are involved in Afghanistan's drug trade.

"If there is evidence we welcome the evidence and the arrest will be on the spot," Zalmai Afzali said.

Poppy cultivation and the heroin it produces has become a major problem in Afghanistan, providing funds for the Taliban insurgency that has caused the deaths of more than 3,700 people this year.

Opium production in Afghanistan rose 49% this year to 6,100 metric tons. The harvest provided more than 90% of the world's opium supply and was worth more than $3.1 billion.

Gen. Khodaidad, Afghanistan's deputy minister for counter-narcotics, told The Associated Press that next year's harvest will be as large as this year's in several key southern provinces where Taliban militants have a heavy presence. A U.S. official has also told the AP he expects next year's yield to be about the same.

The 210-page report, titled "Afghanistan's Drug Industry," is the first comprehensive assessment of the country's drug production, from poppy-growing farmers to international drug traffickers.

Barnett Rubin, director of studies and senior fellow at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, said his research has led to many of the same conclusions as the report's.

"There are many cases where honest prosecutors or police chiefs try to do something about corruption, and they say they receive phone calls from very high officials in Kabul saying to leave the people alone," said Mr. Rubin, an expert on Afghanistan.

Like the report, Mr. Rubin said he could not name names. "Getting indictable evidence is very, very difficult," he said. "I'm not mentioning any individual's name to you because I don't want to be sued or bumped off."

Interior Ministry spokesman Zemeri Bashary said the ministry has reformed its process for selecting police chiefs.

"At the moment we don't have any problems with our police chiefs," he said. "If the government is saying that poppy cultivation is prohibited, so they are obliged to implement the orders of the government."

Instead of sustained declines in cultivation, successful efforts to reduce poppy growing in one province often leads to increases elsewhere, the report found.

"History teaches us that it will take a generation to render Afghanistan opium-free," said Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of UNODC. "Those driving the drug industry must be brought to justice and officials who support it sacked."

Poppies take up less than 4% of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, and most districts do not grow opium, the report said. But the $3.1 billion export value of last year's crop accounted for around one-third of total economic activity in the country, and about 13% of Afghans are involved in the trade.

The report says there is also a need to curtail demand. The major consumers of Afghanistan's opium are Iran, Pakistan, the U.K., Italy, Spain and Germany, Ms. Buddenberg said.

Mr. Rubin said the report shows the international community's approach to the drug fight here is wrong.

"It should focus its efforts to remove big drug money from the political process," he said. "But instead what we have done is put big drug traffickers in positions of power, failed to take or support strong actions against them while we attack the livelihoods of small farmers and laborers through eradication, and they then turn to the Taliban or warlords for protection."

Agencies End Turf War Over Danvers Blast Probe (BOS)

The Boston Globe, November 29, 2006

Federal and state agencies announced today that they will cooperate in the investigation into last week's chemical plant explosion in Danvers.

Town and state fire officials had questioned the jurisdiction of the US Chemical Safety Board, a federal agency that investigates such incidents. A turf war erupted Saturday when investigators from the board were denied access to the blast site.

In a joint statement this afternoon, federal and state officials and Chemical Safety Board investigators are on the site today of the plant, which was shared by CAI Inc. and Arnel Co. Inc. Investigators from the State Fire Marshal's office, the Massachusetts Department of Fire Services, the Danvers Fire Department, and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives are also involved.

"All parties have agreed to cooperate in executing their different missions," said the statement, issued after a meeting of all the agencies this morning. "The CSB and ATF will coordinate to ensure the integrity of the ongoing civil and criminal investigations during the access to the site."

Man Who Impersonated Federal Agent Gets 10-year Sentence (AP)

AP, November 29, 2006

ATLANTA - A man who impersonated a federal agent during an armed robbery was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in prison on charges of carrying an unregistered sawed-off shotgun and a homemade firearm silencer.

Prosecutors say Garfield Royes, 37 already had three felony armed robbery convictions on his record when he posed as an agent from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives during another armed home invasion.

"Today's sentencing of Mr. Royes validates that his only career is being an authentic career criminal," said Vanessa L. McLemore, an ATF special agent.

Royes donned a tank-top adorned with the letters "ATF" in 2003 while robbing a group of suspected drug dealers, said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias.

He was arrested in June 2003 while attempting to flee from police officers trying to search his home, prosecutors said. Police later said they found a 12-gauge sawed-off shotgun, a homemade silencer and ammunition at his home - items that Royes is banned from owning.

Royes, of Woodstock, must also serve three years of supervised release following his sentence.

Mathison Returned To U.S. (SCJ)

By Nick Hytrek And Alicia Ebaugh, Journal staff writers

Sioux City (IA) Journal, November 29, 2006

It was a day later than expected, but Ryan Mathison is back on U.S. soil.

Around 6 p.m. Tuesday, Mathison and his girlfriend Janelle Rodriguez were walked halfway across a bridge into El Paso, Texas, by Mexican officials, where they were met by U.S. Marshals, said El Paso Supervisory Deputy U.S. Marshal Jerry Payan.

"They are sitting in the El Paso County Jail awaiting extradition to Iowa," Payan said.

The pair were expelled from Mexico as "undesirables," Payan said, a faster and simpler procedure than extradition, a formal process that requires requests for extradition warrants that can take months. In expulsion, the Mexican government basically says the person in custody is not welcome. The person in custody also agrees to leave.

"This is basically they want to leave, and Mexico wants them to leave, and they escort them to the border," said Duane Walhof, supervisor of the U.S. Marshals Service Sioux City bureau.

"It could be two days to two weeks before they are returned to Sioux City, depending on how fast the paperwork is processed," Payan said.

On Monday, federal officials in Sioux City announced that Mathison and Rodriguez had been located and arrested in Juarez, Mexico, Sunday afternoon. At a press conference, authorities said they expected the two to be turned over to the Marshals Service by Monday afternoon at the U.S. border at El Paso, Texas, just across the Rio Grande River from Juarez.

Mexican officials did not meet with them as expected that day.

"We were there ready to take (Mathison and Rodriguez), and they wouldn't release them," Walhof said.

The Sunday arrest ended a two-week search for Mathison, who, while on pretrial release, skipped town during his trial on charges that he oversaw a drug ring that transported hundreds of pounds of marijuana and cocaine from Mexico to Sioux City. The jury later found him guilty. He faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years in prison, a sentence that could be enhanced because he discarded his electronic monitoring device and left town. A sentencing date has not been set.

Mathison and Rodriguez were located in a Juarez hotel across the street from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office. Mathison, 38, of Sioux City, was wanted for violating terms of his pretrial release.

Rodriguez, 20, North Sioux City, who left town with Mathison, was arrested on a material witness warrant.

Citing a Marshals Service policy not to comment on details of investigations, Walhof declined Tuesday to elaborate on the investigation or Sunday's tip that led to Mathison's capture.

Readers posting comments on the Journal's Web site at www.siouxcityjournal.com Tuesday gave their own theories on how the case was cracked. Walhof declined to say if those statements were accurate.

"I've read that same speculation," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Consulates In U.S. Hit The Road To Help Far-Flung Paisanos (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

KODIAK, Alaska -- On his latest trip to Alaska, Salvadoran consular official Luis Roberto Castellanos saw bear cubs, a killer whale and 200 natives of El Salvador who might lose their jobs in canneries here unless they solve their immigration problems.

A growing number of Mexicans, Salvadorans, Guatemalans and Dominicans are working in the remote reaches of Alaska, frequently illegally, and cut off from the bulk of Latino immigrants in the U.S. They turn for help to "mobile consulates" -- collections of diplomats from their home countries who fly from barrio to barrio around the country.

These Latino circuit riders are experts in immigration law and lobbying. They press schools to offer bilingual instruction and persuade banks to accept foreign ID cards, called matrículas, in lieu of Social Security cards, so immigrants can open checking accounts. They also counsel migrant workers on the intricacies of U.S. immigration laws, including an array of regulatory loopholes that Central Americans might be able to use to stay in the U.S. even if they entered illegally. (Two legal grounds for staying: earthquake damage in home countries and fear of torture back home.)

The mobile consulates are doing their best to help those who make it to the U.S. to stay here. "Getting over the border is expensive, but it's not difficult," said Orlando Castillo, a Salvadoran cannery worker who made his way to America illegally by crossing through Mexico. "But finding a way to stay? That's hard."

Latin American nations have a big incentive to keep migrants working in the U.S. They send their families at home about $50 billion a year, according to the Inter-American Development Bank. For El Salvador, Haiti and Nicaragua, such remittances are their largest source of hard currency. So far this year, Latin American nations have sent five mobile missions to Alaska -- two from Mexico's Seattle consulate, and one each from California consulates of Guatemala, the Dominican Republic and El Salvador. Other countries that have mobile consulates around the U.S. include Nicaragua, Brazil, Perú and Colombia.

The Mexican team that swept into Anchorage at the end of September was a model of efficiency. Taking over the offices of Local 878 of the Unite/HERE restaurant and hotel workers union, the group moved about 50 applicants through a kind of assembly line. The diplomats proofread applications, verified identification and processed passports and matrícula cards by using a digital camera linked via laptop to a fingerprint scanner. New passports cost $84, matrículas $27.

While they were waiting, the Mexican migrants could thumb through brochures left by bank marketers touting low-cost money transfers to Latin America. Wells Fargo's Anchorage office has a deal with Mexico's Seattle consulate that lets it distribute materials on remitting cash every time a mobile team visits. Western Union has similar arrangements with mobile consulates visiting other cities.

Sometimes the mobile consulates attract anti-immigration ire. In February, 100 members of the Colorado Alliance for Immigration Reform picketed a Colorado Springs public library when Denver's Mexican consul came to distribute matrículas. "Meddling Mexican Consulate Officials Issuing Mickey Mouse Matrícula Cards to Foreigners" was how the protesters described the visit on the group's Web page. This past summer, a group called Oregonians for Immigration Reform demonstrated against mobile consulates in Independence and Portland, Ore. To try to limit controversy, many mobile consulates no longer hold sessions in schools or other government buildings.

With 1.5 million Salvadorans living in the U.S., El Salvador's 15 permanent consulates frequently send diplomats on the road to meet far-flung paisanos. According to San Francisco vice consul Ana María Canizalez, El Salvador's Miami consulate pioneered the use of mobile units, starting in the late 1990s. Her office started sending teams out of town just a few times a year, she recalls. "Now it feels like we're on the road every week."

It's not what the 53-year-old expected to be doing when she left her job working for El Salvador's public health ministry in 1982 to take a plum diplomatic post in San Francisco. Taking three children and a husband -- now an employee of the U.S. Postal Service -- she has seen the Bay Area's Salvadoran population swell to 50,000, including her own U.S.-born grandchildren. Across 12 states covered by her consulate, she estimates, more than a quarter million Salvadorans have settled in.

Over the years, Mrs. Canizalez has assisted hotel workers in Reno, Nev., fig-grove workers in Mendota, Calif., fruit pickers in Wenatchee, Wash., and potato harvesters in Nampa, Idaho. People are grateful for the attention paid to remote communities, she says. Dollars and cents count as much as solidarity. "Imagine if they had to pay $1,000 each to come to San Francisco," she explains. "That's hundreds of dollars saved by us coming here. A lot of that money goes home."

A trip to Alaska is especially grueling. After she participated in two marathon sessions in Seattle in August, she left with two consulate staffers for Alaska. Their prop plane didn't arrive at Kodiak Island until midnight. Over cups of tea, the diplomats laid out plans for the following day's meeting, finally getting to sleep around 2 a.m.

About a third of the 600 Salvadorans who live in Kodiak came to visit the traveling band, which set up shop in a Pentecostal church. There, Salvadoran women prepared traditional snacks to sell of fried yucca and pork cracklings.

The island, known for its evergreen rain forests and unique species of brown bear, has long been a haven for immigrants who work at salmon and halibut-processing plants. About 60% of the 6,000 residents of Kodiak were born abroad or are children of immigrants. "In the 1970s, it was Filipinos, in the 1980s it was Mexicans, now it's Central Americans," says Tony Olazabal, a Peruvian native who is production manager for Ocean Beauty Seafoods, a local cannery.

The first Latinos arrived in 1964, when foreign construction workers were sought to rebuild Kodiak after an earthquake and tsunami destroyed the island's harbor city. Today, while most of the Salvadorans who live on the island qualify for permanent legal residency and have green cards, they need help in updating passports, or registering children born in Alaska. The children are dual citizens under Salvadoran law.

Mr. Castillo, the cannery worker, told the diplomats that he entered the U.S. illegally. He first crossed the Texas-Mexico border in 1993, he said, then sneaked across again last year into Arizona, the second time paying a coyote $5,000 to guide him past border patrol agents. To qualify for a temporary work permit, he filed a petition for asylum, claiming he can't go home because criminal gangs have threatened his life.

He said he wants to stay for the money. The 48-year-old laborer earns $8 an hour hauling slabs of fresh halibut across slippery floors at Ocean Beauty. In the summer he can pocket $650 a week by working 16-hour days -- at least 10 times what he could earn at home. Each month, he said, he sends $300 home to support a family of six in La Trinidad, Cabañas.

The visiting diplomats advised Mr. Castillo that it would be hard to prove that he fears for his life since he has visited El Salvador since entering the U.S. Maybe he could qualify for Temporary Protected Status.

TPS started as a humanitarian program to allow Central Americans who fled civil wars at home in the 1980s to stay in the U.S. temporarily. TPS was extended in 2001 after earthquakes ravaged the region and again this year, many immigrant specialists believe, as a kind of thank-you to El Salvador for having sent 400 soldiers to Iraq. Now El Salvador is lobbying Congress to give all TPS holders, including the 225,000 from El Salvador, green cards entitling them to work and reside permanently in the U.S.

Barely able to write his name, Mr. Castillo labored painfully over each line in the Department of Homeland Security TPS form as Mrs. Canizalez watched, silently mouthing words of encouragement. Then she handed Mr. Castillo a stamped envelope, addressed to the federal office that processes the forms. She helped 50 other Salvadorans in Kodiak apply for TPS, too. The applicants won't know for several weeks whether they qualify, or what to try next if they don't.

Mr. Castillo hasn't heard yet, but he has a Plan B. He said he might join his son, who works in a meat-processing plant near Lexington, Neb., and switch from filleting fish to slicing beef. The son might marry an American girl one day, the cannery worker said, making him eligible to sponsor his father for legal permanent residency. "That would work best for me," the cannery worker said. "With God's help, something will work out."

TAX:

Democrat Calls For Outdated Tax To Be Axed (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

The new Democrat-controlled Congress should abolish an outdated tax that could condemn up to 23m Americans to pay a total $1,000bn next year, according to the incoming head of a powerful congressional committee.

Charles Rangel, the New York Democratic congressman who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing ways and means committee in the House of Representatives, said scrapping the alternative minimum tax (AMT) was a top priority.

Mr Rangel's position, presented at a meeting with New York business leaders on Tuesday, is more radical than other senior Democrats, including the incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who have talked about extending a one-year relief from AMT for middle-income taxpayers.

Introduced in 1969 to ensure that most upper-income households paid at least some tax, AMT has become emblematic of the inefficiencies plaguing the US tax collection system.

The problems stem largely from a technical mistake: the tax was not indexed for inflation – an oversight that meant that every year more and more middle-income citizens ended up paying it. It will be levied on some 3.5m people this year and the number could rise to more than 23m in 2007.

Both Republicans and Democrats support changes in the AMT regime because the tax is hitting middle and upper-income families – a crucial constituency.

But previous attempts at wholesale reform have stalled because of the need to find large revenue gains or spending cuts to offset the money raised by the tax. For the past few years Congress had agreed on temporary tax relief which costs about $30bn, considerably less than abolishing AMT, and is still considered the most likely option for 2007.

However, Mr Rangel said: "Nobody can challenge that is basic good policy to [scrap it]. The only question is where are we going to find the money to do it."

The financial pressures have been exacerbated by the Democratic leadership's pledge to match the cost of any tax change with spending cuts or other tax increases.

Mr Rangel said about $350bn of the $1,000bn needed to match AMT revenues could be found by closing "the tax gap" – a pool of funds that, for a number of reasons, goes unclaimed by the tax authorities. But he acknowledged the remainder would have to come from a bipartisan effort to close tax loopholes and find other sources of revenue.

Mr Rangel dampened hopes that the Democrats would roll back tax cuts introduced by President George W. Bush over the past few years, partly because the White House retains a veto on any such measures.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pentagon Takes Broader View On Emergency Spending (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon is preparing an emergency spending proposal that could be larger and broader than any since the Sept. 11 attacks, covering not only the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan but extending to other military operations connected to the Bush administration's war on terrorism.

The spending plans by military commanders may push the Defense Department into a conflict with Democrats as they take control of Capitol Hill next year. Democrats had been planning to limit the emergency "supplemental" spending measures that have funded the wars in favor of the regular federal budget process, which affords greater oversight and congressional control.

Congressional and military officials have said the Pentagon is considering a request of $127 billion to $150 billion in new emergency war spending, the largest such request since the special spending measures were begun in 2001. So far, Congress has allocated $495 billion for Afghanistan, Iraq and terrorism-related efforts.

Even within the Pentagon, the spending request is generating controversy. The Pentagon was due to forward its request to the White House by about Nov. 15. But a senior Defense official said the decision had been held up and Pentagon officials had asked Army and Air Force officials to provide more justification for the spending demands.

Pentagon officials would not comment on the budget figures, due to be made public in February.

The upcoming request, added to the $70 billion already allocated for next year, would easily exceed the annual cost of the Vietnam War at its height. Adjusted for inflation, the United States spent $121 billion on the Vietnam War in 1968, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

Still, the overall cost of the Vietnam War -- about $663 billion adjusted for inflation -- still exceeds the combined costs of the fighting thus far in Afghanistan and Iraq, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The next request stands to be larger in part because of new rules laid out in an Oct. 25 memo from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Rather than strictly limit spending to Iraq and Afghanistan costs, the memo said the services could include costs associated with military operations that are part of the larger war on terrorism.

Previously, the military portion of the supplemental spending measures has been used almost exclusively for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. England's memo would allow the military branches to include a greater number of expenses more loosely tied to the wars, such as new military weapons systems and training exercises.

The cost and approach of the spending request are likely to meet with resistance in Congress. Democratic congressional aides said the new majority on Capitol Hill was likely to push back against a request that exceeded $100 billion.

"This was a dream list for the military," said one aide, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity because the Pentagon has not formalized its request and because some members of Congress believe it is premature to comment publicly.

Democrats said a supplemental of $80 billion to $100 billion would be more realistic. House and Senate aides say they want to push in the opposite direction of the Pentagon, moving money out of the supplemental and into the regular budget.

"We are going to show more oversight," one Democratic aide said.

But Democrats acknowledged that it would be difficult to move a majority of the costs to the regular budget without forcing massive budget cuts in other departments.

DOJ_NMG_0099586

Although there will be more scrutiny of the Pentagon requests, and the most outrageous spending proposals could be nixed, there is little doubt a large supplemental will be approved, some Democratic aides said.

"People will grouse that they are loading up the supplemental, but they will be hard-pressed to say no, because they realize the services need the equipment," one Democratic aide said.

According to the England memo, the Pentagon wants to include money in the supplemental to replace equipment destroyed in combat or run down by accelerated wear and tear. More controversially, it might allow the services to replace old equipment with new models.

Defense officials declined to lay out specifics about what constituted expenditures that would be allowed in the next supplemental spending bill.

A Defense official said the Navy and Marine Corps request of $30 billion has been viewed as relatively uncontroversial. But the Army and Air Force requested far more than the Pentagon was willing to take to the White House's Office of Management and Budget and were asked to provide more information to top Defense officials.

The Army, outside military analysts have said, has requested about $80 billion in the upcoming supplemental. Army officials have not confirmed the figure.

The Air Force has requested $33 billion in supplemental funding, said Maj. Morshe Araujo, a spokeswoman. The Air Force originally requested $17.4 billion; after the England memo was circulated, the Air Force added $16 billion more in requests, Araujo said.

Critics of the Pentagon budget process say the memo has encouraged the various services to inflate their requests.

"The England memo basically said, 'Let 'er rip,'" said Winslow Wheeler, director of the Straus Military Reform Project and a former congressional budget aide. "Anything goes as long as you can put it under the pretext of not only Iraq or Afghanistan but the global war on terror."

Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the nonpartisan Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va., said the timing of the memo suggested that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has resigned and is likely to be out by the end of the year, was punting on tough spending choices.

"It really does have the feeling of opening up the floodgates and letting someone else drown," Thompson said.

Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said the supplemental amounts being discussed publicly were "wildly speculative." The England memo, he said, was meant to enable the services to request money to replace worn-out equipment.

"It is fair to say: You are five years into this conflict and equipment is being used at a higher rate than its peacetime service life would be," Whitman said. "Those are costs directly related to the war, and we are going to have to figure out how we are going to deal with it."

But Wheeler said the services were doing more than replacing equipment destroyed in Iraq or Afghanistan. He was particularly critical of the Marine Corps' decision to use the emergency spending requests to replace old helicopters with the V-22 Osprey, a controversial and expensive tilt-rotor airplane that has yet to be deployed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"That is like telling your wife she has worn out the Yugo for getting to the train station and you are going to buy her a Ferrari," Wheeler said.

In a meeting with reporters last week, Gen. James T. Conway, the new Marine Corps commandant, said buying outdated equipment would be wasteful.

"What we have to do is be smart about it," Conway said. "We have to be good custodians of the nation's resources. We have to ask ourselves: Do we buy new old stuff, or do we go to the next generation of equipment and modernize in the process?"

Wars Wearing Down Military Gear At Cost Of About $2 Billion A Month (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — About $2 billion worth of Army and Marine Corps equipment — from rifles to tanks — is wearing out or being destroyed every month in Iraq and Afghanistan, military leaders and outside experts say.

That's equal to about a quarter of the $8 billion per month in military war costs. The wear and tear may lead to future equipment shortages and cutbacks in more advanced weapons, such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter being developed with allies around the world and the Army's new, high-tech family of weapons and equipment, says William Cohen, secretary of Defense from 1997 to 2001.

Pressure to keep spending under control can lead to cuts in both current maintenance and future weapons, Cohen says, but “the longer we defer on that, the more expensive it's going to be.”

The Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to re-equip and restore units returning from Iraq, says Leon Panetta, the former Clinton White House chief of staff and member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

On Monday, the Pentagon said it had issued more than $1.7 billion in equipment repair and replacement contracts during November alone. This summer, the leaders of the Army and Marine Corps said their services rack up a combined $23 billion a year in repair costs.

Army Gen. Peter Schoomaker and Marine Gen. James Conway told Congress that repair money comes only in special requests for war funding, not in annual budgets. That, they said, makes it hard to plan for future needs.

"They've been falling badly behind," says Winslow Wheeler, a former congressional budget analyst now at the independent Center for Defense Information.

The Pentagon is considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests for war funding next year.

Vehicles and other equipment are far more complex now than they were in previous conflicts such as Vietnam, making repairs and replacements even more expensive, Wheeler says. The Congressional Research Service says the entire Vietnam War cost an estimated $650 billion in today's money, while the global war on terrorism, including Iraq, has cost more than $500 billion so far.

The Army and Marines have reported using about 40% of their ground combat equipment in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to the Government Accountability Office (GAO). Units departing Iraq leave much of their heavy equipment behind, which further delays major maintenance and leaves holes in training for future missions, the report says.

A separate GAO report this month urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to investigate the Pentagon's planning for repair, maintenance and replacement of war equipment.

If the United States entered another war, "it would be difficult for us to accomplish anything," says retired lieutenant general Donald Kerrick, who served on the National Security Council under presidents Clinton and Bush.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has acknowledged the problem and said he is working with the White House to get more money for repairs.

"I think we have some reasonable understandings about the coming year and the importance of not having a two- or three-year lag," Rumsfeld said last month.

Medicare Costs Come In $13 Billion Under Budget (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, November 29, 2006

The Medicare drug benefit has cost nearly $13 billion less than expected this year -- a rare federal program coming in under budget -- and projections show it will cost about $200 billion less in its first decade than initially estimated.

President Bush credits competition among the dozens of private insurance companies administering the program for the cost coming in at $30 billion in 2006, about 30 percent below the projected $43 billion.

But figures provided to the Associated Press by the agency that oversees the benefit for the elderly and disabled show two other factors: lower-than-expected enrollment and drug prices that went up less than expected before the benefit kicked in.

Democrats say they can cut costs further by having the government directly negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies on behalf of beneficiaries. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker from California, says granting the government that authority will be one of her priorities for the new Congress' first 100 hours.

Why the program has been costing less than anticipated will be an important element of that debate. To date, however, there has been little detailed analysis of how the savings are being achieved.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, the federal agency that oversees the new drug benefit, provided the AP with its accounting of where the program saved money this year:

·Lower than projected enrollment: $7.5 billion.

·Competition: $6.9 billion.

·Drug prices rising less than expected in the two years before the benefit even began: $3.7 billion.

About $141 billion of projected savings over the decade result from slower growth in drug prices, said John Shatto, a Medicare actuary.

The savings being achieved by the program could make it harder for Democrats to make changes, particularly with surveys showing high satisfaction rates among seniors and the disabled. So Democratic lawmakers may focus on where the savings are coming from.

"Republicans would have you believe that the drug and insurance companies have sacrificed profits in the name of competition, but nothing could be further from the truth," said Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat. "In fact, the dirty little secret is that costs are lower because of low enrollment and a slowdown in drug spending."

Leslie V. Norwalk, the acting administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, says enrollment is actually lower because the agency's actuaries underestimated how many people already had drug coverage before Jan. 1, when the Medicare benefits started.

Nearly 10 million fewer people enrolled in the program than projected after Congress created the drug benefit in 2003.

In Following His Own Script, Webb May Test Senate's Limits (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

At a recent White House reception for freshman members of Congress, Virginia's newest senator tried to avoid President Bush. Democrat James Webb declined to stand in a presidential receiving line or to have his picture taken with the man he had often criticized on the stump this fall. But it wasn't long before Bush found him.

"How's your boy?" Bush asked, referring to Webb's son, a Marine serving in Iraq.

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Webb responded, echoing a campaign theme.

"That's not what I asked you," Bush said. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," Webb said coldly, ending the conversation on the State Floor of the East Wing of the White House.

Webb was narrowly elected to the U.S. Senate this month with a brash, unpolished style that helped win over independent voters in Virginia and earned him support from national party leaders. Now, his Democratic colleagues in the Senate are getting a close-up view of the former boxer, military officer and Republican who is joining their ranks.

If the exchange with Bush two weeks ago is any indication, Webb won't be a wallflower, especially when it comes to the war in Iraq. And he won't stick to a script drafted by top Democrats.

"I'm not particularly interested in having a picture of me and George W. Bush on my wall," Webb said in an interview yesterday in which he confirmed the exchange between him and Bush. "No offense to the institution of the presidency, and I'm certainly looking forward to working with him and his administration. [But] leaders do some symbolic things to try to convey who they are and what the message is."

In the days after the election, Webb's Democratic colleagues on Capitol Hill went out of their way to make nice with Bush and be seen by his side. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) sat down for a lunch and photo opportunity with Bush, as did Democratic leaders in the Senate.

Not Webb, who said he tried to avoid a confrontation with Bush at the White House reception but did not shy away from one when the president approached.

The White House declined to discuss the encounter. "As a general matter, we do not comment on private receptions hosted by the president at the White House," said White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino.

Webb said he has "strong ideas," but he also insisted that -- as a former Marine in Vietnam -- he knows how to work in a place such as the Senate, where being part of a team is important.

He plans to push for a new GI bill for soldiers who have served in the days since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, but not as a freshman senator. He has approached the Democratic leadership about getting senior legislators to sponsor the bill when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

A strong backer of gun rights, Webb may find himself at odds with many in his party. He expressed support during the campaign for a bill by his opponent, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), that would allow concealed weapons in national parks. But an aide said this week that Webb will review Allen's legislation.

"There are going to be times when I've got some strong ideas, but I'm not looking to simply be a renegade," he said. "I think people in the Democratic Party leadership have already begun to understand that I know how to work inside a structure."

His party's leaders hope that he means it.

Top Democratic senators, including incoming Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), had invested their money and prestige in Webb before he won the party primary in June. His victory was also theirs, but now they have to make sure he's not a liability.

"He's not a typical politician. He really has deep convictions," said Schumer, who headed the Senate Democrats' campaign arm. "We saw this in the campaign. We would have disagreements. But when you made a persuasive argument, he would say, 'You're right.' I am truly not worried about it. He understands the need to be part of a team."

One senior Democratic staff member on Capitol Hill, who spoke on condition that he not be identified so he could speak freely about the new senator, said that Webb's lack of political polish was part of his charm as a candidate but could be a problem as a senator.

"I think he's going to be a total pain. He is going to do things his own way. That's a good thing and a bad thing," the staff member said. But he said that Webb's personality may be just what the Senate needs. "You need a little of everything. Some element of that personality is helpful."

DOJ_NMG_0099589

Webb has started to put himself out front. On "Meet the Press" last week, he dispensed with the normal banter with host Tim Russert to talk seriously about Iraq and the need for economic justice in the United States.

He announced yesterday that he has hired Paul J. Reagan, a communications director for former governor Mark R. Warner (D) and a former chief of staff for U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.). It will be Reagan's job to help his boss navigate the intricacies of Washington and Capitol Hill without losing the essence of his personality.

"The relationships he has built over his long career will serve me well," Webb said in a statement yesterday.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who campaigned hard to get Webb elected, said yesterday that the first-time officeholder doesn't have the finesse of most experienced politicians.

"He is not a backslapper," Kaine said. "There are different models that succeed in politics. There's the hail-fellow-well-met model of backslapping. That's not his style."

But Kaine said that Webb's background, including a stint as Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary, will make him an important -- if unpredictable -- voice on the war in Iraq.

"There are no senators who have that everyday anxiety that he has as a dad with a youngster on the front lines. That gives him gravitas and credibility on this issue," Kaine said. "People in the Senate, I'm sure, will agree with him or disagree with him on issue to issue. But they won't doubt that he's coming at it from a real sense of duty."

Son Also Rises In Testy Webb-Bush Exchange (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, November 29, 2006

President Bush has pledged to work with the new Democratic majorities in Congress, but he has already gotten off on the wrong foot with Jim Webb, whose surprise victory over Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) tipped the Senate to the Democrats.

Webb, a decorated former Marine officer, hammered Allen and Bush over the unpopular war in Iraq while wearing his son's old combat boots on the campaign trail. It seems the president may have some lingering resentment.

At a private reception held at the White House with newly elected lawmakers shortly after the election, Bush asked Webb how his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Iraq, was doing.

Webb responded that he really wanted to see his son brought back home, said a person who heard about the exchange from Webb.

"I didn't ask you that, I asked how he's doing," Bush retorted, according to the source.

Webb confessed that he was so angered by this that he was tempted to slug the commander-in-chief, reported the source, but of course didn't. It's safe to say, however, that Bush and Webb won't be taking any overseas trips together anytime soon.

"Jim did have a conversation with Bush at that dinner," said Webb's spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "Basically, he asked about Jim's son, Jim expressed the fact that he wanted to have him home." Todd did not want to escalate matters by commenting on Bush's response, saying, "It was a private conversation."

A White House spokeswoman declined to give Bush's version of the conversation.

Fake Rep. takes on colorful causes

Rep. Sherri Davis, a Republican from California, has a plucky resume, fabulous fashion sense, and a mission to eradicate yoga mat-borne illnesses. She's colorful, quotable and, unfortunately, totally fake.

Those who aren't up on their members of Congress, or who don't have a congressional directory handy, might be fooled by Rep. Davis's Internet footprints, which include a smattering of press releases, mentions on various blogs, and video clips posted on YouTube.com. She even has recommended items on Amazon.com.

The tales spread about her are just detailed enough to appear plausible. According to the press releases, which are posted on the website www.pr-inside.com and show up in Google news searches, the congresswoman is pressing legislative priorities including "a program designed to capitalize on the current 'scrapbooking craze' to increase youth reading levels through individual vouchers and through major tax-breaks to the American scrapbooking industry" and the Yoga Mat Cleanliness Act (YMCA), which the congresswoman promoted through appearances with actress Sarah Jessica Parker. According to the release, Parker "caught a bad case of tinea cruris [don't ask] from using an unclean yoga mat".

A woman purporting to be Davis appears in the YouTube clips offering bizarre policy prescriptions, such as suggesting that the problem of illegal immigration be solved by rounding up all illegal immigrants and forcing them to live in a tent city in the desert. Some viewers appeared fooled by the clips, posting comments like, "Is anyone else baffled as to how this ditz got elected? Or scared and embarrassed that she is one of the lawmakers of our country?"

Some details, though, are just too over-the-top. Davis' releases claim she "skyrocketed to fame in the 1990s with her raunchy rock-anthem '(Doing the) Baby Dance,' which reached No. 4 on the Billboard pop charts." Before taking office, Davis also played the role of Penny Pingleton in numerous regional performances of "Hairspray."

We tried to get to the bottom of the bottom of the ruse, but her "staffer," who identifies himself as Jake Barnes (oddly, that's the name of the lead character from Ernest Hemingway's "The Sun Also Rises") refuses to give up his "boss." "The idea that Congresswoman Sherri Davis, R-CA [sic] is a fictional character and not a real congresswoman is one that was planted in the media by Sherri's Democratic opponent in the congressional election this fall," he wrote us in an e-mail.

He said he hoped to have the congresswoman, who was traveling in Vienna, give us a call. We're holding our breath.

Sheriff, congressman, liquor-store owner … now lobbyist

The strange career of former Rep. Tommy Robinson just got a little stranger. The former Republican congressman from Arkansas is also a former sheriff who gained notoriety by chaining convicted prisoners to a fence. Now he owns a liquor store and, according to The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, just landed a new gig: as a lobbyist for the new president of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Robinson told the paper he would be "brokering oil and other business deals between a number of U.S. companies" and Congo President Joseph Kabila. Robinson will get to keep the $10,000 to $12,000 monthly income earned from the lobbying position under the terms of his bankruptcy proceedings in Little Rock, the story says.

According to the report, Robinson served a five-day jail sentence earlier this year for attacking a creditor in a Brinkley, Ark. barbeque restaurant.

Wal-Mart, GOP forsake God, groups say

Some Christian conservative groups say both Wal-Mart and the Republican Party have "forsaken God." And just as the GOP took a hit in the elections earlier this month, the groups say the retail giant's lower-than-expected November sales figures are the wages of that sin.

Why are sales below estimates? "It is for the same reason things went south for the Republican Party this past election cycle," read a statement by the Rev. Flip Benham and Pat McEwan, with Operation Save America and Operation Save Wal-Mart. "Wal-Mart has forsaken God and it has forsaken the people who love Him."

The groups led protesters on Nov. 24 to picket the "gates of hell" — that is, Wal-Mart stores around the country. They say Wal-Mart, like the GOP, has strayed from its founding principles, set by founder Sam Walton, citing Wal-Mart's dispensing of "Plan B" contraception and the fact that the retailer is a corporate member of the National Gay & Lesbian Chamber of Commerce.

GOP not taking loss by the book

Looks like Republicans aren't looking for answers after losses in the November elections — at least not in books.

Tom Nissley, senior books editor for Amazon.com, says he hasn't seen the same post-election bump in sales for what he thinks of as "self-help" books for losers. After Democrats got trounced in the 2004 election, he noticed a spike in sales of left-friendly books such as Tom Franks's "What's the Matter With Kansas" and George Lakoff's "Don't Think of an Elephant," books he describes as "what can we do and how to fix things" tomes.

This time, there's no Republican analogue, he said. "That was a surprise for me," Nissley said. "It might be that conservatives don't think of themselves as needing to make a change."

The two political books that have seen big boosts are "Fields of Fire," the novel set in the Vietnam War by incoming Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) and "Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald Rumsfeld."

Bush Willing To Work With Dems On Trade (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger, Ap Economics Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

President Bush's top trade negotiator said Tuesday the president still hopes to achieve bipartisan support for an aggressive trade liberalization agenda in the next Congress even with Democrats in control.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said the administration would continue to push for the conclusion of global trade talks known as the Doha Round before negotiating authority expires on June 30.

She said the administration also hopes to wrap up negotiations by early next year on free trade deals with South Korea and Malaysia and said that talks should be concluded soon with Panama.

She called gaining congressional approval for agreements already completed with Peru and Colombia a high priority.

In a speech to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Schwab warned against any move to erect protectionist barriers against the flow of goods into the country, something that critics say are needed in the face of record-high trade deficits they contend are costing American jobs.

Many Democrats campaigned against Bush's trade policies in the November congressional elections, saying the administration had failed to do enough to halt the loss of manufacturing jobs to low-wage foreign countries such as China. Since Bush took office in 2001, the country has lost nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0099591

The Democratic takeover of the House and Senate has raised speculation that the administration's trade agenda will face serious obstacles in the new Congress.

But Schwab labeled this the "conventional wisdom" that a Democratic-controlled Congress would stop the administration's trade agenda "dead in its tracks."

"There are those in the extremes of both parties ready to preach retreating to protectionism and economic isolationism," Schwab said in her speech. She said nothing could be more harmful to the American economy.

"My hand is outstretched to any and all members of Congress — the new Democratic leadership and our Republican colleagues," she said. "We must think about the next generation, not just the next election."

Rep. Sander Levin, D-Mich., said in a statement that the administration needed to be prepared to seek compromises with Democrats on contentious trade issues.

"I hope Ambassador Schwab's remarks are not meant to say that the Bush administration's approach to trade is 'stay the course.' There needs to be a change in course," Levin said.

Schwab said she had been encouraged by comments on the need for bipartisanship made by Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., who will head up the Senate Finance Committee and Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who will head the House Ways and Means Committee, the two panels with responsibility for trade.

But trade experts said Schwab may being far too optimistic about what can be done in the next Congress.

"I see rough waters ahead for the administration's trade agenda," said Dan Griswold, a trade expert at the Cato Institute, a think tank in Washington. "All the signs point toward legislative stalemate on trade."

Some analysts suggested for Bush to win approval of further trade deals he will have to drop opposition to providing greater benefits to workers laid off because of foreign competition and also accept Democratic demands to increase protections so that U.S. jobs are not moved to low-wage countries with lax labor and environmental standards.

Gary Hufbauer, a trade expert at the Institute for International Economics, said an early test for Bush will be whether he can get Congress to approve normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

Bush suffered an embarrassing defeat on this issue when the House failed to approve it by the necessary majority earlier this month right before he left on a trip to Vietnam.

"If Vietnam is held over until next year, that would indicate tough sledding for the administration," Hufbauer said.

Treasury's Paulson Sounds Warning On Protectionism (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

LONDON -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson warned that protectionist sentiment is rising all over the world, partly because "the benefits of trade are not spread evenly in any part of the world." But he said it would be "morally wrong" to give in to "protectionist elements."

Mr. Paulson's remarks, in a speech to the Confederation of British Industry and in subsequent comments to reporters, echo some of the themes that have been sounded by Democratic Party critics of globalization in the U.S., and like-minded people in other countries.

In contrast with those who would seek to slow the pace of globalization and prevent the completion of the current Doha round of world trade talks, Mr. Paulson argued that it is essential that globalization continue in order to assure future prosperity of developed and developing countries.

"Giving in to protectionist sentiment," he said, "would be telling developing nations that while we have benefited from increased trade, we aren't going to allow them the same opportunity to develop." That, he said, is "not only bad policy, it is morally wrong."

In Washington, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab echoed Mr. Paulson, raising alarms about the "extremes" in both major U.S. political parties that preach economic isolationism. "Those are forces we must confront in a bipartisan way," Ms. Schwab said. In an appearance before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Ms. Schwab vowed to work with Democrats in Congress next year.

Ms. Schwab suggested the Bush administration has made strides in already-completed trade deals to improve labor and environmental standards abroad, issues of importance to Democrats. And without offering specifics, Ms. Schwab suggested the administration needs to better respond to the needs of workers who lose their jobs as a result of foreign competition. The "dislocations are real," she said.

In London, Mr. Paulson acknowledged that trade in goods and services can eliminate jobs in the short run, especially jobs for workers with few skills. This, he said, is fueling resentment toward global trade and investment in many countries. "For over 20 years now, we've seen a trend driven by globalization: Those who have skills are getting greater rewards."

Public concern that trade is driving a wedge between winners and losers in the U.S. economy, he said, is a factor in tension between the U.S. and China. "Part of this relates to a feeling that the benefits of the trade between our two countries aren't being shared equally or fairly," he said in response to a question after his speech.

Citizenship Agency Lost 111,000 Files (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services has lost track of 111,000 files in 14 of the agency's busiest district offices and processed as many as 30,000 citizenship applications last year without the necessary files, congressional investigators reported yesterday.

The Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit arm, conducted the review at the request of Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) after U.S. authorities granted citizenship in 2002 to a man without checking his primary file. The file, which was lost, indicated ties to the militant Islamic group Hezbollah.

"It only takes one missing file of somebody with links to a terrorist organization to become an American citizen," said Grassley, who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "We can't afford to be handing out citizenship with blinders on."

Collins, head of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, noted that some of the Sept. 11 hijackers entered the U.S. legally, disappearing until the terrorist attacks. She called it "unthinkable" that the U.S. immigration system could still grant citizenship to a potential terrorist "simply because they can't find the person's file."

An agency official said workers probably checked most of the files but failed to make note of it.

The GAO report, dated Oct. 27 and released by the senators yesterday, underscored long-standing problems at the agency, which was created out of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and is expected to bear the brunt of administering new rules if Congress overhauls immigration policy.

The $1.8 billion agency handled 7.5 million applications for immigration benefits in 2005 but relies on paper files. The agency awarded a five-year, $150 million contract in August to begin digitizing 55 million "alien files," or A-files, but for now it still relies on paper files.

The GAO found that the agency's workers failed to record A-file use in processing 30,000 of 715,000 naturalization cases last year, or 4 percent of cases. The GAO also found that as of July 27, Citizenship and Immigration Services' electronic tracking system reported that 111,000 A-files were lost in the 14 offices that manage two-thirds of naturalization cases.

Steven J. Pecinovsky, an agency liaison to the GAO, said workers are not required to note that they have checked A-files but will be in the future. A 2005 internal audit found a much lower incidence of unchecked A-files than the GAO cited -- about 0.5 percent.

The GAO also cited internal audits that found that 21 percent of files were not where they were supposed to be in Immigration Services' San Diego office in 2005 and that 6 percent of files could not be found in the Los Angeles office earlier this year.

Senators Irked Over Missing Immigration Files (AP)

The AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- About 30,000 applications from immigrants seeking citizenship were processed by the government even though thousands of background files used to determine eligibility were missing, congressional investigators found.

Details of the investigation by the Government Accountability Office were released by Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley of Iowa and Susan Collins of Maine Tuesday.

According to the GAO, 14 Citizenship and Immigration Services offices were missing 110,000 so-called alien files, or A-files. Such files contain applications and other documents of some noncitizens and serve as the primary file for the immigrant and help determine eligibility.

Grassley and Collins said the citizenship and immigration offices, which are part of the Department of Homeland Security, rely on A-files to help determine eligibility for immigration benefits. The files are used by homeland security and law enforcement agencies during criminal investigations and to decide whether someone should remain in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0099593

The GAO said the citizenship and immigration agency may not have consulted A-files when processing 30,000 naturalization applications in 2005. A-files were checked in 96 percent of the naturalization cases processed that year. The agency manages 55 million A-files.

In addition, the number of applications processed without consulting A-files could have been less because workers sometimes don't record whether they've consulted the files, the GAO said.

Spokesmen at Department of Homeland Security and Citizenship and Immigration Services could not be reached immediately Tuesday evening.

Grassley and Collins said they requested the investigation after the Homeland Security agency granted U.S. citizenship to a suspected terrorist, without checking an A-file, in 2002.

"It only takes one missing file of somebody with links to a terrorist organization to become an American citizen," Grassley said in a news release.

The missing files also cause delays for immigrants with no security issues from becoming U.S. citizens, the senators said.

The senators said the agency agreed with the GAO to require workers to record whether an A-file was used to process a naturalization application and to use an automated file tracking system.

Pelosi Passes Hastings For Intel Chair (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

In a decision that could roil Democratic unity in the new House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi passed over Rep. Alcee Hastings Tuesday for the chairmanship of the Intelligence Committee.

Hastings, currently the No. 2 Democrat on the panel, had been aggressively making a case for the top position, supported by members of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Critics pointed out that he had been impeached when he was a federal judge and said naming him to such a sensitive post would be a mistake just as the Democrats take over House control pledging reforms.

"I am obviously disappointed with this decision," Hastings, D-Fla., said in a statement thanking his supporters. "I will be seeking better and bigger opportunities in a Democratic Congress."

He learned his bid for the chairmanship was unsuccessful during a closed-door meeting with Pelosi on Tuesday.

In a statement, Pelosi, D-Calif., said Hastings has made national security his highest priority. "He has served our country well, and I have full confidence that he will continue to do so," she said.

In a sign of the bitterness that has surrounded the debate, Hastings closed his statement by saying: "Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet."

The Black Caucus had no immediate comment.

A Democratic congressional aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity about internal party deliberations, said Pelosi has not yet decided who will get the position when the new Congress convenes in January.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, is next in line in seniority and is considered a strong contender for the job. Still, naming him would be a snub to the current senior Democrat on the panel, Jane Harman of California. Her committee leadership term expires at year's end, and she could be reappointed by Pelosi. Yet the two are believed to have deep differences.

Hastings, who came to Congress in 1992, was charged in an FBI bribery sting but acquitted by a federal jury in 1983. Some judicial colleagues said Hastings fabricated his defense, and their allegations led to his impeachment by the U.S. House in 1988. He was removed from the bench by the Senate the following year.

In 1997, the Justice Department found an agent had falsely testified against Hastings, but no action was taken to reopen his case.

In 2000, Democrats passed over another member of the Congressional Black Caucus — Rep. Sanford Bishop of Georgia — for the senior Democratic spot on the intelligence panel. Party leaders had agreed to give the position to Harman when she ran for Congress after an unsuccessful bid to be California governor.

Pelosi Moves To End Quarrel Over Intelligence Post (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Moving to end weeks of damaging speculation, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi said she wouldn't appoint Rep. Alcee Hastings, who was impeached as a federal judge, to be the next chairman of the House Intelligence Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0099594

Ms. Pelosi gave no indication of who would get the post, but aides indicated that a decision could follow quickly this week in a bid to resolve the issue, which has been used by her critics to try to isolate the California Democrat and incoming House speaker.

The criticism of her leadership is striking given that no other speaker before her has had the same length of service on the intelligence panel as Ms. Pelosi. As speaker, she will have the power to single-handedly appoint the chair and members for the new Congress, but her discretion has been challenged by allies of fellow Californian, Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's ranking Democrat, who has campaigned for the post.

This pressure has increased since Ms. Pelosi defied expectations earlier this month by publicly interceding on behalf of Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) in his uphill and ultimately unsuccessful contest against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) to become House majority leader.

Ms. Pelosi said she was backing Mr. Murtha out of friendship and in recognition of his speaking out against the war in Iraq -- a major issue for Democrats in the midterm elections. But in going against the Washington establishment and Mr. Hoyer, she also made herself more vulnerable to pressure from allies to Ms. Harman, who was part of the Hoyer camp.

Pelosi allies argue that the lawmaker is being unfairly browbeaten by editorialists and critics in the caucus, who try to isolate her as a San Francisco liberal. The Murtha candidacy, however costly, was about opposition to the war, not an ideological issue, they say, and once the party has had time to begin to move its agenda in January, these fights will be forgotten.

Yesterday's announcement, which followed a meeting with Mr. Hastings, appeared designed as a first step in this direction and a bid to re-establish more control. In a brief statement, Ms. Pelosi said the two had had "extensive consultations, and today I advised him that I would select someone else as chairman."

In his statement, Mr. Hastings confirmed this decision. "I am obviously disappointed," he said. "As we learn in Ecclesiastes, however, for everything there is a season."

An African-American lawmaker from Florida, Mr. Hastings was drawn into the fray because he is next-in-line on the committee behind Ms. Harman, whose tenure is slated to expire at the end of this Congress. But from the outset Mr. Hastings's impeachment has been a liability, and one Ms. Pelosi had discussed with allies in the House.

As a judge, Mr. Hastings was charged and acquitted in federal court in a Federal Bureau of Investigation bribery sting. He was later impeached by the House and removed by the Senate in 1989 on different charges, including findings of an investigation by a special judicial panel that he had fabricated evidence that secured his acquittal.

If Ms. Pelosi holds firm, as expected, and doesn't name Ms. Harman to the post, she has several options. One is to elevate Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D., Texas), a Vietnam veteran and former member of the U.S. Border Patrol before coming to Congress. But she is also free to shake up the committee by appointing new members or bringing back past leaders of the panel, such as Rep. Norm Dicks (D., Wash), the former ranking Democrat and someone who could be a candidate for the chairmanship as well.

Hastings Won't Chair Intel Panel, Pelosi Says (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON — Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Tuesday that she would not name Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) as the next chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, creating new uncertainty around one of the chamber's most important leadership positions.

In a written statement, Pelosi said she had met with Hastings and "advised him that I would select someone else as chairman of the House Intelligence Committee."

Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who will become speaker when her party takes control of the House in January, did not explain why she was bypassing Hastings, the panel's second-ranking Democrat. Her office has previously indicated that the committee's top Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, will not be reappointed.

The possibility that Hastings would get the post created a torrent of criticism, especially because Pelosi pledged to lead "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history."

In 1989, Hastings was forced to step down as a federal judge in Florida after being impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate of taking part in a bribery scheme that involved the sentencing of two defendants convicted in his court of racketeering.

Hastings, who has steadfastly maintained his innocence, had been acquitted of similar charges in a criminal trial six years earlier, but a federal judicial commission urged Congress to re-consider his case. He first ran for Congress in 1992 and has been overwhelmingly reelected since.

Last week, he wrote a letter to Democratic colleagues, lobbying for the chairmanship.

DOJ_NMG_0099595

On Tuesday he released a statement acknowledging he did not get the post but indicating a desire to remain on the panel, known formally as the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, where he has served for seven years.

"I am obviously disappointed with this decision," Hastings said in the statement, which included a swipe at his critics. "I will be seeking better and bigger opportunities in a Democratic Congress. Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet."

Pelosi's decision leaves a hole in the Democratic leadership ranks. The anticipated elevation of Hastings as chairman and the expected removal of Harman from the panel were seen as efforts to settle a debt with the Congressional Black Caucus, to which Hastings belongs: Another caucus member had been bumped from the panel in 2001 when Harman returned to Congress — and regained her seniority on the committee — after an unsuccessful run for governor of California.

Democratic aides indicated that Pelosi would probably tap someone not on the committee to become its chairman. Among the potential candidates is Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), who was on the panel for eight years in the 1990s and is familiar with the classified budgets of the nation's spy agencies from his service on the House Appropriations Committee.

Such a move is already gathering support among influential Democrats on Capitol Hill. Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana and a member of the Sept. 11 commission, said Pelosi should "go off the committee and appoint somebody brand new."

Pelosi Won't Pick Tainted Lawmaker For Key Post (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — Representative Nancy Pelosi announced on Tuesday that she would not award the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee to Representative Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, who was a leading contender for the post.

The decision by Mrs. Pelosi, the incoming speaker, ended weeks of speculation over whether she would tap Mr. Hastings, tainted by an old bribery scandal, for one of the most sensitive chairmanships when the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

Members of her staff had said she favored Mr. Hastings. But his position was weakened because he was impeached and removed as a federal judge in 1989 in connection with a bribery case. He was subsequently acquitted in the criminal case.

For Mrs. Pelosi, who had hammered the Republicans for ethical lapses in the fall campaigns, the decision to pass over Mr. Hastings was a sign that she did not relish another battle after the Democratic caucus rejected her choice for majority leader, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

On the other hand, her decision risked alienating the influential Congressional Black Caucus, which had strongly backed Mr. Hastings.

Mr. Hastings said in a statement he was "disappointed" with Mrs. Pelosi's decision and promised to work with her. He also took a shot at people who had publicly opposed his candidacy.

"Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet," he said.

Mrs. Pelosi's allies said she remained committed to selecting someone other than Representative Jane Harman of California, who is the ranking Democrat on the panel. Two possible compromise candidates are a committee member, Silvestre Reyes of Texas, and Sanford D. Bishop Jr. of Georgia.

The news that someone is not being given a post is rarely the subject of announcements here. But the question of who will lead the Intelligence Committee has developed into something of a soap opera.

More than a year ago, Mrs. Pelosi told reporters of her intention to replace Ms. Harman as the top Democrat on the committee regardless of the results of the election.

Mrs. Pelosi and Ms. Harman have long had a contentious relationship, and Mrs. Pelosi has told colleagues that she is angry that Ms. Harman has not used her position to attack the administration more directly on issues like the faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq and the domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency.

Ms. Harman has been enlisting friends, allies and powerful Democratic donors to lobby Mrs. Pelosi on her behalf. Mrs. Pelosi's supporters say that has only hardened her stance.

This month, Ms. Harman said that the Democratic moderates' victories in the elections proved that the party needed to navigate a centrist stance on national security, as she has done on the Intelligence Committee for four years.

Ms. Harman has earned the support of the Blue Dog Democrats, a coalition of conservative and moderate Democrats.

Influential party members warned that selecting Mr. Hastings would provide too much ammunition for Republicans, warnings that Mrs. Pelosi's supporters said helped sway her.

Mrs. Pelosi has pointed out that it is her prerogative to choose the leader of the Intelligence Committee and that she does not need to select someone who is a panel member. The appointment is not subject to a vote.

DOJ_NMG_0099596

Representative Norm Dicks of Washington, who was on the panel for eight years in the 1990s, has been mentioned as a possible candidate for the post. On Tuesday, however, a spokesman for Mr. Dicks said the congressman was not a serious candidate and would prefer a different committee.

The appointment is crucial for Mrs. Pelosi. She included a promise to improve the intelligence in the Democrats' six-point platform for the elections. She also came into office as minority leader promising to uphold the highest ethical standards. And she has campaigned against what she calls the Republican's "culture of corruption."

This year, Mrs. Pelosi removed Representative William J. Jefferson of Louisiana from his spot on the powerful Ways and Means Committee after he had been accused of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes.

Mr. Jefferson, like Mr. Hastings, is black, and just as his removal caused tension between Mrs. Pelosi and the Congressional Black Caucus, so did the decision not to choose Mr. Hastings.

A statement by the caucus praised Mr. Hastings for "unequivocal commitment to our nation's security, selflessness and true statesmanship," saying, "He would have made an outstanding Intelligence chairman, and we still hope he will at some point in our nation's future."

But unlike caucus statements in the Jefferson case, it avoided any direct criticism of Mrs. Pelosi.

Hastings, Harman Rejected For Chairmanship (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has decided against naming either Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the senior Democrat on the House intelligence committee, or Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.), the panel's No. 2 Democrat, to chair the pivotal committee next year.

The decisions came despite lobbying by conservative Democrats on Harman's behalf and a full-throttled campaign by Hastings to overcome the stigma of the 1988 impeachment that drove him from his federal judgeship.

The fight over the top spot on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence has exposed the kind of factional politics that bedeviled House Democrats before they were swept from control in 1994. Harman, a moderate, strong-on-defense "Blue Dog" Democrat, had angered liberals with her reluctance to challenge the Bush administration's use of intelligence. Hastings, an African American, was strongly backed by the Congressional Black Caucus but was ardently opposed by the Blue Dogs, who said his removal from the bench disqualifies him from such a sensitive post.

Complicating the matter was Pelosi's relationship with black Democrats. Earlier this year, she enraged the Black Caucus by removing one of its members, Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.), from the Ways and Means Committee after court documents revealed that federal investigators looking into allegations of bribery had found $90,000 in cash neatly bundled in his freezer.

Instead of picking Harman or Hastings, Pelosi will look for a compromise candidate, probably Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), but possibly Rep. Norman D. Dicks (Wash.), a hawkish member of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, or Rep. Sanford Bishop (Ga.), a conservative African American with experience on the intelligence committee. To entice Harman to run in 2000 for a House seat she had vacated for an unsuccessful bid for the California governorship, the Democratic leadership shunted Bishop off the committee -- another perceived slap at black lawmakers.

In announcing her decision, Pelosi praised Hastings. "Alcee Hastings has always placed national security as his highest priority," she said. "He has served our country well, and I have full confidence that he will continue to do so."

Hastings took a shot at conservatives and media voices who have come out strongly against his appointment. "Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet," he wrote.

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, voiced disappointment, saying in a statement that Hastings "would have made an outstanding Intelligence Chairman." Privately, caucus aides said they had dismissed reports that Hastings would not get the post and were taken aback that Pelosi had cut out an ally such as Hastings. Hastings himself suggested that a decision against him would be a victory for "Newt Gingrich, Sean Hannity, Ann Coulter, Michelle Malkin, Michael Barone, Drudge, anonymous bloggers, and other assorted misinformed fools."

In the end, Pelosi's pledge to clean up Congress after two years of scandal made Hastings's appointment impossible, Democrats said.

Likewise, Pelosi was not willing to bend the committee's unique term-limit rules for Harman, who she believes had violated a promise to step aside, according to Democrats. Harman had angered some Democrats with a tough management style that helped drive away longtime Democratic staffers.

In recent days, Hastings and his allies had launched a spirited campaign to clear his name from the stigma of his impeachment. Hastings distributed to Democratic colleagues six documents totaling 70 pages, including court testimony, letters from Republican and Democratic senators questioning his treatment, and a five-page letter from Hastings excoriating "the noise and misleading, poorly informed, misinformed, and sometimes venomous attacks on my integrity and character by pundits, politicians, and editors screaming the word 'impeachment.' "

He pointed repeatedly to his 1983 acquittal by a Miami jury and wrote that it is "amazing how little importance" his critics give that verdict. The events that followed that trial, he said, "are so convoluted, voluminous, complex and mundane that it would boggle the mind."

In fact, there is a certain simplicity in the conclusion drawn by an investigating committee of five eminent federal judges, each with strong civil rights credentials. Those judges, and later more than three dozen others, concluded that Hastings lied to the Miami jury as many as 15 times to win acquittal.

The original case against Florida's first black federal trial judge was circumstantial. A federal grand jury charged Hastings with conspiring with Washington lawyer William A. Borders Jr. to sell a lenient sentence to two convicted Florida racketeers for $150,000.

A sequence of meetings, telephone calls, judicial actions and taped conversations in 1981 convinced federal investigators that Hastings was on the take. But after 17 1/2 hours of deliberations at the end of a three-week trial, jurors voted not guilty.

Two federal judges soon filed an administrative complaint, accusing Hastings of conduct prejudicial to the courts, which led to the judicial investigation. John Doar, the chief House Watergate counsel, and a panel of judges investigating the matter said they uncovered substantial new evidence that convinced them that Hastings joined the bribery conspiracy and then fabricated a defense to hoodwink the jury.

In one example, they focused on Hastings's testimony about telephone calls. The issue was a taped conversation with Borders that prosecutors considered coded talk about a bribe. Hastings said it was an innocent discussion about helping a friend, Hemphill Pride, regain his law license.

Pride said that he knew of no such effort, that he would have rejected one and that he was not even eligible for reinstatement. He told the panel that Hastings, while under indictment, had urged him to remember details that, as far as Pride recalled, had never happened.

On the witness stand in Miami, however, Hastings showed the jury records of four telephone calls and confidently declared that he had made them to Pride. In fact, the Doar investigation revealed, the numbers called belonged to other people with no connection to Pride.

"Judge Hastings' conduct was premeditated, deliberate and contrived," wrote the committee, whose most prominent member was U.S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., famous for rulings integrating Alabama's public institutions.

When the Hastings case reached the House, Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), skeptical about the evidence, investigated further. In time, Conyers, an African American, became so certain of Hastings's guilt that he delivered an impassioned speech about race and justice -- and made an opening statement during the Senate proceedings, which ended with Hastings's conviction on 11 counts, including seven counts of making false statements.

"We did not wage that civil rights battle merely to replace one form of judicial corruption for another," Conyers said in the House, which voted 413 to 3 to impeach Hastings.

Hastings Denied Top Intelligence Seat (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi yesterday informed Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, the Florida Democrat who was removed as a federal judge over bribery charges, that he would be passed over for the chairmanship of one of the most sensitive and powerful committees on Capitol Hill.

"Congressman Alcee Hastings and I have had extensive consultations, and today I advised him that I would select someone else as chairman of the House intelligence committee," Mrs. Pelosi said in a short statement after meeting behind closed doors with Mr. Hastings.

Mrs. Pelosi received intense criticism after suggestions that she would elevate Mr. Hastings to the top spot.

Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argued that the former federal judge would be a poor choice for chairman because he was charged in 1981 with accepting a $150,000 bribe. A jury acquitted Mr. Hastings after a key witness refused to testify.

Still, a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives later impeached Mr. Hastings on a 413-3 vote with support from Mrs. Pelosi and others in Congress who now support Mr. Hastings. The Democrat-led Senate convicted Mr. Hastings and he was removed from office.

Mr. Hastings, the second-ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, maintains his innocence and dismissed the importance of his impeachment.

In a letter to colleagues last week, he said, "Most of the congresspersons and senators who voted never saw the evidence. Many of them never read the reports of the committee or reviewed the daily videos. Iraq and the budget are not the only times votes have been cast without adequate review and knowledge of the facts."

The speaker in waiting was attacked for considering Mr. Hastings for the chairmanship after suffering an embarrassing defeat when the majority of her caucus rejected her candidate for majority leader, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, in part because of ethics questions.

Mrs. Pelosi did not publicly explain why she passed over Mr. Hastings, saying only that he will continue to play a major role in the party's national security decisions.

Mrs. Pelosi, who represents San Francisco's congressional district, did not say whom else she is considering for the intelligence chairmanship. Rep. Jane Harman of California, the most senior Democrat on the panel, is not expected to be chosen because of personal and philosophical differences with Mrs. Pelosi.

Among Mr. Hastings' strongest supporters were fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose relations with Mrs. Pelosi have been strained. Caucus members have complained about unfair treatment and accused Mrs. Pelosi of holding them to a double standard on ethics matters.

Rep. Melvin L. Watt, North Carolina Democrat and caucus chairman, called the Hastings decision disappointing.

"The statement issued by Rep. Hastings following his meeting with Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi reflects the qualities for which the Congressional Black Caucus so strongly supported him to be the next Chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence -- an unequivocal commitment to our nation's security, selflessness and true statesmanship," Mr. Watt said. "He would have made an outstanding Intelligence Chairman and we still hope he will at some point in our nation's future."

Mr. Hastings seemed to accept the decision.

"Now I must, and will seek other ways to better serve the citizens of Florida's 23rd Congressional District and our great Nation," he said. "As has been the case over the past seven years of my service on the Intelligence Committee, the next Chair of the Committee will have my full support to do everything we can to protect the national security of the United States and our allies. Our nation's national security is far more important than my professional security."

Capuano Says Dem Transition Is 'disjointed' And Confusing (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 29, 2006

The lawmaker heading the day-to-day transition of House Democrats from minority to majority party says that process has become "disjointed" and that leaders need to do a better job communicating with each other.

But Rep. Michael Capuano (D-Mass.), whom Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) tapped after the election to head that transition, also said the inevitable messiness of a new party taking over the House is just part of the democratic process.

"I'm trying to deal with the physical [office] space, the personnel issues, House rules, and some of the legislative changes that may be done, and trying to get a handle on coordination," said Capuano in an interview with The Hill.

"A lot of people have their hands in it right now but the coordination isn't where I would like it to be," he said. "It's disjointed."

Capuano said that Pelosi and incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are involved in the transition effort.

Part of the question that has arisen, he said, is figuring out exactly who's in charge of various aspects of the transition. He said that he believes there does not need to be military-style delineations of responsibilities and argued against centralizing the effort in any one office.

"I just want to make sure that everyone is talking to everyone about what they're doing," he said. "It should be done in a coordinated manner."

Emanuel took the lead on ethics reform last week when he sent a memo to colleagues emphasizing the importance of approving rules changes and legislation implementing ethics and lobbying reform.

"Failing to deliver on this promise would be devastating to our standing with the public, and certainly jeopardize some of our marginal seats," wrote Emanuel. "The voters are looking to us for leadership, and it starts with real reform."

But other than Emanuel, Democratic leaders have remained quiet on what changes to House and Democratic Caucus rules they are contemplating. House Democrats are divided over how far they should go in changing House ethics rules.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a close ally of Pelosi's, caused a stir last month when he told a group of colleagues that he thought the Democratic lobbying reform package was "total crap."

Hoyer and Clyburn, meanwhile, are taking prominent roles.

Stacey Bernards, Hoyer's spokeswoman, said her boss was involved in all the transition issues, had met with Pelosi to discuss them last week, and plans to meet with her again this week.

DOJ_NMG_0099599

Kristie Greco, Clyburn's aide, said that the incoming whip is "working for an effective and efficient transition that's driven by a tone of civility" as well as assembling "a staff and whip team that will be the most effective of any majority."

The Democratic leaders have yet to make final decisions on any potential changes to the House rules and the Democratic Caucus rules.

"It's all in the discussion stages," said Capuano.

One of the most sensitive subjects is how much weight should be given to seniority when deciding who will serve as committee and subcommittee chairmen.

Capuano said that there has been confusion over the importance of seniority. He said there is a perception that seniority is virtually the sole factor in determining committee leadership and makeup, adding that has not been true for years.

"People have misread the caucus rules and thought seniority is absolute," he said. "Not in 30 years has it been absolute. It is a factor.

"Seniority, the diversity of the caucus, and commitment to Democratic principles and agenda" are factors, he said, explaining that merit is the first factor listed in the expiring caucus rules but that it is not necessarily more important than seniority.

Pelosi and other leaders have laid out broad outlines of changes they would like to see made, but they still have to hammer out the crucial details.

As far as the procedures of the House, Pelosi has called for bipartisan administration of the committees and for the legislative process to return to a "more regular democratic order."

She has called for the elected Democratic and Republican leaders to consult regularly on scheduling and operation questions and for committee chairmen and ranking minority members to do the same. Pelosi has also proposed that the minority should control at least one-third of panel budgets and office space.

Pelosi also wants legislative changes to address complaints that she and her Democratic colleagues had of Republicans during their 12-year rule:

Bills should be written after full committee hearings and markups.

The minority party should be allowed to fully debate and offer alternatives to legislation receiving votes on the House floor.

Lawmakers should have at least 24 hours to examine bills and conference reports before voting on them.

Floor votes should be completed within 17 minutes and should not be held open to manipulate the outcome.

House and Senate conference committees should hold weekly meetings including all conference members.

Democrats complained in previous Congresses of the Republicans' habit of limiting bicameral negotiations to House and Senate committee chairmen or a few additional appointed conferees.

Pelosi and Democratic leaders have also proposed a series of ethics reforms. They include banning gifts and travel, extending the time former lawmakers are not allowed to lobby former colleagues, and requiring lobbyists to disclose more information about their activities.

Capuano said that Democratic leaders agree that the House should have something akin to an office of public integrity to police improper behavior. Such an office is one of the most controversial elements of ethics reform. Senators voted overwhelmingly against it earlier this year.

But he said they must decide how it should be set up and "what their full responsibility would be."

Dems, Allies Plot Strategy (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Labor union representatives, liberal leaders, and aides to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) met yesterday to begin work on a broad lobbying push to promote Pelosi's 100-legislative-hour agenda with a campaign expected to mimic the one that helped defeat President Bush's proposed reforms to Social Security.

Yesterday's meeting is a signal that interest groups allied with Democrats are going on the offensive, transitioning from the defensive crouch they have held for much of Bush's time in office.

The purpose of the gathering was to ensure that party allies are unified during the first crucial weeks of the Democratic majority and that the agenda Democrats campaigned on this fall does not become entangled by interest-group squabbles and competition.

"We're talking about engaging in many of the same activities we engaged in during the Social Security effort," said Chuck Loveless, director of legislation at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), which hosted the meeting. Loveless said the campaign would launch immediately and work to mobilize support in December and January.

Party strategists are speculating that they will have a brief window of legislative productivity before a curtain of partisanship falls across town as Republicans and Democrats gear up for the 2008 presidential election.

The first priority of the lobbying plan is to pass a minimum-wage increase. The campaign will also focus on allowing the government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, repealing tax benefits for oil companies, and cutting the interest rate for student loans.

The strategic advantage of the 100-hour agenda is that it is made up of proposals that are broadly popular, thereby allowing the Democrats' allies to achieve consensus and work together from the start of next year. After that agenda is passed, groups are likely to go off in their own directions and clash over competing priorities.

Aides to incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) did not attend the meeting, according to one participant, because the immediate focus of unions and liberal groups is to pass quickly the 100-hour agenda in the House. Fast passage will allow Democrats and their allies to launch Phase II of their legislative plan, which will be to put pressure on the Senate to pass the same agenda.

The third phase will be to convince Bush to sign the measures into law.

"The assumption is to pass it quickly in the House so we can get a head of steam and put pressure on the Senate," said Bob Borosage, co-director of the liberal advocacy group Campaign for America's Future, who attended the meeting. "As you remember, most of the Contract With America passed the House and never emerged from the Senate. We want to avoid that."

Borosage predicted that as many as 100 groups would ultimately participate in the initiative and that it would be broader than the campaign against Bush's plans for Social Security.

Groups will mobilize their members to contact and meet with members of Congress and to hold events in their home states and districts. The campaign is expected to include minimal television advertising.

Representatives from AFSCME, AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), the National Education Association, the American Federation of Teachers, Americans United, a labor-funded advocacy group, and a slew of progressive groups — including USAction, ACORN, Campaign for America's Future, and MoveOn.org — attended the meeting.

Bill Samuel, legislative director for the AFL-CIO, estimated that the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress would span about two weeks. Democratic-leaning groups will then begin to pursue their more narrowly shared legislative goals.

"The 100 hours' agenda is really stuff that can be done quickly and have popular support and is not terribly complicated," said Samuel. "It's a down payment, there's a much larger agenda."

Samuel said that Congress has to tackle big economic issues related to wages, retirement security, and healthcare.

Both Samuel and Anna Burger, the secretary-treasurer of SEIU, said that Congress must take major steps toward providing universal healthcare coverage in the U.S.

"We need a healthcare policy that guarantees every man, woman and child in America has quality and affordable healthcare," said Burger, who also chairs Change to Win, a coalition of seven unions representing 6 million workers. "There have been lots of policies out there — it's a matter of political will to get the job done."

But legislation providing for universal healthcare coverage will be expensive, and Democrats have promised to pass budget rules that would require all new spending to be paid for.

Asked how to pay for expanded healthcare, Samuel said "We have to review tax cuts for the wealthy."

Samuel said that unions would also press for Congress to allow Bush less freedom to negotiate trade agreements, noting that Bush's so-called fast-track trade negotiating authority expires in June.

"They need to set negotiating objectives that are enforceable," he said of Congress.

Unions will also lobby for Democrats to pass the Employee Free Choice Act, which Burger said would protect workers who want to join unions from employer intimidation. That bill is expected to draw strong opposition from Republicans and industry groups.

Culture-war Veterans Hold Fire, For Now (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 29, 2006

After a long battle with conservatives on social issues and judicial nominations, Democratic-aligned interest groups are hailing the coming congressional changeover and weighing exactly how and when to exert their influence.

Republican control of the Capitol may have forced abortion-rights and civil-liberties advocates to play perpetual defense, but those wilderness years also gave the groups valuable practice at building coalitions across the aisle and branding themselves as more mainstream than their conservative counterparts.

Now, as Democrats prepare to assume the majority, these veterans of the culture wars are seeking to shape the agenda of the new leadership. Democratic lawmakers have outlined ambitious goals on Iraq and economic policy, however, challenging their interest-group allies to pick their battles without adopting the confrontational tactics that many believe helped derail the GOP.

"We're definitely taking a look at the way conservative groups approach" abortion, said Donna Crane, government relations director at NARAL Pro-Choice America. "Specifically, we are going to not do what they do, which is use this issue for political gain."

NARAL has aimed its recent efforts less at preserving women's right to an abortion than at making the procedure, as former President Clinton first put it, "safe, legal and rare." One of the family-planning packages strongly backed by NARAL and Planned Parenthood boasts as its chief sponsor new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who describes himself as pro-life.

That "prevention-first" approach is designed to win support from both Democratic and Republican abortion opponents in both parties, capitalizing on the defeat of anti-abortion initiatives in South Dakota, Oregon and California. Jackie Payne, government-relations director at Planned Parenthood, predicted that the Reid bill, which "polls extremely well," would gain freshman supporters next year.

"I don't think we need to play games," Payne said. "I honestly believe we're going for such a common-sense agenda … We don't have to look to [conservatives] for strategies."

Conservative groups of all stripes, from the Concerned Women of America to the Committee for Justice, found common ground this session in the campaign to confirm Supreme Court Justices John Roberts and Samuel Alito as well as a slew of federal circuit nominees whose conservative records alarmed Democrats and civil-liberties groups alike. Yet a Senate Judiciary Committee gavel held by Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) does not herald an interest-group role reversal, said Elliot Mincberg, vice president and legal director at People for the American Way.

"The basic M.O. and attitude is a little bit different" among liberal-leaning groups active on nominations, Mincberg said, adding that "you're not going to see us saying the harsh things that some of the Manny Mirandas of the world have said." Miranda, a former Senate GOP leadership aide, earned a reputation for aggression as head of the conservative Third Branch Conference.

Mincberg, like several fellow advocates, also asserted his willingness to disagree with Democrats when necessary. Democrats will face their first civil liberties test on the Bush administration's program of surveillance without warrants — which the Justice Department inspector general this week began investigating — as well as on the White House-pushed detainee trials bill that Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) has proposed rolling back.

"Were going to push just as hard on the Democrats … as we did on the Republicans," said Caroline Fredrickson, Washington director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Their voting records on our scorecard are definitely better, but that does not mean they're perfect."

Fredrickson pointed to a different risk for interest groups looking forward to a Democratic Congress — that activists might become less eager to pressure a party perceived as more friendly. "We're not willing to wait," she said.

The Judiciary chairmanship belongs to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) for at least one more week, a narrow window in which to take up six hotly contested judicial nominations that the White House resubmitted to the Senate just after the election. Specter has expressed an intention to vote again on the six while acknowledging the emboldened opposition from Leahy and other panel Democrats.

"The White House can send these nominations up to the Hill, but that does not mean they're going to be taken up," said Dick Woodruff, senior legislative adviser at Alliance for Justice. "Gridlock for the next two years would be fine [on judicial picks]."

Woodruff said he would be watching closely as Democrats weigh "how far they are willing to go" in revisiting the detainee bill, a move likely to spark a veto threat from Bush that would require 16 Senate Republican votes to override.

On gay-rights issues, such as employment non-discrimination and expansion of the hate-crimes law, Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese took a respectful view of the long to-do list facing his Democratic allies.

"One of the most important things we can do is be sensitive to the fact that the new leadership in this Congress, [Speaker Nancy] Pelosi [D-Calif.] and Reid, have a huge responsibility to speak to the issues the American people couldn't have been clearer about in putting them there: the war in Iraq and corruption in government," Solmonese said.

Though the gay community might see its issues move lower on the priority list, Solmonese said, such pragmatism is a small price to pay to end the Republicans' prolonged attacks on gay marriage. The page he plans to borrow from conservative groups' playbook: "Be really smart and be really strategic."

Like abortion-rights groups, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence has used the Republican majority to develop a political strategy with bipartisan appeal that it will continue to pursue. Reinstating the lapsed assault weapons ban, a high priority for many urban Democrats, is outranked on the Brady Campaign agenda by boosting law enforcement funding and strengthening background checks.

"My goal is to get us to a position where both Republicans and Democrats are coming to us and asking for our endorsement," Helmke said. "That hasn't really been the case."

DOJ_NMG_0099602

Endorsements and contributions often help bolster interest groups' influence with lawmakers. The groups consulted for this story that maintain PACs gave more than $1.6 million this cycle, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, but only two GOP recipients of their largess, Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Deborah Pryce (Ohio), who will cede her leadership post next year, won reelection.

Senate Leader-elect Sets Agenda (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry Reid said Tuesday he's doing away with the "do-nothing Congress" that Democrats campaigned against and plans to keep senators working long hours — focusing first on ethics, the minimum wage and stem cell research.

The Nevada Democrat said he would tackle those priorities after cleaning up the "financial mess" the outgoing Republican Congress is leaving behind, a reference to nine long-overdue spending bills covering 13 Cabinet departments for the budget year that began Oct. 1.

"They're just leaving town, it appears," Reid said during an interview with The Associated Press in his Capitol office. "And so we're going to have to find a way to fund the government for the next year."

The must-pass legislation totals more than $460 billion and could divert time from other items on the Democratic agenda. "It's certainly not going to help it," Reid said.

He is wrapping up his final days as Senate minority leader. He will assume control of the Senate's agenda on Jan. 4, when the next Congress convenes with 10 new senators, at least 52 new House members and Democrats holding majorities in both houses for the first time since 1994.

"We're going to put in some hours here that haven't been put in in a long time," Reid said. That means "being here more days in the week, and we start off this year with seven weeks without a break. That hasn't been done in many, many years here."

Reid said he hopes President Bush is willing to work with Democratic congressional leaders, but he added that the early signs have not been encouraging. He said the White House has not reached out to him since his meeting with Bush in the Oval Office on Nov. 10.

"He said when I met with him after the election he wanted to work together, and I told him, `Mr. President, you said that two years ago and we haven't gotten anything done,'" Reid said.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said lawmakers have been out of town for most of the time since the Nov. 10 meeting and the president has been traveling abroad. He said Bush "has been very forthright in his interest in having a bipartisan dialogue on the Hill. That wasn't just a gesture in the days after the election — that was an authentic, sincere effort."

Reid said he hoped Bush would use his State of the Union address before Congress early next year to lay out plans for health care, retirement security, decreasing dependence on foreign oil, reducing government deficits and, most importantly, Iraq.

He said the Senate will conduct hearings to investigate problems in Iraq but Democrats have no immediate plans to cut spending on the war.

"Now he's the commander in chief, and we're not going to do anything to limit funding or cut off funds, even though there are some on the outside who suggest that," Reid said. "I think we want to make sure that the troops have everything that they need."

With only a two-seat majority and a Republican president with veto power, Reid's Democrats will have an incentive to work with political opponents to get their priorities into the law books.

Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, whom Republicans voted to be their minority leader in the new year, said while he and Reid are not going to agree on every item, they agree on the need for bipartisan achievements on special spending bills and other matters.

"Earmark transparency is a good start, but I would also like to see us find common ground on Social Security, homeland security, extending tax relief and other major issues that we can't just kick down the road," McConnell told the AP.

Bush used the only veto of his presidency so far to reject a bill passed by Congress last year that would have expanded embryonic stem cell research through government funding.

Supporters of such research say it could lead to treatments and cures for a wide variety of ailments, including Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases as well as spinal cord injuries. Bush and abortion foes, however, have opposed expanding embryonic stem cell research because the embryos die in the process of harvesting the stem cells from them.

Fratto said Bush gave the matter deep thought and consulted with researchers and religious leaders on the moral and ethical implications of his position. Reid said he hoped the president "will relent and see the light."

DOJ_NMG_0099603

In the meantime, Reid said the Senate is "not even close" to having the two-thirds vote necessary to override Bush's veto but he hopes some Republicans will join the Democrats after the GOP's election losses this month.

He pointed to Missouri, where the issue helped pro-stem cell candidate Claire McCaskill defeat incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who said embryonic stem cell research destroys human life at its earliest stages.

The midterm election came on the heels of several ethical scandals involving lawmakers, and Reid said reform is needed. He said "the first thing we do" will be to require lawmakers to put their names on "earmarks" — spending items added to bills that often help a specific company or project in their districts. Bush supports such transparency, Fratto said.

Citizens Against Government Waste, a taxpayer watchdog group, said there were 9,963 such projects in the spending bills for the 2006 budget year, costing $29 billion.

The third item at the top of Reid's agenda is increasing the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour. It's also one of several measures that Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi has promised to bring to the House floor in the first 100 hours that chamber is in session. Fratto said Bush is willing to support an increase in the minimum wage, although he doesn't want to publicly debate the amount and wants to make sure it won't hurt small businesses.

McConnell Pledges Cooperation (WP)

By Eric Pianin

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Sounding a conciliatory note, the new Senate Republican leader vowed yesterday to work with Democrats to pass a minimum-wage increase and a strong ethics reform package shortly after the new Democratic-controlled Congress begins work next year.

Senate Minority Leader-elect Mitch McConnell (Ky.) described as "easy stuff" much of the Democrats' opening agenda, including a proposal to boost the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour and a congressional ethics package that would ban gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, as well as impose new controls on the budget deficit. These issues, however, have not proved to be easy before.

McConnell said he is urging bolder action. He challenged House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to push for a long-term solution to financing the Social Security system and for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. Democrats in the current Congress blocked President Bush's proposal to partially privatize Social Security, while an impasse between House and Senate Republicans over approaches to immigration changes thwarted a deal.

"One thing I hope we can do, now that we have the election out of the way, is see if we can quit kicking the can down the road on a number of significant issues," McConnell told a meeting of Washington Post editors and reporters. "Left over from last year, I would put immigration at the top of the list. But I also share the view . . . that this would be the perfect time to tackle Social Security."

While some fear that the new Congress will become a political battleground in the run-up to the 2008 presidential campaign -- with at least eight Democratic and Republican senators considering bids for the White House -- McConnell asserted that a grand deal on Social Security is still possible, even with a Democratic-controlled House and Senate and a Republican White House. He noted that divided government did not prevent President Ronald Reagan and a Democratic Congress in 1983 from striking a landmark deal ensuring the long-term solvency of Social Security.

McConnell said the two parties should be open to a wide range of approaches -- "I don't think we should rule anything in or out."

In recent days, Bush and senior administration officials have revived talk of reaching an accord on an overhaul of Social Security that would maintain the program's solvency beyond the baby boom generation's retirement. In an interview with The Washington Post last week, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., the president's point man on Social Security, promised that the White House will enter talks with Democrats with "no preconditions." That is a significant shift for Bush, who had previously said that any Social Security legislation would have to include private accounts that would allow workers to divert some of their payroll taxes to investments in stocks or bonds.

McConnell added another concession yesterday, saying that Social Security legislation should "solve the problem as far into the future as possible" -- a standard that is far more flexible than Bush's insistence on nothing short of a "permanent" fix.

McConnell, 64, will succeed Sen. Bill Frist (Tenn.) as the Senate Republican leader in January, when Frist steps down to explore a possible bid for the GOP presidential nomination.

The Kentucky lawmaker, like Reid, is a consummate dealmaker whose top priority is legislative achievement. They both rose through the Senate ranks by mastering the rules and building strong relationships with colleagues. Both are combative lawyer-politicians who overcame childhood challenges and are now in their mid-60s. Unlike Frist, a surgeon, McConnell and Reid are veteran practitioners of the Senate's opaque, clubby brand of politics, with no apparent desire to become president or grab television time to espouse their parties' goals.

Yesterday, McConnell said he and Reid "have a good relationship" and talk practically every day that the Senate is in session. He said that he and the new majority leader are determined to avoid legislative gridlock in the coming Congress.

In a wide-ranging session, McConnell said that although a majority of voters voiced their discontent with the administration's Iraq war policies, he doubts the Democrats can muster support for a resolution setting a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. troops. He said that Republicans would back a boost in the minimum wage, but that it would have to be linked to a GOP priority, such as a tax cut for small businesses to ease the impact.

For Fiscal Conservatives, Losing May Be Liberating (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

All Republicans had a lousy November. For fiscal conservatives, the gloom only started on Election Day, when the GOP lost control of Congress.

Conservative candidates suffered humiliating losses in the House GOP leadership elections. Democrats threatened to govern from the center, turning conservatives into a minority of the minority. Milton Friedman, the patron saint of free-market economics, died on Nov. 16. Just yesterday, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) declared to the New York Daily News editorial board that "Reaganomics is dead."

But does that make the glass half empty, or half full?

In Congress, the minority life is mostly talk and little action, and yet for advocates of minimal spending and low taxes, that may not turn out to be so bad. It's easier to promote fiscal discipline in theory than to practice it as a party leader or committee chairman. Remember that $200 million-plus "Bridge to Nowhere" in Alaska? It still makes conservatives cringe.

"Now that Republicans are in the opposition, they're going to be the most saintly budget hawks you can imagine," said American Enterprise Institute economist Kevin A. Hassett. With the absence of power, he notes, comes the absence of accountability and blame. As Hassett put it, "being in the minority means never having to say you're sorry."

Fiscal conservatives started to agitate days after the election, when the Republican-led 109th Congress reconvened to wrap up unfinished business. At the top of the to-do list: nine remaining spending bills for the fiscal year that started Oct. 1.

Few Republicans returned to Washington expecting to complete all the outstanding bills. But many wanted to pass at least a few, if only to show that the GOP wasn't abrogating its governing duties. But several fiscal conservatives in the Senate saw an opportunity to take a stand against "earmarks," the special projects that members from both parties had tucked inside the bills. The rebels announced their intention to block all spending bills from advancing -- even one that financed veterans benefits and military housing.

"We need to examine the bills in the light of the last election, in which I think the American people were unhappy with our spending habits," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) explained to reporters. He and his allies, including Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), want Congress to pass a "continuing resolution" to extend funding from the previous fiscal year. "We'd save the taxpayers a lot of money," Sessions said.

Their quest has reinvigorated fiscal conservative groups such as the Club for Growth, which suffered several major election defeats this year. "The Senate showdown on earmarks is next week," the club's blog reported yesterday. "The good guys, Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, are battling the appropriators and the big spenders." The article warned, though, that the continuing resolution "isn't a done deal."

A chief target of the budget hawks is a group of Democratic House freshmen who won seats in conservative districts, including the Florida seat that was held by disgraced Rep. Mark Foley, and Tom DeLay's former seat in Texas. Republicans call these "rented seats" and hope to win them back in 2008.

"Democrats aren't going to want to make massive cuts," said Stuart Roy, a longtime senior Republican House aide who works as a public-affairs consultant. Back in the GOP-minority days of the 1980s, House Republicans sought to force Democrats to vote against small spending reductions, often fractions of a percent. But as Roy pointed out, these little-noticed maneuvers helped Republicans build a case that Democrats' spending habits had spiraled out of control.

"Spending cuts resonate in a macro sense, especially if you can show they are tied specifically to waste," he said.

The trick, Roy added, is to avoid programs that happen to be popular, such as public television funding. "There will be a substantial number of people who will want to go out and do that." That impulse should be resisted: "This is not a governing strategy, it is a minority strategy."

Another enticing realm is taxes. In the 110th Congress, fiscal conservatives will act as chief defenders of the numerous temporary tax cuts that Republicans have passed since President Bush took office. Breaks that benefit wealthy individuals are particularly unpopular with Democrats, but particularly cherished by fiscal conservatives, who believe low tax rates at the top of the economic ladder fuel growth.

The first showdown will come over the alternative minimum tax, which Democrats have vowed to address early in their tenure. Adjusting the tax so that it will not envelop another 20 million or so middle-class families will cost $50 billion-plus per year, official estimates show. The incoming House Ways and Means chairman, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), has vowed to pay for the fix, but that could be politically difficult.

"Rangel is going to need a really large tax increase to keep his promise," wrote Bruce Bartlett, a conservative economist, anticipating the Democratic dilemma with glee.

GOP's Bleak Retreat Into The Minority (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) expressed astonishment during a recent meeting of conservative lawmakers that Republicans would soon lose the room where members hold their regular Bible study, an aide present said.

On a similar note, Republicans across Capitol Hill have been forced to confront the unwelcome presence of Democrats touring their offices to map out arrangements for the coming Congress.

The Republican retreat from ornate leadership chambers and spacious committee offices has been a harsh awakening for members of the outgoing majority, but that is just one of the many difficult realities GOP members and staff must accept about life in the minority.

Still stinging from their midterm defeat, leaders in the House must rewrite the party's internal rules to adapt to their diminished status and reorganize the Steering Committee to decide who will serve on each committee and who will be the ranking Republican before slinking off to the offices allocated to them by Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

A small group of leadership aides in the offices of outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), incoming Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and outgoing Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) are leading that effort, but none of the major decisions is expected to be announced until early next week. Those aides are meeting throughout the week, leadership staff said.

The challenge for Boehner will be incorporating those Republicans left alienated by the results of leadership contests earlier this month while he secures his grip on GOP lawmakers in the House, aides said in the wake of those leadership elections.

A major fight is brewing among conservatives in the House to elect the next chairman of the Republican Study Committee.

Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) have been calling members of the increasingly influential committee to ask for their support in the election next Wednesday.

Conservatives were among the most affected by the results of the leadership contests, in which a slate of familiar faces convincingly defeated a handful of outspoken challengers, including Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the outgoing RSC chairman, and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), another staunch conservative. These candidates ran on a message of change following the midterm defeat but were rebuffed by their colleagues.

Shadegg, who lost his bid to oust Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) as whip, said one of the reasons members did not answer his call for change was because so many had just survived similar campaigns for change in their own reelection fights.

"I don't think they've had enough time to decide what the election means," Shadegg said moments after leaving the leadership race.

Hensarling has been an outspoken ally of Pence, who suffered a landslide defeat to Boehner in the leader's race. Pence and Hensarling led a small band of upstarts who, over the past two years, have waged public battles with the leadership over revised budget rules and federal funding for the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast. The Texas Republican also backed Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) in his confrontation with appropriators last summer over earmarks included in spending bills that reached the House floor.

Many staffers consider Tiahrt, an appropriator, as the leadership-backed candidate who would mute the influence of conservative agitators as Republicans try to unite in the minority.

"It's an effort to neuter the RSC," one aide said. "It's an effort to split the powerbase."

Tiahrt spokesman Chuck Knapp said his boss met with the group's three remaining founders because members asked him to run and that the Kansas Republican has not had any conversations with Boehner or his staff about chairing the RSC.

Hensarling, Tiahrt and Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), who would also like to be considered, met with the founders before Thanksgiving. In the past, those founders have nominated each incoming chairman, but leaders of the committee changed the rules under Pence to create the Steering Committee and to allow non-founders to nominate members before the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0099606

The remaining founders — Johnson and Reps. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) and John Doolittle (R-Calif.) — were expected to nominate Tiahrt, aides said before the holiday break, but that seems less certain this week, some of the same aides now say.

The founders are discussing options and could make an announcement before members return to Washington, aides said yesterday.

Retiring Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.) also plays an uncertain role in the nominating process because he will not be a member in the next Congress, but he has met with each of the candidates, aides said.

Knapp said his boss would "proudly accept" the founders' nomination but would not seek it on the floor if those lawmakers select someone else.

"There has been a process in place, and he is one to respect that process," Knapp said.

Rep. Tom Feeney's (R-Fla.) office distributed a "dear colleague" letter on behalf of Hensarling to members of the committee yesterday. Reps. Gresham Barrett (R-S.C.), Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Kevin Brady (R-Texas) and Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) joined Feeney, Flake, Pence and Shadegg on the letter.

"He's been very encouraged by the support he has received over the phone," Hensarling spokesman Brad Dayspring said.

One question heading into the race is how many members of the committee will vote. The official number hovers somewhere above 100, but only 40 to 50 members attend most meetings, with 80 to 90 attending some of the biggest.

There is grumbling that some members may leave the RSC if Tiahrt wins, creating an early divide among Republicans in the minority. Shadegg created similar grumbling before the 109th Congress until Pence was named chairman.

Other members are seeking colleagues' support for an impending decision by the soon-to-be-reconfigured Steering Committee about who will serve as the ranking Republican on the various committees.

Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.), for example, circulated a "dear colleague" to members of the Steering Committee highlighting his legislative accomplishments since 1993 and his television appearances during the last year in his own bid to be the ranking Republican on the International Relations Committee.

The Steering Committee is expected to look similar to the structure under Hastert, with leaders, regional reps and class reps expected to have one vote with Boehner holding more sway, aides said this week. Outgoing Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) will not have a vote because he is retiring from Congress, and many of the current leaders were replaced in the elections before Thanksgiving.

Senators Back More Funds For Social Security Administration (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

With spending bills apparently stalled, 54 senators have sent an appeal to the Senate leadership asking that the Social Security Administration receive adequate funding to avert workplace disruptions.

The senators -- 42 Democrats and 12 Republicans -- called for a fiscal 2007 appropriation that would add $401 million to the agency's administrative account. Without the money, Social Security would be forced to send employees home without pay and shut offices for 10 days next year, the senators said.

"A furlough of this scope and magnitude will create a significant hardship on the elderly and disabled persons who depend heavily on field office staff resources -- particularly those in rural areas who must travel long distances to access services," the senators said in a letter to Senate Republican and Democratic leaders.

Fears of the lack of spending bills -- or what those spending bills might bring -- are hitting other agencies. Except for the Defense and Homeland Security departments, Congress has not enacted the regular spending bills for the government, and some agencies are worrying about being caught in a pinch. Until budgets are settled, for example, the Energy Department has suspended employee bonuses, and the Labor Department has adopted a "soft freeze" on hiring.

Since Oct. 1, the agencies have operated under continuing resolutions -- interim funding bills known as CRs. They finance operations at the lowest of three possible levels -- the 2006 budget, the Senate's 2007 proposed budget or the House's version for 2007. Congress returns next week for what some Capitol Hill aides think will be a short legislative session, and it's likely that Congress will again put off budget decisions until next year. In that event, Hill aides predict, some small agencies could be at risk of layoffs or short-term layoffs, called furloughs.

The Food Safety and Inspection Service, for example, has no plans for furloughs, but more than 80 percent of its budget goes toward salaries and benefits. "When an agency has that large of a percentage going to salaries, and if there are salary increases that take effect in January, it will be difficult to make up the increase out of program costs," said Steven Cohen, senior press officer at the agency.

The Veterans Affairs Department has been counting on a $2.8 billion increase for veterans' health care in fiscal 2007. "Operating under a long-term continuing resolution will, before long, adversely affect the timely delivery of care and the effective and efficient management of the department," said Lisette Mondello, the department's assistant secretary for public and intergovernmental affairs.

The White House's Office of Management and Budget hopes to work with Congress on a solution that avoids staffing problems. "There is currently language in the existing CR that prevents furloughs, and we expect the next CR to address reductions in force," said Christin Baker, OMB associate director for communications. "If the government continues to operate under a long-term CR, we will work closely with agencies and lawmakers to ensure there are no major disruptions to essential government services."

Concern about the plight of Social Security has been mounting since mid-September, in part because it provides benefits to nearly 49 million Americans.

The Senate's bill for Social Security would provide $9.1 billion for the agency's administrative expenses, $401 million less than the president requested and $54 million below what was appropriated in fiscal 2006. The House bill would leave Social Security about $200 million short of what the White House is seeking.

Sens. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) organized the letter to Senate leadership. It pointed out that Social Security has been given additional work, such as handling the new Medicare prescription drug benefit, while coping with staffing shortages caused by previous budget shortfalls. New workloads and lack of staff "have slowed processing times for disability claims" and "lessened the quality of service" to the public, the letter said.

Asked about the letter, Social Security Commissioner Jo Anne B. Barnhart said she appreciated "the widespread bipartisan support for the president's budget request," which she said would allow the agency to provide "the public with the service they expect and deserve."

Jenny Manley, spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee, said the committee chairman, Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.), "is well aware of the needs of the Social Security Administration." Manley said: "Our preference would have been to address this in regular order and in an appropriations bill, but that does not seem to be in the cards at this point."

Bases Refuse Offering Of Nuns (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

AURORA, Colo. -- Three nuns were thwarted yesterday in their effort to pay their debt to society with food instead of cash when officials at two Colorado Air Force bases refused to accept their donations.

The Dominican sisters -- Carol Gilbert, Jackie Hudson and Ardeth Platte -- had collected thousands of cans of food in an effort to pay the military $3,082 in restitution for cutting through a chain-link fence at a Colorado missile silo in 2002.

The sisters, who each served jail time for the break-in, said they devised the plan because they could not in good conscience give money to the military. They are still awaiting court approval for their proposal.

But airmen at Buckley Air Force Base here turned away two pickup trucks loaded with thousands of cans of food yesterday, telling volunteer drivers that the facility had just received a large donation of food and had nowhere to store the nuns' delivery.

An hour later, officials at Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado Springs told volunteer Bill Sulzman that the facility couldn't accept a truckload of canned goods "because it was part of the restitution plan," he said.

Mr. Sulzman said he was surprised because he had coordinated the drop-off with a base sergeant.

He called the base's refusal "a political decision."

"Clearly, the decision at Buckley got back to Petersen and canceled the deal here," said Mr. Sulzman, who works for Citizens for Peace in Space. "It was a case of the chain of command overruling a lower-level decision to give food to lower-income Air Force families."

He then dropped off the containers of baby food, coffee and peanut butter at the ecumenical food bank run by Colorado Springs churches. The canned goods intended for Buckley were donated to a Denver rescue mission.

The nuns called the military's reaction disappointing but not entirely unexpected. The U.S. attorney's office here has said the restitution should be paid in cash, not food, although U.S. District Court Judge Robert Blackburn will make the final decision.

The sisters could return to in prison if they refuse to comply with the restitution requirement.

"Any effort to collect food for those in need is a tremendous gesture," U.S. attorney's office spokesman Jeff Dorschner said. "But it is the government's continued position that food should not count toward restitution."

He noted that fixing the fence at the Weld County, Colo., missile silo was paid for with cash.

"Real money was used to repair the damage done by the sisters, and the taxpayers should be reimbursed with real money," Mr. Dorschner said.

DOJ_NMG_0099608

Although the delivery didn't make it to its intended destination, the sisters argued that the canned food should count toward their restitution. As many as 30 percent of men who visit food banks are veterans, they said.

After the drop-offs, the sisters delivered a 19-page list of the donated canned goods to their probation officer.

"Some of this food will still get to people who are military veterans, and that's the best we can do," Sister Gilbert said.

Presidential Motorcades Can Be Dangerous (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - They look glamorous from the curb, exciting and powerful as they race through a city with lights flashing, sirens blaring and a very, very important person waving from inside an armored limousine.

But presidential motorcades can be dangerous. The most recent reminder: the death this week of a Honolulu motorcycle officer who was injured while escorting President Bush during a brief stop en route home from Asia.

Sure, the president is safe in his limousine - so safe that no one can remember a commander in chief buckling his seat belt.

But the rest of the entourage is at risk of accidents and injuries, and they happen more often than most people realize.

First are the motorcycle cops, usually local officers who block intersections along the route.

Once the motorcade passes them, they race ahead to block another intersection up the road. Rushing at speeds up to 85 miles per hour or more, even well-trained riders can have trouble on wet pavement or curves.

"You really get your adrenaline running. You're leaping from intersection to intersection, blocking traffic, and you're putting yourself in harm's way," said Jim Kelley, a retired Houston motorcycle officer who worked motorcades for presidents from Dwight Eisenhower through Gerald Ford.

"If it's raining, you've got to worry about the oil slicks. You've got to worry about railroad tracks. You're trained for it, but it's risky."

In Hawaii, Steve Favela, 30, suffered fatal injuries when he and two other officers crashed as the motorcade sped across Hickam Air Force Base on rain-slicked pavement. A fourth motorcycle officer suffered a broken wrist when he crashed while working a different Bush motorcade.

In New Mexico last February, a motorcycle cop was injured when he lost control and crashed into a wall while escorting a Bush motorcade on Interstate 25.

Another risk is the accordion effect, when the front of the motorcade slows or stops, and cars, vans and buses at the rear are following one another so closely and so fast - maybe 10 or 15 feet apart at speeds as high as 60 miles per hour - that they can't avoid a crash.

Last December, a Bush motorcade was two blocks from the White House when an ambulance crashed into a communications van, which in turn crashed into another van in front of it. There were no injuries.

Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce said the agency doesn't keep records of how many motorcades have involved accidents. "Thankfully, they usually don't include either fatalities or injuries," she said.

Still, they sometimes do.

In New Mexico in 1998, for example, two vans crashed into each other in a slow-moving motorcade carrying then-Vice President Al Gore down wet roads from the Albuquerque airport. That crash in turn caused three motorcycle cops to spin out, injuring all three officers.

In California in 1996, a bus at the end of a Bob Dole presidential campaign caravan had to slam on the brakes when the front end of the police-escorted motorcade slowed abruptly. NBC reporter Kelly O'Donnell flew through the aisle of the bus, suffering bruises and a broken clavicle when she landed.

Making matters even dicier, Secret Service agents drive only the "control package" or "secure package," consisting of the president's limo and a few vehicles in front of and behind him.

"Those guys are the best, finest, most well-trained drivers for that kind of circumstance in the world," said John Podesta, a White House chief of staff under Bill Clinton. "But that's only about eight vehicles."

The rest of the motorcade, which often numbers 20 or more vehicles - vans carrying local guests, White House aides and the news media - are driven by volunteers or locally hired drivers.

"You're at the mercy of volunteers," Podesta said.

The risks of motorcades aren't unique to the United States.

In Malaysia last year, a police officer crashed into a cow while escorting a sultan's motorcade. The police officer was injured. The cow died.

Bernanke: Economy Slowing As Expected (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, November 29, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday that risks from inflation or a worse-than-expected housing slump could further complicate things for an economy that already is in slowdown mode.

"The deceleration in economic activity currently under way appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned," Bernanke said in his most extensive comments on the economy since the summer. The slowdown in overall activity mostly reflects the housing slump, he said. As the economy cools, inflation also should continue to gradually ease over the next year or so, the Fed chief added.

Yet, "substantial uncertainties" surround the Fed's outlook, Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the National Italian American Foundation in New York.

The slowdown in the once sizzling housing market could turn out to be deeper than expected, putting an even greater drag on overall economic activity. Or, Bernanke surmised, economic growth could rebound more strongly than expected, which could lead to a flare-up in inflation.

"A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome," he said.

Overall inflation has showed signs of improving in recent months as once surging energy prices have calmed down. However, "core" prices - which exclude energy and food and are closely watched by the Fed - still remain "uncomfortably high," Bernanke said. Looking ahead, Bernanke said he expects those core prices to moderate gradually over the next year or so.

But he made clear the Fed will be keep a close eye on the matter, especially on labor costs, which can spark inflation if they grow rapidly.

Although the Federal Reserve has left interest rates alone since August, Bernanke repeated the central bank's interest in keeping open the possibility of a rate increase down the road, if such action would be needed to fend off inflation.

To thwart inflation, the Fed had hoisted interest rates 17 times since June 2004, its longest string of increases in its history. With the economy slowing, the Fed has stayed on the sidelines since August. Many economists believe the Fed will keep its finger on the interest rate pause button it meets next on Dec. 12, the last such session this year.

Bernanke's remarks followed a batch of mostly downbeat economic reports issued Tuesday.

Orders placed to U.S. factories for manufactured goods plunged in October by the largest amount in more than six years. The median price of an existing home sold last month dropped by a record amount. And, consumer confidence in the economy sank in November.

Economic growth during the July-to-September quarter slowed to a pace of just 1.6 percent, the most sluggish in more than three years. That mostly reflected the housing slump. Investment in home building was cut by the largest amount in 15 years.

"The slowing pace of residential construction is likely to be a drag on economic growth into next year," Bernanke predicted. Even though there are signs that the demand for homes is stabilizing, builders still need to work off a bloated inventory of unsold homes and that will take time and further adjustments, he said.

The Fed chief added that even with the drag on the economy from the housing slump and a struggling auto sector, the jobs climate is still fairly healthy.

The nation's unemployment rate sank to a five-year low of 4.4 percent in October and workers' wages grew solidly. Those factors should help cushion the blows to the economy from the housing slump, Bernanke said.

Bernanke: Inflation 'uncomfortably High' (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 29, 2006

The economy is growing at a "solid pace" outside of housing and manufacturing, but a key inflation measure remains "uncomfortably high," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday.

In a speech to the National Italian American Foundation in New York, Bernanke said it would be "especially troublesome" if price pressures don't moderate, as the Fed has forecast. He said the sputtering housing market will be a drag on growth into 2007, even if sales stay near the current pace. “Overall, the economy is likely to expand at a moderate pace going forward,” Bernanke said, adding that growth should accelerate over the coming year.

Economists interpreted Bernanke's comments as a sign the central bank is not likely to cut interest rates anytime soon and could be forced to raise them in coming months to keep price pressures under control. Although the Fed does not directly set mortgage or other private-sector loan rates, its short-term rate target is used as a benchmark when banks price consumer and business loans.

“Whether further policy action against inflation (to raise rates) will be needed depends on the incoming data,” Bernanke said, adding that the risks to the inflation forecast were “primarily to the upside.”

To control inflation and remove excess economic stimulus, the Fed raised short-term interest rates from a low 1% to 5.25% from June 2004 to June 2006. Economists polled by USA TODAY in October predicted the Fed would start cutting rates next year.

Stephen Stanley of Greenwich Capital Markets said Bernanke's remarks made it clear the “two policy options in the near term” are to leave rates alone or raise them.

The National Association of Realtors on Tuesday said existing home sales unexpectedly ticked up in October, though annual prices fell for a third-consecutive month (story, above). Also, the government said orders for long-lasting durable goods plunged 8.3% in October, the biggest drop since July 2000.

Overall, the economy grew at a slow 1.6% annual pace in the third quarter, down from the 5.6% rate of the first. Core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy, is running 2.7% annually, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort zone.

While falling energy and housing prices have taken some of the edge off inflation, the Fed is watching wage growth and the tight labor market. Rising wages help workers but could breed growing inflation if companies pass on labor costs via higher prices. Also supporting growth: The auto sector may be firming, and consumer spending has held up.

Bernanke Warns Inflation Remains A Significant Risk (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

In a contrast with the widely held view on Wall Street that slower economic growth will lead to interest-rate cuts, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke offered an upbeat assessment of the nation's economy, warning that tight labor markets could put more pressure on wages and prices.

Many investors point to declining housing construction, mixed news on holiday sales and a tame reading on inflation as indications that the economy is weakening, inflation risks are fading and that the next move by the Fed will be to cut interest rates, perhaps as soon as next spring.

However, Mr. Bernanke's hawkish message suggests rate cuts are unlikely in the months to come.

In his first major speech on the economic outlook since his testimony to Congress in July, Mr. Bernanke said growth outside of housing and autos remains "solid," underlying inflation "uncomfortably high" and that the choice before the Fed is whether to raise rates, not whether to cut them. Since June, the central bank has held its target for short-term interest rates steady at 5.25%.

"A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome," Mr. Bernanke told the National Italian American Foundation in New York yesterday. "Whether further policy action against inflation will be required depends on the incoming data."

Stock and bond markets barely reacted -- underscoring how, in recent months, Fed officials and investors increasingly have seemed to be looking at two different economies.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 14.74 points yesterday to 12136.45, after falling 158 points in the previous session. (See related article7.)

Long-term bond yields, which fell yesterday morning on news of a surprisingly large drop in durable goods orders, retraced only a bit of that decline after Mr. Bernanke's speech. Long-term bond yields tend to rise on expectations of stronger growth, higher inflation and higher short-term interest rates.

Indeed, futures markets still see a high likelihood of a rate cut in the next six months. Long-term bond rates, at 4.51%, remain well below short-term rates, a relationship that in the past has often foreshadowed recession.

"Market participants are simply much more pessimistic...and, clearly, not easily convinced that the chairman's sanguine outlook is the most likely scenario," said Stephen Stanley, an economist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Whether the Fed's optimism or the market's pessimism will prove correct remains to be seen. However, as long as investor pessimism keeps long-term rates, including mortgage rates low, that provides support to the housing market and makes it less likely the Fed will have to cut rates.

DOJ_NMG_0099611

Yesterday, Mr. Bernanke spotlighted the labor market as a potential source of inflation pressure. "It seems clear that labor costs...have been rising more quickly of late. Some part of this acceleration no doubt reflects the current tightness in labor markets," he said.

The unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October, well below the 4.75% to 5% range Fed officials had projected in July.

Mr. Bernanke raised the possibility that corporations could absorb higher labor costs without raising prices by reducing their profit margins, which now are relatively wide. But "the more worrisome possibility is that tight product markets might allow firms to pass all, or part of, their higher labor costs through to prices, adding to inflation pressures."

Charles Plosser, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, reinforced the Fed's hawkish message yesterday in a speech at the University of Rochester in Rochester, N.Y. "There remains some risk that policy is not yet firm enough to ensure a return to price stability over a reasonable time horizon," he said.

Economists themselves are divided on the outlook for the economy, with some predicting that a housing-led slowdown will intensify and others saying that low unemployment rates and buoyant financial markets will fuel a pickup in economic activity.

Economic data released yesterday provided ammunition for both sides. In October, orders for durable goods -- big-ticket items, such as machine tools and dishwashers, designed to last three or more years -- fell 8.3% from September, fueled by a steep drop in commercial airplane orders, the Commerce Department said.

Orders for capital goods, excluding defense and aircraft products -- a barometer of business spending -- fell 5.1%, the first decrease in six months. That was led by a 25.6% plunge in orders for computers and related products. Economic consulting firm Global Insight attributed most of that drop to Microsoft Corp.'s planned launch of a new operating system next year, which is causing some potential buyers to delay purchases.

Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc., said the latest data suggest that capital spending "won't provide as big of a cushion" as expected for an economy that is being undercut by a struggling housing market.

Separately, the Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group in New York, reported that its consumer confidence index fell to 102.9 this month from 105.1 in October.

On the positive side, the National Association of Realtors said sales of previously owned homes in October rose 0.5% from September to an annual rate of 6.24 million, the first monthly rise since February. But the median home price fell to $221,000, down 3.5% from a year earlier. That was probably the largest such drop since World War II, said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist. However, the latest decline followed an unprecedented multiyear run-up in prices.

Mr. Lereah said sellers in many markets have been cutting prices and those reductions, coupled with relatively low mortgage rates, have helped spur more sales. He attributed part of the decline in median prices to the fact the homes in lower-priced markets like Texas accounted for a larger share of sales than a year ago.

While buyers are creeping back into the market, the inventory of homes for sale rose 1.9% in October to 3.85 million, or a 7.4-month supply.

Since July, the Fed's forecast has been for economic growth to slow to slightly less than its long-term trend rate, taking some of the pressure off existing labor and business capacity. It expects the slowdown, coupled with the indirect effects of the recent decline in energy prices, should nudge core inflation down.

Mr. Bernanke said yesterday that the economy was broadly following that forecast. "Outside of the housing and motor-vehicle sectors, economic activity has, on balance, been expanding at a solid pace," he said. Trends in core inflation, which excludes food and energy, are less worrisome than in the spring, though at 2.7% in October, the rate "remains uncomfortably high."

The biggest risk to growth, Mr. Bernanke said, is that "the correction in the housing market could turn out to be more severe and widespread."

"The rate of home-price appreciation has slowed significantly," and the overhang of unsold homes is likely even larger than official figures show, he said.

Yet the Fed is clearly gaining confidence that housing won't experience a hard landing. While home construction will probably fall further to bring supply back in line with demand, Mr. Bernanke said demand for homes appears to have stabilized, thanks to lower mortgage rates and home prices.

Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, made a similar observation yesterday to another New York audience, saying the worst of the housing adjustment was over. But he added that the decline in prices might yet make consumers feel poor enough to depress their spending.

Mr. Bernanke said there is "little evidence" that a weak housing market is "spilling over more broadly to consumer spending or aggregate employment." As long as that remains true, he said, growth could reaccelerate in such a way that the economy starts to overheat, generating inflation pressure.

Fed Chief Optimistic Of Soft Landing (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The nation's central bank is growing more confident that the U.S. economy will slow gradually in a way that should cause inflation to decline without tipping the nation into a recession, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday.

"Over the next year or so, the economy appears likely to expand at a moderate rate, close to or modestly below the economy's long-run sustainable pace," Bernanke told the National Italian American Foundation in New York, in his most extensive remarks on the economy since July. Inflation "is expected to slow gradually from its recent level."

The primary risk to the Fed's forecast is the possibility that a tight labor market could push inflation higher than expected, which could prompt the Fed to raise interest rates, Bernanke said, according to a text of his prepared remarks.

Inflation "has been somewhat better behaved of late" but also remains "uncomfortably high," he said.

Bernanke delivered his speech just a few hours after two economic reports fanned concerns that the economy might be weakening further. The reports showed that new orders for long-lasting durable goods, including automobiles and appliances, fell sharply in October and that consumer confidence dipped in November.

The economy expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the three months ended in September, down from a 2.6 percent pace in the three months ended in June.

Bernanke did not directly address yesterday's economic statistics nor did he discuss a recent fall in the value of the dollar that could have wide-ranging effects on U.S. companies and workers.

He said the economic slowdown "primarily reflects a cooling of the housing market." He struck an upbeat tone, however, saying, "to date, there is little evidence that the weakness in housing markets is spilling over more broadly to consumer spending" or the labor market.

Bernanke's comments reinforced financial-market expectations that Fed policymakers will leave their benchmark overnight interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent when they meet in two weeks and hold it steady in the months ahead.

"The Fed is firmly on hold," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist for PNC Financial Services Group. He said Bernanke's remarks show that the Fed thinks "the economy is not snowballing down a slope toward a hard landing or a recession. There are plenty of cushions along the way."

The slower pace of home construction "is likely to be a drag on economic growth into next year," Bernanke said. But he also pointed to signs that home sales may be stabilizing. Sales of new homes rose in August and September, and sales of previously owned homes rose in October. Mortgage applications have been increasing since July.

Bernanke said most of the economy outside of the housing market "appears to be expanding at a solid rate." Many factories are churning out more goods for export. U.S. businesses are spending more on non-residential construction, equipment and software.

And consumer spending has continued to rise, buoyed by low unemployment, rising wages and falling fuel prices.

Rather than sound concerned about a slowdown, Bernanke suggested it was just what the Fed expected when it raised interest rates steadily over two years through June to keep the economy from overheating and driving inflation higher.

Markets Uncertain Despite Fed Comments (FT)

By Our International Staff

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Financial markets remained gripped by uncertainty over the outlook for the dollar on Tuesday, even as Ben Bernanke appeared to head off talk of imminent US interest rate cuts by warning that inflation remained “uncomfortably high”.

The dollar strengthened briefly on the comments by the Federal Reserve chairman, but they failed to claim the markets, with currencies still volatile in later trading.

The euro hit a 20-month high against both the dollar and the yen, while the pound rose 0.5 per cent to $1.9480. That brought it close to peak of 1.9548 reached on December 2004, the highest level since sterling was ejected from Exchange Rate Mechanism in 1992.

Bonds were also unsettled, while equities slipped back in early trading, and the cost of buying insurance against credit risk increased.

Speaking in New York, Mr Bernanke reassured investors that the outlook for the US economy remained fair, and the slowdown to more moderate growth was proceeding largely as expected.

DOJ_NMG_0099613

He said incoming data would determine “whether further policy action against inflation will be required”.

The speech follows days of jitters in financial markets, with investors betting that US economic weakness would force the Fed to cut interest rates next year, undermining the dollar.

Earlier in the day, fresh US data showed house sales inching up, but prices falling on one measure, with confidence weaker and a significant drop in durable goods orders.

While investors have been troubled by recent US data, however, Mr Bernanke said the slowdown “appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisaged in the Federal Reserve’s July report”.

His message was reinforced by Hank Paulson, US Treasury Secretary, who told reporters in London the US economy was making a “successful transition” to a more sustainable rate of growth, and by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which said the outlook for the world economy remained bright.

Releasing its twice-yearly outlook, the OECD said it saw signs of a smooth rebalancing of global economic growth, with faster growth in Europe offsetting much of the slowdown in the US.

Jean-Philippe Cotis, the OECD’s chief economist, said there were signs that the growth of global trade imbalances had now stopped, raising the chances of a benign outcome.

Attributing the recent fall in the dollar to signs of economic strength in Europe and elsewhere, he added: “Even a smooth adjustment of imbalances has to start somewhere...we are not yet in a position where the depreciation of the dollar suggests people are fleeing the US.”

Blue Chips Stage A Slight Recovery Despite Glum Signals On Interest Rates (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Stocks edged higher despite troubling comments about interest rates from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke.

The gains erased little of Monday's steep market drop, which included a 158.46-point decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. After sliding further in early trading, the blue-chip average ended the day up 14.74 points, or 0.1%, at 12136.45, 13.2% higher for the year. Among the Dow's strongest components was Exxon Mobil Corp., which rose 2.3%, helped by the second consecutive rise in crude-oil prices.

Forecasts of colder weather in the Northeastern U.S. and continuing supply worries drove crude futures contracts for January delivery up 67 cents, or 1.1%, to $60.99 a barrel, now off just 0.1% for the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also opened the session lower but climbed 4.82 points for the day to end at 1386.72, up 11.1% for the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.69 points to 2412.61, up 9.4% for the year. Both were up 0.3% for the day.

In a speech to the National Italian American Foundation in New York, Mr. Bernanke said that inflation remains "uncomfortably high" and that the main decision facing the central bank is whether to raise interest rates to keep the economy in check, not whether to cut rates to stimulate further growth.

Wall Street likes low interest rates because cheap borrowing costs encourage spending by businesses and consumers.

Tobias Levkovich, chief U.S. equity strategist at Citigroup, said Mr. Bernanke's comments probably disappointed investors who had been hoping for a Fed cut sooner rather than later, perhaps early in 2007. On the other hand, he said the speech and recent data released by the government signal that Wall Street's hopes for a gradual slowdown in economic growth are coming true.

"The economy hasn't collapsed," Mr. Levkovich said. "Housing prices are off, but that hasn't really hurt the consumer. Employment is still solid, consumers have income and they're spending it."

Housing data released yesterday by the National Association of Realtors showed an increase in the number of new homes sold in October, but a steep drop in home prices. The median new-home price fell 3.5% from the year-earlier period, to $221,000, a record-setting third straight decline in that measure.

With the holiday shopping season in full swing, many analysts are watching closely for any sign that consumers might curtail their spending. In a glum development along those lines, the Conference Board reported that its consumer confidence index slipped to 102.9 in November, worse than analysts had expected.

For the Dow, the rise yesterday halted two consecutive days of declines, and the average now is 206.11 points below its record close, established less than two weeks ago, on Nov. 17.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, declined 0.3%, or 0.7 point, to 231.45.

Existing-Home Sales Climb, But Prices Show Record Drop (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

New data offered a mixed picture of the housing sector's condition as home sales picked up, but prices fell. Meanwhile, the first look at business investment in the fourth quarter revealed a sharp pullback, indicating that business spending won't lend as much support to economic growth as some analysts had been expecting.

The National Association of Realtors reported that previously owned home sales rose 0.5% from the previous month to a seasonably adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million units, which is up from an upwardly revised September sales pace of 6.21 million.

It's the first monthly rise in sales that the trade group has reported in eight months. But the national median home price plummeted 3.5% to $221,000 from a year ago -- the largest year-over-year price drop since the trade group began keeping records in 1968, and "it's probably the largest price drop since World War II," said David Lereah, NAR's chief economist. It follows a 2.2% price decline in September and a 1.7% drop in August.

Mr. Lereah said sellers in many markets have been cutting prices and that, coupled with relatively low mortgage rates, have helped spur more sales. But he also attributed part of the median price decline to the fact that there were a greater number of lower priced homes and fewer high priced homes sold in October than a year ago. He said sales in markets such as Texas, where home prices are lower than many U.S. markets, were fairly strong in October. That strength contributed to the overall mix of more lower-priced homes selling.

Mr. Lereah also said prospective buyers of high-priced homes in once hot markets are more likely to wait to buy in anticipation of further price declines than first-time buyers who may be buying a home because of a job change.

While the slight uptick in sales suggests buyers are creeping back into the market, the inventory of unsold homes remains relatively high. Total housing inventory rose 1.9% in October from the previous month to 3.85 million existing homes for sale, which represents a 7.4 month supply at the current sales pace. Economists said that weak condominium and co-op sales -- which declined 4.8 % in October from the previous month-- weighed heavily on the overall housing market. By comparison, single family home sales -- which make up the bulk of housing sales -- rose 1.3% in October.

While the improved sales pace could help prevent job losses in industries heavily tied to housing, such as furniture and mortgages, Mr. Lereah said "the wealth effect of housing right now is certainly turning negative," because of the price declines.

Decline in Durable Goods

Durable-goods orders fell 8.3% last month to a seasonally adjusted $209.97 billion, reflecting a steep drop in commercial airplane orders, the Commerce Department said Tuesday. That was the sharpest drop since July 2000. Moreover, "core" orders of capital goods, a barometer of business spending that excludes defense and aircraft products, fell for the first time in six months, underscoring widespread weakness. New orders for core goods fell 5.1% in October, as orders for computers and related products plunged 25.6% last month. Core orders had risen by a monthly average of 1.1% in the nine months through September.

Economists at consulting firm Global Insight said computer orders likely dropped sharply because Microsoft Corp. is introducing a new computer operating system in 2007, which may have caused companies to delay computer purchases. Meanwhile, orders for communications equipment and fabricated metals also fell last month.

Yesterday's report surprised analysts, who had been expecting business spending on core goods to continue growing at a steady pace, a development that has helped the economy soften the blow of this year's housing industry contraction.

Business orders last month were "far, far weaker than expected" said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc. The report suggests that capital spending will weaken in the current quarter and that "it won't provide as big of a cushion" for an economy being undercut by a struggling housing market, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0099615

Following yesterday's report, Mr. Hoffman lowered his forecast for economic growth in the fourth quarter to 2.25%, on an annualized basis, from roughly 2.5%. Last week, many other forecasters lowered their estimates of fourth-quarter growth after the Commerce Department reported that construction of new homes slid to a six-year low in October.

Separately, The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group, reported that its consumer confidence index fell to a reading of 102.9 this month [Nov] from 105.1 in October.

Home Prices Fell At Record Pace In October (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

U.S. existing home prices dropped a record 3.5 percent last month, compared with the same month a year earlier, while the total number of residences sold fell 11.5 percent compared with October 2005, according to an industry report released yesterday.

Nationwide, the median price of a single-family home, condominium or cooperative apartment dropped to $221,000 last month from $229,000 in October 2005, according to a report by the National Association of Realtors, a trade group representing U.S. real estate agents. The median is the point at which half the homes sell for more and half for less.

The largest drop in sales prices -- 7 percent, or double the national average -- came in the South, which includes the Washington area.

In a rare piece of good news for the beleaguered U.S. real estate industry, however, sales of existing homes rose 0.5 percent from September to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.24 million in October, the first monthly increase since February, the report said.

Pat Vredevoogd Combs, president of the Realtors' group, attributed the October uptick in sales volume to "sellers cutting their price enough to encourage sales."

By region, home sales rose 6.4 percent in the West; were flat in the Midwest; fell 2.9 percent in the Northeast; and declined 1.2 percent in the South, according to the trade group's report.

David Lereah, the group's chief economist, predicted a sales rebound during the first three months of next year.

"The demographics of our growing population, historically low and declining mortgage interest rates, and healthy job creation mean the wherewithal is there to buy homes in most of the country, but many buyers remain on the sidelines," Lereah said in a statement. "After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007."

Lereah also predicted home-sale prices will experience "modest appreciation" in the early spring.

Other reports have noted some variation in sales volume and prices around the region. Prices have dipped more in Northern Virginia and the District than in much of Maryland.

While median home prices rose 6.7 percent in Prince George's County, 1.95 percent in Anne Arundel County and 0.70 percent in Montgomery County over the past year, they fell 6.4 percent in Northern Virginia, 11.8 percent in the District and 10.8 percent in Loudoun County, according to the Metropolitan Regional Information Systems, the region's multiple listing service.

Prices Of Existing Homes Plummet (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, November 29, 2006

Prices of existing homes — which fell a record 3.5% last month — will likely drop further through year's end, delivering the bitter medicine needed to restore the health of the housing market, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday.

The median price fell in October for a third-consecutive month, to $221,000, as sellers were forced to cut prices. Those price drops, coupled with a dip in mortgage rates, seem to be reviving sales. Existing home sales ended a six-month losing streak in October, unexpectedly inching up 0.5%.

Prices still have further to fall, says David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. But, he notes, the faster they fall, the faster the correction in the home market will end. “The correction is working, and sales are stabilizing,” Lereah says. “That's good news for the economy.”

In the meantime, buyers in many areas continue to enjoy an advantage. They have an ample 7.4-month supply of homes to choose from, and, “Sellers will have to overcome their state of denial and start dropping prices even more to clear this market,” says Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors. “And once that happens, we will then have to convince buyers that prices have stopped falling. We are a long way from that point.”

DOJ_NMG_0099616

Fear of falling prices keeps Christopher Robinette awake at night. Robinette, a 25-year-old engineer, wants to buy his first house in Reno but frets: “I don't want to buy and have the value of the house go down and then try to sell it at a loss. I have a job where I have the potential to move, and the value of homes is unstable at this point, and that makes me hesitant.”

The median price for an existing single-family home in October was $221,300, down 3.4% from October last year. Sales of existing single-family homes rose 1.3% from September, though they were down 11% from October last year. Condo owners felt even more pain. The median price skidded 5.3% to $214,300. Sales fell 4.8% from September and 14.5% from 2005.

Today, the Commerce Department will release October sales figures for new homes. Those figures are expected to show more weakness.

Hardest hit last month were homeowners in the South, where the median price plunged 7% to $185,000 from a spike in October 2005. Sales in the South were down nearly 9% from a year ago. A big drag on the region: sales in Florida, which tumbled 22%.

One surprise was in the West, where prices were nearly flat at $340,000, despite chronic affordability problems for the working class. Sales actually rose 6.4% from September to October. California's median price, the highest in the nation, gained 2% to a wallet-draining $548,680 in October from October last year.

“I am so confused about California,” Lereah says. “You really expect California to have a big price correction. And that's not happening.”

Existing Home Prices Tumble Despite Sales Uptick (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

Nationwide existing home sales rebounded last month but the median sales price took its biggest year-over-year decline in nearly four decades, according to real estate figures released today.

In California, October results were the opposite, with sales, excluding condominiums, slipping 0.3% from the previous month and the median sales price gaining 2% from October 2005 to $548,680, according to the California Assn. of Realtors.

Nationally, sales of existing homes, including condos, rose 0.5% in October from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted, annual rate of 6.24 million units, according to the National Assn. of Realtors. It was the first monthly increase since February.

However, the sales pace remained below last year's level and prices also tumbled for the third consecutive month. In October, the median price fell 3.5% from the same month last year to $221,000, according to NAR.

The median is a typical market price, where half of the homes sold for more and half sold for less.

The modest rebound in sales may indicate that the nationwide housing slow down might be bottoming out — but any noticeable relief for sellers probably won't come until next year, according to some housing observers.

"After a period of price adjustment, we'll see more confidence in the market and a lift to home sales should be apparent in the first quarter of 2007," NAR economist David Lereah said in a statement. "The annual decline in the October median home price is skewed because there was an uncharacteristic spike in October 2005, but the trend for the fourth quarter will be prices remaining slightly below a year ago. Overall prices are projected to see modest appreciation around early spring."

But other economists say a turnaround is still far away, with many signs pointing to a buyer's market for some time to come. For example, the inventory of unsold homes, increased 1.9% in October to 3.85 million existing homes.

"There is little chance of significant near-term relief, and we expect prices to continue falling at an accelerating rate for both single family and condo homes," said Ian Shepherdson, an economist with High Frequency Economics.

In California, it took significantly longer to sell a home compared to a year ago, when sales were near record highs. Last month, the median number of days it took to sell a single-family home was 57, up from a revised 34 from a year ago.

Officials with the California Assn. of Realtors were also cautious about the outlook.

"While it appears that home sales have stabilized over the past three months, it's too soon to say whether or not the market has bottomed out," CAR President Colleen Badagliacco said in a statement. "We do expect smaller year-over-year declines in home sales for the remainder of the year.

On a regional basis, the West reported the strongest results, with existing-home sales in October rising 6.4% from the previous month. The median price, however, sank 0.6% from October 2005 to $340,000. The California Assn. of Realtors was scheduled to release statewide figures later today.

In other economic news today, new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said that a slow down in economic activity is taking place as expected but warned of economic "uncertainties."

"The deceleration in economic activity currently underway appears to be taking place roughly along the lines envisioned," Bernanke said in prepared remarks to the National Italian American Foundation in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0099617

Yet, "substantial uncertainties" still cloud the economic outlook, Bernanke said in an account by the Associated Press. "A failure of inflation to moderate as expected would be especially troublesome."

In a separate announcement, the Commerce Department said today that orders for durable goods fell by a larger than expected 8.3% in October from the previous month as demand for such items as commercial aircraft and computers waned.

Dollar At 20-Month Low Vs. The Euro (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 28 -- The U.S. dollar fell to a 20-month low against the euro Tuesday, the latest development in a year-long currency readjustment that could make some imported goods more expensive, but could also help American workers by boosting exports.

Traders are not entirely sure why the currency is falling, but several pointed Tuesday to signs of economic weakness in the United States and strength in Europe. That is fueling expectations that interest rates will rise in Europe relative to the United States, prompting investors to move assets out of dollars.

Many economists welcomed the decline. Despite six trading days of fairly sharp drops, they say, the dollar remains significantly overvalued against other currencies, making U.S.-made goods more expensive on world markets while encouraging imports.

That, combined with the willingness of U.S. consumers to continue spending despite rising debt, has helped to give the United States a trade deficit expected to reach $900 billion by the end of the year, according to the International Monetary Fund.

"The strength of the dollar has contributed to this historically high trade deficit," said William R. Cline, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in the District. "The dollar needs to fall, and that should be seen as a good sign, not a bad sign."

At the close of trading here Tuesday, one dollar was worth 0.758 euro, a drop of about 12 percent since December 2005. The rapid movement in recent days, though eliciting considerable attention from traders, has amounted to a drop of less than 3 percent. Economists say that is too small by itself to make much of a dent in the trade balance.

Moreover, changes in foreign exchange rates typically take from nine months to two years to be reflected in business and in the price of goods on shelves because orders and investment decisions are made months in advance.

"The movement so far is negligible," said Desmond Lachman, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. "That's going to do nothing in terms of adjusting the U.S. balance."

President's Bush's Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., reacted to the decline by speaking Tuesday of his support for a "strong dollar." That is a ritual that Treasury secretaries have followed for years -- they cannot welcome declines for fear of precipitating a rout of the currency. As he said the words, though, Paulson was preparing for a trip to China, during which he plans to press officials there to raise the value of China's currency, and thus lower the value of the dollar. Such a move would boost the U.S. competitive position in global trade.

U.S. manufacturers have complained that China keeps its currency too low on world markets, making Chinese goods artificially cheap and taking jobs from U.S. workers.

"China is the real problem," Lachman said. "That's where the real friction is going to occur."

In recent years, as the U.S. trade deficit has swelled and as fast-growing Asian countries -- not least, China -- have captured a greater share of commerce, economists have grown increasingly fretful about the imbalances imperiling the global economy.

According to economic textbooks, when a country runs a large trade deficit, its currency is supposed to feel downward pressure. The United States has defied this economic truism in recent years. China and Japan have plowed the spoils of their burgeoning exports into U.S. Treasury bills and other dollar-denominated investments, propping up the dollar, helping keep U.S. interest rates low and fueling consumer spending in this country. That has boosted imports from Asia, sending more dollars there and keeping the cycle going.

Economists assume the imbalances cannot last forever. China has amassed a pile of foreign exchange reserves exceeding $1 trillion. The U.S. current account deficit, which is calculated as the trade deficit plus capital transferred across borders and interest on investments, is expected to reach $870 billion by the end of the year, according to the IMF. That is about 7 percent of the total output of the U.S. economy.

The Bush administration asserts that this is an endorsement of the economy, with foreigners continuing to express confidence in the United States as a place to invest. Economists say that, one way or another, balance will be restored, with a significantly weaker U.S. dollar.

Kristin Forbes, a former U.S. Treasury official and now a business professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, estimated that the dollar would have to drop to 30 percent from 20 percent against major currencies to trim the current account deficit to 4 percent of the overall economy.

The key question is how and when the adjustment comes: Policymakers want an orderly and gradual decline in the dollar as opposed to a sudden collapse. The latter could jack up interest rates and send housing prices plummeting, while diminishing demand for the Asian exports that have propelled growth across the Pacific.

On Tuesday, economists said the dollar's recent drop against the euro looks more like the next phase of a gradual decline than the beginning of a disastrous unraveling. But much depends on the psychology of traders, particularly as there is talk that China and other countries are moving to diversify their holdings, putting some of their savings into currencies other than the dollar.

"There is a risk that if the financial markets feed on this, you could have quite a bit of turmoil," said Edwin M. Truman, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute.

Traders and analysts said the recent flight from the dollar largely reflects expectations that the U.S. economy will continue to grow more sluggishly than the global economy in the months ahead.

Investors' concerns about U.S. economic weakness were fanned Tuesday by reports showing that new orders for durable goods, such as automobiles and appliances, fell sharply in October, and that consumer confidence slipped lower in November.

Many investors think that the Federal Reserve will hold interest rates steady for a while and that it is likely to cut rates next year. In contrast, the European Central Bank appears likely to continue boosting interest rates in the 12-country zone that uses the euro currency, enhancing the return on investments in that region.

"That's definitely a key relationship," said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Henderson reported from Washington. Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

The Devaluationists (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

The dollar's recent weakness against the euro and other currencies has brought out the usual suspects to blame the usual suspects. That is, the crowd that has long believed the greenback needs to be devalued because of the large U.S. trade deficit is declaring that day has finally arrived. The fact that the dollar has held up well for years despite the trade deficit doesn't seem to matter to this conventional wisdom.

Our view is simpler: When U.S. economic policies look like they might take a turn for the worse, dollar-denominated assets lose some of their allure. So, for example, when the new Democratic majority in Congress talks about raising taxes on capital gains and dividends, investors in U.S. financial and corporate assets get the jitters. And when U.S. monetary policy accommodates more inflation, investors also look for other places to put their marginal cash. Talk of a tax increase has certainly been in the news in recent weeks, and the jury is still out on the Federal Reserve's resolve to correct its inflationary easy-money blunder of 2003-2005.

On one issue we do agree with the trade-deficit devaluationists: The margin for error in American economic policy has been reduced. There are many more places, such as China and the former Eastern Europe, where high returns can be had. The euro has also emerged as a potential alternative as a reserve currency.

That's all the more reason for Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to say, as he did yesterday, that a strong dollar is "clearly in our nation's interest." Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke also sounded the right note in saying that inflation remains too high and the Fed will be vigilant in seeing it fall. The dollar's fate is very much in our own hands.

GOP Senatorial Committee In The Red (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 29, 2006

The Republicans' senatorial campaign arm, which lagged behind other national party committees in fundraising the past two years, emerged from the Nov. 7 election in debt and is soliciting donations to get out of the red.

In an urgent appeal to donors this week, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, beseeched contributors to "help us retire our debt."

"If we let this debt linger, it will cripple our efforts to recruit great candidates for the next election and begin our drive to win the one additional seat we need to regain the Senate majority," Dole wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0099619

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the letter, which was confirmed by NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne. "We do have a debt, as Senator Dole noted," Ronayne said.

Ronayne would not divulge the amount of the debt. Party committees are required to file postelection financial reports with the Federal Election Commission on Dec. 7.

As of Oct. 18, the date of the last financial reports to the commission, the NRSC had $8.9 million of cash on hand. At that point in the two-year election cycle, it had raised $77.9 million and spent $70 million.

Of the six Republican and Democratic Party committees, however, the NRSC had been the least successful in raising contributions. Its Democratic counterpart, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, had raised $103.9 million by Oct. 18. According to their financial reports, Democratic senators were far more generous in contributing to the DSCC than Republican senators were in giving to Dole's committee.

In her letter, Dole said she authorized the committee to go into debt to make a last-ditch effort to win close races.

The NRSC obtained significant help from the Republican National Committee, which in the final week of the campaign targeted Senate contests in Missouri and Tennessee. In that same week, the NRSC spent about $5 million in losing Republican efforts in New Jersey, Virginia, Montana, Maryland and Rhode Island.

Wulsin Concedes To Schmidt In Ohio (AP-Y)

AP, November 29, 2006

Three weeks after Election Day, Democrat Victoria Wulsin conceded to Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt on Tuesday but suggested that she might run again.

The Associated Press declared Schmidt the winner Nov. 21 after the first provisional ballot tallies were reported in the 2nd District, but Wulsin said then that she wanted to make sure all ballots were counted before conceding.

"I definitely want to try again," Wulsin said.

Wulsin conceded just before Clermont County reported final unofficial results that showed Schmidt with an overall total of 120,112 votes, or 50.5 percent, to 117,595 votes, or 49.5 percent for Wulsin.

"I've worked hard in Congress for the people of southern Ohio, and I look forward to continuing that work thanks to the confidence that the voters have shown in me," Schmidt said in a statement.

Schmidt, a backer of President Bush's Iraq policy, gained national attention in Congress last year with a verbal assault on the House floor against Rep. John Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and decorated Marine veteran who served in Vietnam. Of Murtha's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq, Schmidt said: "Cowards cut and run. Marines never do." She later apologized.

Vote Disparity Still A Mystery In Fla. Election For Congress (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Nov. 28 -- Almost since the time the votes were tallied here on election night, the race for Florida's 13th Congressional District has been surrounded by a contentious mystery:

Why were there no votes for Congress recorded from more than 18,000 people who chose candidates in other races?

The answer is central not only to the outcome of the election, which for now has been won by Republican Vern Buchanan by a mere 369 votes and is in litigation, but also to the ongoing debates over whether the electronic voting systems in use nationwide can yield reliable tallies and recounts. Coincidentally, the latest dust-up has occurred in the contest for the seat being vacated by Katherine Harris, who presided over Florida's election apparatus during the much-disputed 2000 contest between President Bush and former vice president Al Gore.

So far, there are three theories, and lots of political and legal posturing.

Maybe, as scores of voters have claimed, there were glitches with the touch-screen systems and they dropped votes.

Or maybe voters overlooked the congressional race simply because of a confusing ballot design.

Or maybe, as some say, an astoundingly high number of Sarasota County residents decided to forgo voting in the high-profile race.

On Tuesday, as state election officials here ran a mock election to test the machines for defects, there were no clear answers. By evening, as clerical workers input votes, no major problems were reported with the machines, but the review will continue through the week.

"Our analysis of the results shows that something went very wrong," said Kendall Coffey, an attorney for Buchanan's challenger, Christine Jennings. He played down the significance of the tests, saying they did not faithfully replicate the voting because the state clerical workers were presumably more adept at the machinery than voters in general would be.

Hayden Dempsey, an attorney for Buchanan, said: "There is nothing wrong with the machines, as these tests show."

The essence of the dispute arises from the fact that once all the votes were counted in the Nov. 7 election, a troubling anomaly appeared in the tally.

More than 18,000 people who had voted in other contests did not have selections recorded in the congressional race.

The phenomenon of voters casting ballots without making selections in every race is known as "undervoting," and it happens in virtually every big election, particularly in contests for lesser-known offices that some voters ignore.

But the magnitude of the undervoting in the Buchanan-Jennings race was startling -- about 15 percent of those who cast ballots in Sarasota. By contrast, it was about 2.5 percent among voters in other counties.

Jennings has filed a lawsuit alleging that thousands of Sarasota County votes were not counted because of "the pervasive malfunctioning of electronic voting machines." The county tilts in her favor.

The broken-machine theory is backed by two voting experts and scores of sworn statements from voters who had trouble with the machines, Coffey said. The Sarasota Herald-Tribune has reported that more than 100 have reported problems with the machines.

But other experts who have analyzed the ballots and the results argue that the culprit might be not the machines but rather voters confused by a poorly designed ballot.

The congressional race appeared on the same screen as the gubernatorial contest, which had a brighter banner and took up more space.

Ted Selker of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a director of the CalTech/MIT Voting Technology Project, said that tests in his lab have shown that as many as 60 percent of voters can miss races when they are displayed in such a manner.

If the missing votes were caused by ballot design, that is bad news for the challenger, because it is more difficult under Florida law to challenge an election because of ballot design or voter confusion.

Jennings's legal team has dismissed the idea of a bad ballot.

"I don't see any history to show that, with a highly visible, hotly contested race like this, voters are going to fail to find it on the ballot," Coffey said. "It's just not such an awful ballot design that you can explain the disappearance of 15 percent of the votes."

The final theory, that the missing votes reflect many voters' disgust with the aggressive campaigns, is largely dismissed by many experts. It seems extremely unlikely, they said, that only Sarasota County residents decided not to vote.

Like many here, Joan Tallman, 70, a retired bank vice president, said she was appalled and mystified by the trouble.

"Funky machines? I don't know," she said, shaking her head. "But a lot of those votes didn't count."

2008 Candidates Search Web For Next New Thing (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Former Sen. John Edwards's favorite books include "The Trial of Socrates," "God's Politics" and "Into Thin Air." His favorite musician is Bruce Springsteen. His heroes are his wife, Elizabeth, and the American people.

How did this information about a likely 2008 presidential candidate become public? Through MySpace.com, a networking website where Edwards (D-N.C.), like former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), has set up pages to tell people about himself. Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) has 6,000 friends on his page at Facebook.com. Visitors to those pages can join the candidates' "networks" and candidates can use the sites to communicate with narrow groups of likely voters.

Ret. Gen. Wesley Clark (D) has focused his efforts on podcasting, creating an audio message that his supporters can listen to at his website or download from Apple's iTunes. Clark has the second most listened-to podcast among likely 2008 contenders, after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), as measured by iTunes.

Seemingly overnight, the Internet has changed politics and the course of campaigns. The 30-second television advertisement has been a staple of campaigning for decades. But last summer, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) made YouTube a must-use campaign website. The site allows users to post and circulate video instantly, and Allen was caught on videotape calling S.R. Sidarth, a volunteer of Indian descent for Sen.-elect Jim Webb (D-Va.), "macaca," which was said to be a racial insult.

Candidates face a serious challenge from the new ways people gather information and news. Fewer people are watching network television or reading major newspapers, turning instead to the Internet. This trend has left candidates hustling to figure out how technology can help them communicate with a fragmented audience.

"The way to get it back is to develop a message and put it out across different channels," said Jerome Armstrong, a consultant to former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner's (D) political action committee, Move Forward Together. "Those are the two overriding big things out there. The key is having a message broadcast all in sync. I'm not sure how it's going to get done."

Armstrong and other technology-savvy aides said candidates must integrate all of the different messaging platforms — blogging, instant messaging, text-messaging, social networking — with a campaign's field and communications programs.

"It's not about technology. It's the principles behind the technology," said Peter Daou, a consultant to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). "What campaigns miss are the principles about how this bottom-up approach works."

"Having a MySpace profile is great, but it's kind of a like [having] a phone and voter file and not using them together," said Matt Burgess, an associate with the media-consulting firm of MacWilliams, Robinson & Partners.

Potential 2008 candidates have been searching for talented whiz kids who could thrive in both Silicon Valley and Capitol Hill.

Warner's hire of Armstrong, a cofounder of the liberal blog MyDD.com, created buzz in the mainstream media and blogosphere. President Clinton hosted a lunch in his Harlem office in September for bloggers. Several sources said that Nicco Mele, the CEO of EchoDitto, an internet strategy firm, and Howard Dean's webmaster when Dean was running for president in the 2004 cycle, has let it be known that he wants to work for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) if he runs for president.

Clark does not rely on consultants. His supporters have created pages at MySpace.com and Facebook.com, said Erik Mullen, Clark's spokesman.

The search for new organizing tools continues. One new fad, used by a handful of campaigns in 2006, is the use of technology that lets candidates create an incentive program for online supporters. New software would let campaigns measure a volunteer's level of activity and reward him or her with campaign paraphernalia.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), who defeated three candidates to win reelection, created the Perry Alliance Network, a system for online supporters to help the campaign and earn T-shirts and bumper stickers.

The Michigan Coalition for Progress, a liberal 527 group and a client of MacWilliams, Robinson & Partners, held a text-messaging contest and awarded two iPods to the winners.

Another new enthusiasm appears to be for "virtual campaigning" on websites such as Second Life, a virtual world with more than 1.6 million users where Warner first campaigned for and then later explained why he decided to drop out of the 2008 race.

Social networking sites carry some risks for candidates because political opponents can use material against them. Some candidates banned their 20-something-year-old aides from using MySpace or Facebook because they feared their opponents would use the content against them.

Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) said some Republican activists criticized him because his 20-year-old daughter's Facebook profile included a photo of her holding a beer.

Hagel's Moment? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

A month ago the idea that Sen. Chuck Hagel would make a serious run for the Republican presidential nomination would have been a non-starter. As an outspoken critic of President Bush on Iraq and other issues, Hagel's way was blocked. His best hope was nomination by a quixotic third party in an online convention.

It's a measure of the step change brought about by the Nov. 7 elections that Hagel is now seriously exploring a GOP presidential bid. The Republican blowout, he says, reflected a "breakdown of confidence and trust in governance" and opened the way for what he believes will be "the most wide-open presidential race since 1952." The Nebraska senator says he will make a formal decision in the next two months on whether to run.

What would make a Hagel candidacy interesting is that he can claim to have been right about Iraq and other key issues earlier than almost any national politician, Republican or Democratic. Though a Vietnam veteran and a hawk on many national security issues, he had prescient misgivings about the Iraq war -- and, more important, the political courage to express these doubts clearly, at a time when many politicians were running for cover.

Hagel warned about the dangers of invading Iraq in a Feb. 20, 2003, speech in Kansas. He noted that America stood "nearly alone" in advocating military force to disarm Iraq and cautioned against "a rush to war." Some of Hagel's premonitions were almost eerie: "What comes after Saddam Hussein? The uncertainties of a post-Saddam, post-conflict Middle East should give us pause, encourage prudence and force us to recognize the necessity of coalitions in seeing it through." He urged the Bush administration to transfer postwar oversight to the United Nations as soon as possible, and he admonished Iraq boosters to "put aside the mistaken delusion that democracy is just around the corner."

Hagel was also early to understand the importance of talking to Iran, another idea that has since become commonplace but at the time took political guts. In a July 10, 2003, speech on the Senate floor, he said that a direct U.S. dialogue with Tehran about the nuclear issue might be necessary. In a Nov. 15, 2005, speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, he was emphatic: "The fact that our two governments cannot -- or will not -- sit down to exchange views must end."

Such outspoken criticisms of Bush policies had put Hagel outside the respectable Republican perimeter -- until Election Day. Hagel delivered his own blunt postmortem in a Nov. 16 speech to a conservative political action committee, GOPAC. The message of the election, he said, "is the American people saying you failed." Republicans had become so focused on keeping power that "we came loose of our moorings."

Hagel went on to criticize his party's failings in language you rarely hear in the usual pre-masticated sound bites of today's politicians. On GOP ethics lapses: "When you blow past the ethical standards and you play on the edge of legality, you're in trouble." On Bush administration foreign policy: "You cannot have a foreign policy based on divine mission. We tried that in the Middle Ages, that's what the Crusades were about."

It strains credulity to imagine that a GOP controlled by Bush and Karl Rove could learn to love Hagel, but, as the Nebraskan says, this is a time of "transformational politics." A more practical problem is that if Hagel does decide to seek the nomination, he will be competing for the same niche as the GOP front-runner, Sen. John McCain, who has been on his "straight-talk express" longer than has Hagel. And although McCain's centrist halo has been tarnished by his efforts to woo the far right, he remains a far more polished speaker and campaigner than Hagel. But on Iraq, Hagel has a clearer stance than does McCain, whose call for a big increase in troops is out of step with both the recommendations of U.S. military commanders and the public mood.

Hagel likes to evoke the Republicanism of Dwight Eisenhower, another former military officer who could be devastating in his criticism of the policies advocated by the military-industrial complex. "This was a real Republican president," he told the GOPAC audience.

Will that pre-Reagan Revolution message play to the party faithful in Iowa and New Hampshire in 2008? Will the Bush administration's problems become so severe that Republicans would embrace a senator from the radical center? The very fact that Hagel is mulling a campaign reminds us that American politics turned a corner this month and that we are in new territory.

Women Want A Woman President (HILL)

The Hill, November 29, 2006

Almost a hundred years ago, Sigmund Freud famously asked, “What do women want?” In political terms, the answer is unmistakable: What women want is a woman president. And their voting preferences are showing how strongly they feel.

According to the Gallup Poll of November 9-12, both Democratic and Republican women disproportionately support their party’s potential female candidates. While it has not been unusual to see polls showing a bias by female voters in favor of women who run on the Democratic Party line, most of these surveys have failed to distinguish whether it is party or gender that is attracting female voters. And, until recently, Republican women have not shown a preference for a female candidate.

But the Gallup Poll tested Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a Democratic primary field and Condoleezza Rice in a Republican match-up. Among both sexes, Hillary ran first in her party with 31 percent of the vote, followed by newly hyped Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) at 19 percent, John Edwards, likely benefiting from his wife’s best-selling book, at 10 percent, Al Gore at 9 percent and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), probably suffering from his foot-in-mouth disease, back at 7 percent.

On the Republican side, Rudy Giuliani led with 28 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) at 26 percent, Rice at 13 percent, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) at 7 percent, outgoing Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney at 5 percent and soon-to-be-former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) at 4 percent.

But since both fields are cluttered with possible non-candidates, the real relevance of this survey is to demonstrate the impact of a female candidate on voters of both parties.

Hillary was favored by 38 percent of the women in the Gallup Poll’s Democratic Primary match-up but got only 23 percent of the men. On the Republican side, Rice won 18 percent of the women and only 8 percent of the men.

Such a dramatic gender gap, on each side of the partisan divide, illustrates the power of a woman candidate, from either party, running for president.

Remember that women are 52 percent of our population, 54 percent of the registered vote, and usually between 55 percent and 56 percent of actual turnout.

Indeed, so powerful is the female vote that it is credited with swinging two of our last three presidential elections. In 1996, it was the soccer moms who turned away from the abstract “family values” of the Republicans to embrace the more pragmatic and specific child- and education-focused programs of the Clinton administration. In 2004, these same moms, now designated “security moms,” turned away from the bite-sized measures of the Democrats and voted for the tough anti-terrorist policies of George Bush.

Nineteen million single women voted in 2000 and 27 million came out in 2004. If a woman runs for president, it stands to reason that such turnout will rise still further. If single women vote in proportion to their share of the national population, they could account for 32 million votes in 2008. Since women who are either divorced, widowed, or never married voted Democratic by a two-to-one margin in 2004 and 2006, it is likely that this influx of single women will be crucial to Hillary's candidacy (or to Rice's if she decides to run).

In our male-dominated political world, where pundits speak mainly to one another and confirm each other's wisdom, we do not fully appreciate the power of a woman candidate. Single moms, disproportionately in poverty, burdened by the need for good daycare and schools, often rotting in minimum-wage jobs, are natural fodder for a woman Democrat who can identify with their plight and focus on their needs. The cultural outpouring that would likely greet the first woman to be nominated by a party to run for president would probably drive these women out in droves to vote and participate in the political process.

It could be that women get what they want in 2008.

Anti-Clinton Donor Reported As Donor To Giuliani As Well (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

A leading organizer of a political action committee created to derail Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects is also a major contributor to Rudolph W. Giuliani, according to campaign finance reports.

The organizer, Richard Collins, a principal figure behind the group Stop Her Now, has given $10,000 to Mr. Giuliani's political action committee Solutions America over the last two years, according to campaign finance disclosure documents.

On a Web site postedMonday, the Stop Her Now group says that its goals include attempting "to shed light on the real Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America."

Mrs. Clinton's advisers predicted the group's efforts would fail. "As the last campaign demonstrated, attempts to throw around inaccurate, distorted charges about Hillary's record are not going to impress the public," said Ann Lewis, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Clinton, referring to her re-election victory earlier this month.

While the Giuliani camp has no direct connection to Stop Her Now, some Democrats argued yesterday that Mr. Giuliani — who seems poised for a possible presidential run of his own — should disavow the personal nature of the criticisms that the group is leveling at Mrs. Clinton.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, declined to comment.

Stop Her Now is among the newest of the so-called 527 advocacy groups whose prominence has grown in recent years. These partisan groups, known as 527s because of the tax code that governs them, have helped Democrats and Republicans raise enormous sums of money and energize their political bases.

The groups began playing a more prominent role in 2004 after new federal campaign finance laws prohibited major donors, unions and corporations from giving unlimited amounts of money to parties. Many of those donors, in turn, began contributing large sums of money to 527s instead.

In the case of Stop Her Now, Mr. Collins, a wealthy Texas businessman, funneled $80,000 into the group's coffers in the last few months, making him the group's single largest donor in the third quarter of 2006, according to the disclosure documents.

The group has struggled to raise money and gain attention since last year, when Arthur J. Finkelstein, a longtime Republican strategist, began lining up donors to help the committee wage a campaign against Mrs. Clinton's 2006 Senate re-election bid.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Collins, a Republican activist, said he hoped to line up "a couple of hundred thousand donors" to help finance his group in advance of a possible presidential run by Mrs. Clinton. He said Mr. Finkelstein was a close personal friend and described himself as the chairman of the Stop Her Now organization.

Second New Leader Resigns From The Christian Coalition (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

For the second time in little more than a year, the Christian Coalition of America named a new leader and then removed him before he ever fully took the reins of the conservative political advocacy group.

DOJ_NMG_0099624

The Rev. Joel Hunter, pastor of a nondenominational megachurch in Longwood, Fla., said he resigned as the coalition's incoming president because its board of directors disagreed with his plan to broaden the organization's agenda. In addition to opposing abortion and same-sex marriage, Hunter, 58, wanted to take on such issues as poverty, global warming and HIV/AIDS.

"My position is, unless we are caring as much for the vulnerable outside the womb as inside the womb, we're not carrying out the full message of Jesus," he said in a telephone interview yesterday. "They began to think this might threaten their base or evaporate some of their support, and they said they just couldn't go there."

Roberta Combs, chairman of the coalition's four-member board, said that Hunter "is still a good friend" but that they agreed during a Nov. 21 conference call that "it would be best for everyone" if he did not become president.

The Christian Coalition announced Hunter's appointment in early October, and he was scheduled to take over day-to-day operations from Combs on Jan. 1. In the interim, his positions in favor of tackling global warming, increasing the minimum wage and opposing the death penalty were reported in The Washington Post and some other newspapers, causing unrest among the coalition's grass-roots supporters.

Four state chapters -- in Alabama, Georgia, Iowa and Ohio -- have broken away from the national organization in recent months, and some of the mutinous state leaders cited Hunter's pronouncements as a factor.

"We have been wanting to broaden our agenda for some time," Combs said. "But there's a way to do that. We wanted to survey our supporters first and make sure they're on board on new issues. Joel saw it differently -- he just wanted to go out and do it."

Founded in 1989 by the Rev. Pat Robertson, the Christian Coalition was once a powerhouse in domestic politics with a budget that reached $25 million a year in the mid-1990s. But since Ralph Reed left as its president in 1997, it has fallen on hard times, running up more than $2 million in debt, according to tax filings.

Hunter had offered to work for the coalition with no salary while remaining pastor of his Northland Church near Orlando. He said finances were not the reason for his early departure.

"I got a look at who they owed money to. It's sobering," he said. "But with the right leadership and the capability of rebuilding a grass-roots organization, it's not insurmountable. My church budget is $15 million a year. . . . It's not too intimidating for me to think I could have raised that kind of money."

According to some former officials of the Christian Coalition, the turmoil at the top reflects Combs's reluctance to yield control. In September 2005, she named Jason T. Christy as the coalition's executive director, a new position. Three weeks later, he resigned.

Christy, 36, owns a Scottsdale, Ariz., media company that publishes a daily Christian newsletter and a monthly magazine called the Church Report. He said yesterday that Combs had promised to step aside and let him run the Christian Coalition but that he quickly discovered she was "a micromanager" with "a narcissistic leadership style."

Christy added that his political views are far different from those of Hunter, author of a book called "Right Wing, Wrong Bird: Why the Tactics of the Religious Right Won't Fly With Most Conservative Christians."

"In terms of Hunter, they picked the wrong captain for the wrong ship," he said. "The title of his book alone tells me that they did not do their due diligence."

Hunter said he made clear from the moment that Combs approached him about the job in April that he wanted to pursue a broad agenda of "compassion issues."

"I hope we can break out of 'liberal' and 'conservative.' I'm not sure when compassion became fitted under 'liberal,' " he said. "There are many Christians, especially in their twenties and thirties, who don't care about liberal and conservative. They just see that if you're going to love your neighbor, you have to address things like the environment."

Initially, Hunter added, Combs "seemed to be interested" in his approach. "But I think it's very difficult once you have poured your life into an organization to transfer authority to someone else," he said.

Bush Wants More Countries In Visa-waiver Program (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 29, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday that he wants more countries in a program that allows foreigners to stay in the USA without visas, despite criticism that the move could open the door to terrorists.

“We want people to come to our country,” Bush said in Tallinn, Estonia, one of several European countries that have asked to be included in the visa-waiver program, in which 27 foreign countries now participate. “It's in our nation's interest that people be able to come and visit.”

DOJ_NMG_0099625

Bush said his administration aims to add more countries to the program, created to facilitate tourism and business travel 15 years before the 9/11 attacks increased fears of terrorism. He pledged to ensure that "those that want to continue to kill Americans aren't able to exploit the system."

Under the program, citizens from visa-waiver countries can travel to the USA for up to 90 days without a visa. To be eligible, countries must prove that only a small percentage of their citizens violate the terms of their visas and only a small percentage are rejected when they apply for them. Residents of waiver countries don't have to go through the time-consuming security interviews and checks required for those who must apply for visas.

Critics blasted Bush's plan as an expansion of a dangerous loophole in the nation's effort to secure its borders. Several terrorists — including shoe-bomber Richard Reid and 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui — boarded planes to the USA with passports from visa-waiver countries.

"That's a step in the wrong direction," said Clark Kent Ervin, former inspector general at the Homeland Security Department. "We ought to be ending the visa-waiver program, not expanding it. There's a reason why terrorists are keen to obtain passports from visa-waiver countries: They don't have to undergo extensive security checks."

In September, the Government Accountability Office found that "stolen passports from visa-waiver countries are prized travel documents among terrorists, criminals and immigration-law violators."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said any expansion of the program must include measures to make the USA safer. Among such measures would be a requirement that countries provide more information about airline passengers before takeoff so that U.S. officials would have more time to check their names against terrorist watch lists, he said. "I want a net increase in security," Chertoff said.

The travel industry backs Bush's plan. Rick Webster of the Travel Industry Association said, "The program is essential. It facilitates almost two-thirds of overseas travel. It's good for our economy and … our diplomatic efforts. The end of the program would mean tens of billions of dollars in lost revenue and a worsened U.S. image."

Visa Waivers May Be Offered To More Nations (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

The Bush administration will ask Congress to change and expand a program that allows citizens of some countries to enter the United States without visas. In exchange, the U.S. government would require visitors to provide more data about themselves before they board planes.

During stops yesterday in Latvia and Estonia, President Bush told officials of those countries that he would try to persuade Congress to add countries to the visa waiver program.

In a statement, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that in addition to being expanded, the program should be changed to increase security. For example, participating nations would be asked to quickly provide information on lost or stolen passports.

Officials did not say which other countries the administration might try adding to the program. Countries from Central and Eastern Europe have expressed interest in entering the program, which lets travelers enter the United States with only a passport.

The visa waiver program was created in 1988 and was originally focused on preventing illegal immigration into the country. But since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the focus has shifted to security, and the program has been altered several times in hopes of strengthening the government's ability to detect and deter terrorists.

The program applies to citizens of 27 countries traveling to the United States for 90 days or less for tourism or business, said Homeland Security spokesman Jarrod Agen. About 15 million people visit the country under the program each year.

Bush Seeks To Ease Visa Requirement (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 29, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush said yesterday he will push Congress for a "loosening" of requirements for foreigners to visit the United States without a visa, pitting him against those who have called for the program instead to be tightened or even scrapped altogether after September 11.

The Visa Waiver Program allows visitors with valid passports from 27 approved countries to enter the United States for up to 90 days without a visa. That makes tourism and business travel easier by eliminating the need for a visa, though such travelers can avoid a security screening.

DOJ_NMG_0099626

After meeting with Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves in Tallinn, Mr. Bush said he will press Congress to revamp the program to allow more countries to join.

"I'm going to work with our Congress and our international partners to modify our Visa Waiver Program," Mr. Bush said. "It's a way to make sure that nations like Estonia qualify more quickly for the program and, at the same time, strengthen the program's security components."

But the proposed expansion would run athwart concerns that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) cannot keep up with the 27 countries already approved, as the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative branch, found in a July report.

"DHS cannot effectively monitor the law enforcement and security risks posed by visa waiver countries on a consistent, ongoing basis because it has not provided [the Office of International Enforcement] with adequate staffing and resources," GAO investigators concluded, adding they also found "weaknesses" in how DHS talks with overseas posts working on visa issues.

European Union officials have complained that while U.S. nationals can visit any of the 25 EU member states without a visa, only 15 of these countries receive reciprocal privileges from the United States. Mr. Bush discussed the problem with EU officials at a July summit in Vienna, Austria.

Exclusion from the waiver program is a point of contention in former communist bloc countries such as Estonia, Poland and Hungary that have become staunch U.S. allies in the war on terrorism.

Mr. Bush said the economic and political progress those nations have made earns them the privilege of participating in the program.

"Both the [Estonian] president and the prime minister made this a important part of our discussions," he said. "They made it clear to me that if we're an ally in NATO, people ought to be able to come to our country in a much easier fashion."

Mr. Bush said he wanted to "assure members of Congress that in loosening the visa-waiver issue, or changing the visa-waiver issue, that we'll still be able to protect our country from people who would exploit the Visa Waiver Program to come to our country to do harm."

Among the current requirements is that the visa-refusal rate from a country be below 3 percent and that they have a low rate of travelers who violate the 90-day limit.

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council, said Mr. Bush will ask Congress for the power to waive the 3 percent rule for some countries as long as those nations meet new enhanced security requirements.

The waiver program recently began requiring passports to include a machine-readable computer chip containing passport data as a security measure.

The GAO warned that tightening or ending the Visa Waiver Program could lead to other countries retaliating and requiring visas for U.S. visitors. But the investigators said the program has drawbacks because travelers from visa-waiver countries don't have to be screened as closely as other travelers -- a concern Michael W. Cutler, a retired Immigration and Naturalization Service agent, said shows why everyone entering the United States should have to obtain a visa.

Without it, the only mandatory screening is done by a Customs and Border Protection inspector who is trying to move visitors along the entry line, Mr. Cutler said. He said the visa application process provides investigators leads to go after terror suspects. Lying on the application is punishable by a stiff prison sentence -- a charge authorities can often make stick even in cases where they can't prove terrorist or criminal involvement.

The former agent said the examples of would-be shoe bomber Richard C. Reid and this summer's foiled plot to blow up airplanes headed from London to the United States, show the vulnerabilities.

"These terrorists were able to gain access to airliners and potentially our nation without first applying for visas. This is because Great Britain, the country of citizenship for all of these terrorists, participates in the Visa Waiver Program," Mr. Cutler said.

Half of all trips by non-immigrant foreigners into the United States are people traveling on passports from visa-waiver countries.

In a statement yesterday Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff did not say how his department will handle the increased demands but described the new security enhancements.

"We envision a secure travel-authorization system that will allow us to receive data about travelers from countries before they get on the plane," he said. "Countries that are willing to assist the United States in doing effective checks on travelers could be put on track to enter the program soon."

Bush Touts Estonia's Flat Income Tax (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0099627

President Bush says the United States should have a simpler tax system. Apparently he has found one he likes — Estonia's. In a brief stop in the Baltic nation on Tuesday, Bush managed to tout Estonia's flat income tax three times.

"They've got a tax system here that is transparent, open and simple," Bush said in Tallinn after getting a look at how Estonian citizens can file their taxes online.

In a toast about an hour later to Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, Bush said, "I am amazed to be in a country that has been able to effect a flat tax in such a positive way."

And before fielding reporters' questions with Ilves, Bush again praised Estonia's approach to taxation.

"I appreciate the fact that you got a flat tax, you got a tax system that's transparent and simple," he said.

Bush stopped in Estonia en route to a NATO summit in neighboring Latvia.

Back home, Bush has pledged to simplify the tax laws in the United States, which he calls a complicated mess. One idea is a flat tax, which taxes all income at a single rate and gets rid of deductions. Yet comprehensive reform of the U.S. tax system has gone nowhere in Congress.

Bush smiled and nodded — then nodded some more — as Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip enthusiastically explained how his government holds paperless Cabinet meetings.

The system, which uses digital signatures, permits legislation to be OK'd with the click of a mouse.

Ansip's explanation, though, was not as lickety split. He described in detail how the dozen members of the Cabinet — in a room dubbed the "Starship Enterprise" — can vote or make comments online. Cabinet meetings that used last about four to five hours now wrap up in about 30 minutes.

Bush endured the lengthy explanation, shifting his weight back and forth.

He seemed charmed by Estonia's use of the Internet in making daily life easier for its citizens.

"They've got an e-government system that should be the envy of a lot of nations," Bush said.

Bush received two gifts from his Estonian hosts: a glass sculpture and a Skype wireless phone that can be used to make calls over the Internet.

The country is often nicknamed "E-Stonia" for its booming high-tech industry, and it is the main hub of Skype, the Internet telephone company that eBay bought last year for $2.6 billion.

If the phone and accompanying headset Bush received illustrated Estonia's technological savvy, the other one represented its yearning for light during the dark winter months.

Titled "Northern Light," the sculpture symbolizes "the Nordic freshness and crispness, the longing for light during lasting dark periods, strength of purpose and perseverance," the Estonian government said.

Bush said he was honored to be the first sitting American president to visit Estonia, with one regret: his wife couldn't make the trip.

He told Ilves that first lady Laura Bush had an important schedule conflict at home.

"She's receiving the Christmas tree at the White House," Bush explained to the Estonian president.

Laura Bush received the tree from a Pennsylvania family on Monday in the Blue Room. The event is the ceremonial start to the holiday season and considered a big deal at the White House.

Rice, Abbas To Hold Meeting In West Bank (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, November 29, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice put Washington's heft behind new Mideast peace overtures on Tuesday, scheduling an unexpected meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas this week.

The meeting — the second between Rice and Abbas in two months — was announced a day after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called on the Palestinians to return to peace talks, saying his country would be willing to leave most of the West Bank in exchange for a "real peace."

Israel and the Palestinians also agreed Saturday on a cease-fire to end five months of fighting in the Gaza Strip, and Rice's visit was seen as a further push to use the momentum to start new peace talks.

Rice, who is accompanying President Bush on a trip to neighboring Jordan, will meet Abbas on Thursday in the West Bank town of Jericho, said Saeb Erekat, a top Abbas aide. Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, raised the possibility that she would also meet with an Israeli official.

DOJ_NMG_0099628

The United States was the main engine behind the phased "road map" peace plan, which calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. The plan foundered shortly after it was presented in 2003, with both sides failing to live up to their initial obligations.

Subsequent efforts to get the sides talking again suffered another blow in January, when Hamas militants won Palestinian parliamentary elections. Israel and the West boycotted the new government, imposing crippling economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority to try to force the Islamic group to moderate its violently anti-Israel views.

Tensions exploded in June when Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier, sparking an Israeli military offensive in Gaza. But the cease-fire that went into effect early Sunday has raised hopes that new peace moves could be on the horizon.

In his speech Monday, Olmert said Israel would release frozen funds to the Palestinian Authority, free Palestinian prisoners and ease checkpoints if Palestinians choose the path of peace.

Abbas said Tuesday that Olmert's speech was a "positive" step toward peacemaking.

If Olmert's "intentions are good, then we can build on this (his initiative) in order to put forward a plan for future negotiations on all issues related to the Palestinian cause," Abbas said during a visit to Jordan.

The cease-fire remains fragile, with militants still firing homemade rockets at Israel since the truce took effect. Militants launched two more rockets at Israel on Tuesday night, Palestinian witnesses said. There were no reports of injuries.

Olmert said he was "a bit frustrated" the rocket fire had not stopped.

"I hope the Palestinians will meet their commitment to the cease-fire just as we are," he said, adding that Israel plans to continue to show restraint in responding.

But Defense Minister Amir Peretz warned there was a limit to Israel's patience.

"Whoever agrees to a cease-fire must be able to impose it," Peretz said. "Violations of cease-fire understandings will provoke a harsh response on our part."

McCormack, the State Department spokesman, praised Israel for showing "great restraint in not responding to some of the rocket attacks that actually have taken place after the cease-fire officially went into effect."

McCormack said the Palestinians must have a government that complies with international demands to stop attacks on Israel, accept Israel's right to exist and respect past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Hamas has not yet agreed to those demands.

Military officials said Israel has agreed in principle to let Abbas bring 1,200 Jordan-based Palestine Liberation Organization forces into Gaza to help monitor the cease-fire. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

The Palestinians were informed of Israel's decision, the officials said, but Erekat said no deal had been finalized.

Also Tuesday, Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas left Gaza for his first trip abroad since taking office in March. Haniyeh was to hold meetings in Egypt on Wednesday. He will also visit Lebanon, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Syria and Iran to seek political and financial support for his government.

Jordan's King To Push Different Agenda (AP)

By Jamal Halaby

AP, November 29, 2006

Jordan's king made clear Tuesday he will press for a renewed effort to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict when he meets with President Bush this week for talks in which the U.S. priority will likely be Iraq.

In a speech to parliament, King Abdullah II described the Israeli-Palestinian dispute as the "core" issue in the Middle East and indicated that in his talks with Bush, he would underline the need for the United States to push for peace.

Bush is likely to focus on Iraq's deteriorating security when he starts a two-day visit to Jordan on Wednesday for talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, hosted by King Abdullah II.

But Abdullah and the leaders of two other U.S. allies in the Middle East — Egypt and Saudi Arabia — argue the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the most pressing crisis in the region, and fear Islamic militancy will strengthen if it is not resolved.

Moderate Arabs want the Bush administration to devote an equal amount of diplomatic energy on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process — stagnant since 2000 — as on Iraq.

Abdullah pledged "all possible support to the Palestinians so they can regain their rights," though he warned that his country would not accept a deal that causes an influx of Palestinians.

"Jordan will not accept an unjust settlement of the issue, nor will Jordan accept any settlement that comes at its expense," Abdullah told lawmakers, who applauded loudly.

He was referring to fears of a settlement that would cause thousands of Palestinians to settle in the kingdom, upsetting the country's delicate demographic balance.

DOJ_NMG_0099629

Roughly half of Jordan's 5.5 million population consists of Palestinian families who fled, or were driven out of, their homes in the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars.

From Abdullah's point of view, "the Palestinian issue lies at the center of regional problems," said chief government spokesman Nasser Judeh.

"While the king will discuss Iraq and Lebanon with President Bush, the core issue remains the unresolved Palestinian-Israeli crisis," Judeh told The Associated Press.

Arab diplomats said Abdullah was also expected to present Bush with a proposal to curb Iraq's sectarian strife before it becomes a full-blown civil war and give Iraqi security and government greater responsibilities.

Few details were available on the proposal, which envisions the possible formation of a military or new national unity government in Iraq, according to the diplomats, who asked for anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Jordan and other moderate Arabs are concerned that growing Shiite influence in Iran, Syria and Lebanon, will help hard-line Iran dominate the region and give rise to more extremism.

Iran Resolution, Still Not Final, Drops Mention Of Sanctions (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — The six world powers seeking to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions are circulating a significantly weakened draft for a United Nations Security Council resolution against Tehran's nuclear program, in a bid to keep their fragile coalition from falling apart.

The new text under consideration has dropped all mention of sanctions against Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr, according to European diplomats. The United States had initially proposed including Bushehr on the list of programs to single out, but Russia, which has been helping to build the power plant with the Iranians, balked.

Diplomats from the six countries, which also include Britain, France, Germany and China, have been squabbling about the draft resolution for almost three months. There is still no agreement on a final draft.

Complicating the matter is the steady drumbeat in Washington, from inside and outside the Bush administration, calling on President Bush to initiate talks with Iran over the worsening violence in Iraq.

"This has to be carefully managed," said one European diplomat, speaking under condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic practice. "It's important for the U.S. to separate the two issues, because the Iranians would like everything to be combined."

It has been six months since the six powers offered Iran a list of incentives to stop enriching uranium and threatened sanctions if Iran did not. In June, at the time of the initial offer, American officials said Iran had "weeks, not months" to comply.

The growing call for Washington to initiate talks with Tehran over Iraq is only one of the complicating factors. Also holding things up is that Russia and China—but Russia in particular — dislike like the idea of punitive sanctions, and have been dragged along kicking and screaming, according to diplomats.

American officials have sought a strongly worded resolution that would prohibit any technical or financial assistance that could benefit Iran's nuclear program, and would impose a ban on visas for any Iranians involved in nuclear activities, according to American and European diplomats involved in the talks.

Iranian Imbroglio Gives New Boost To Odd Exile Group (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2006

Early this summer, as Washington fretted about Iran's nuclear program, supporters of Mujahedin-e Khalq, an Iranian opposition group, held a rally in an auditorium two blocks from the White House. Prominent members of Congress addressed the crowd, as did the State Department's recently retired ambassador-at-large for war crimes.

Maryam Rajavi, the dissident outfit's leader, beamed in a stirring speech via satellite from France. Denouncing Iran's clerical rulers and their nuclear ambitions, she proclaimed democracy "the answer to Islamic fundamentalism."

Mujahedin-e Khalq, known as MEK, is Iran's largest exile opposition group and, say its supporters, the best hope of bringing democracy to Iran. It reaches into Iran through its own satellite TV channel and claims an underground network of activists inside the Islamic republic. It also has a big presence in neighboring Iraq, where U.S. soldiers watch over more than 3,000 MEK members gathered in a sprawling camp north of Baghdad.

The MEK, however, has a big handicap: The U.S. government says it's a terrorist organization. Officials cite its role in the murder of Americans in the 1970s and subsequent terror attacks that killed hundreds of Iranians. Another big blemish is the group's long collaboration with Saddam Hussein. On top of all that, former members describe the MEK as a personality cult obsessed with celibacy and martyrdom.

So how does an outlaw organization with a bloodstained past, a history of intimacy with Iraq's toppled despot and a reputation for oddness generate thunderous applause almost within earshot of the Oval Office?

Part of the answer lies in subterfuge: Mujahedin-e Khalq, which means People's Holy Warriors, has a raft of support groups with innocuous names, such as the National Convention for a Democratic, Secular Republic in Iran, the host of the Washington event. These haven't been banned and disavow violence.

More important in blurring the MEK's status, however, is the muddle surrounding U.S. policy toward Iran. With the U.S. armed forces bogged down in Iraq and America's military options against neighboring Iran severely limited, the MEK and its fans are lobbying hard to present the group as an ally that can help curb Tehran's growing influence. These supporters, who include lawmakers and conservative foreign-policy analysts, insist the MEK has no links to terrorism.

Most U.S. officials scoff at forming any alliance with the MEK and dispute its claims of having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization. A senior White House official says the Bush administration continues to view the MEK as a terrorist organization and "not an advocate for democracy or human rights" in Iran.

But some Iran analysts say the MEK's thinly disguised presence in the U.S. makes a mockery of the administration's antiterrorism campaign. The White House accuses Iran of supporting terrorist groups, they say, yet turns a blind eye toward the MEK. "It gives the impression that some terrorist organizations are better than others," says Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, an Iranian-American civic organization.

Charm Offensive

Leading the push to get the MEK's "terrorist" tag removed, with help from some members of Congress, is an outfit called the Iran Policy Committee. The committee's president, Raymond Tanter, a former National Security Council official under President Reagan, says the MEK's designation is "restraining" the organization's ability to promote democratic change in Iran. His group recently published a glossy book that challenges the terrorism charges made against the MEK, and this month helped host an event on Capitol Hill arguing the same point.

The charm offensive has taken the MEK far from its origins. First set up in 1965 by vaguely Islamic left-wing intellectuals in Tehran, Mujahedin-e Khalq used to curse American "imperialism" and murdered a string of U.S. military personnel and defense contractors in the 1970s, says the State Department. The group blames the attacks on rogue Marxist factions and says they were not endorsed by MEK's leaders, who were in jail at the time or had been executed.

Shortly before Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution, the Shah's crumbling America-backed regime released jailed MEK activists. One of them, Massoud Rajavi, a former law student at Tehran University, became the group's paramount leader and allied with Islamist forces to topple the Shah. But the group quickly split with Iran's new clerical rulers led by Ayatollah Khomeini, who executed thousands of MEK supporters. The MEK retaliated with a wave of terror of its own.

Mr. Rajavi fled to France, where his brother, a doctor, has a house in Auvers-sur-Oise, a sleepy town outside Paris. To rally Iranians to his cause, Mr. Rajavi sent Massoud Khodabandeh, a British-educated electrical engineer, to Iran's Kurdish region to set up a radio transmitter. He began to broadcast taped tirades against Ayatollah Khomeini.

In France, the group swiftly fell prey to political and romantic bickering. Mr. Rajavi, who had just divorced his second wife, shocked supporters by taking up with the wife of a close friend and fellow MEK activist. They married and she took the name Maryam Rajavi.

Another contentious liaison followed. Mr. Rajavi moved to Iraq in 1986 with his new wife and forged an alliance with Saddam Hussein, then at war with Iran. Former MEK members say the Iraq dictator provided a six-story office building in Baghdad and military bases, including Camp Ashraf, named in honor of Mr. Rajavi's first wife, who had been killed in Iran by Ayatollah Khomeini's regime.

After a disastrous lunge into Iran in 1988, the MEK embarked on a more successful military venture. It helped Saddam Hussein crush an uprising by Kurds after Iraq's defeat by U.S. forces during the 1991 Gulf War, according to U.S. diplomats and the State Department's 2005 Country Reports on Terrorism.

Increasingly seen in the West as an Iraqi stooge, Mr. Rajavi sent Ms. Rajavi back to France to drum up support. Her campaign made some headway but foundered when the U.S. and Europe began looking for ways to reach out to Iran's newly elected reformist president, Mohammad Khatami.

Senior diplomats in the Clinton administration say the MEK figured prominently as a bargaining chip in a bridge-building effort with Tehran. Washington hoped it could get Iran to back a Middle East peace initiative, stop funding terrorist groups and forswear nuclear weapons. Iran, for its part, wanted the U.S. to take a hard line against the MEK.

DOJ_NMG_0099631

In 1997, the State Department added the MEK to a list of global terrorist organizations as "a signal" of the U.S.'s desire for rapprochement with Tehran's reformists, says Martin Indyk, who at the time was assistant secretary of state for Near East Affairs. President Khatami's government "considered it a pretty big deal," Mr. Indyk says.

The MEK also got hit by a string of defections. Among those to quit was Mr. Khodabandeh, the electrical engineer. He married another defector, Anne Singleton, an English woman who had visited Camp Ashraf, where she says she was taught an anti-imperialist song that vowed "death to America." Ms. Singleton wrote a book denouncing the MEK as a crazed cult of enforced celibacy and brutal discipline.

Other former members describe a good cause warped by methods reminiscent of Mao Tse-tung's Cultural Revolution -- a constant hunt for internal enemies, ideological "cleansing" sessions and harsh punishment of real or imagined dissent. Mohsen Abbasloo, a 28-year-old former MEK activist, says he was jailed and beaten at Camp Ashraf for over a month after he voiced mild doubts. "I went there full of hope but it was not even 1% of what I expected," says Mr. Abbasloo, who says he spent four years at the huge desert complex of barracks, office buildings and military training grounds between Baghdad and Iraq's border with Iran.

Mohammad Mohaddessin, a veteran MEK member and chief foreign-affairs official of its political arm, denies accusations of brutality and describes defectors as "tools of the Iranian regime."

Throughout the 1990s, the MEK continued to operate in Washington and elsewhere through various front organizations, the most prominent of which was the Paris-based National Council of Resistance of Iran. In 1999, the State Department banned the NCRI on the grounds that it is the MEK's official political arm. The NCRI describes itself as an Iranian parliament-in-exile comprising 530 members and not just representing the MEK.

Its former U.S.-based spokesman, Alireza Jafarzadeh, remained a regular on the Washington lobbying and policy circuits. In recent years he appeared routinely on Fox News as a foreign-affairs analyst. In 2002, he held a Washington news conference to reveal a secret uranium enrichment facility in the Iranian city of Natanz. The International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna later confirmed the claim. President Bush and other senior U.S. officials publicly praised what they called an Iranian "dissident group" for unearthing the information.

Former MEK members and some U.S. officials say they believe the Natanz information was fed to the MEK by Israel, which wanted to make it public. The MEK derides this as nonsense.

John Moody, a Fox News senior vice president, says Mr. Jafarzadeh's contract as a foreign-affairs analyst lapsed, but doesn't rule out further employment. "He consistently provides accurate and sometimes exclusive information," he says.

In 2002, 150 members of the House of Representatives signed a petition seeking the MEK's removal from the U.S. government's terrorist list.

As America geared up for war with Iraq in early 2003, the MEK muted its adulation of Saddam Hussein, say people who were in Ashraf at the time. Top leaders, including the Rajavi couple, quietly bailed from Camp Ashraf.

"We suddenly noticed that a lot of senior people were missing," says Behzad Alishahi, an Iranian who spent more than 15 years at the camp working as an MEK TV presenter. Just before the U.S. invaded in March, he says, hundreds of MEK fighters rushed toward the Iraq-Iran border for an attack on Iran. They turned back, he says, after U.S. planes bombed their convoy and Camp Ashraf.

Ms. Rajavi fled to the group's compound in Auvers-sur-Oise, France. Her husband vanished, along with his hairdresser and bodyguards. This stirred rumors that he had been picked up by the U.S. military and was providing intelligence about Saddam Hussein and also Iran.

A State Department official says Mr. Rajavi was last seen in Baghdad in March 2003 and is now either dead or in hiding. The MEK says he's alive and evading Iranian assassins.

When American troops pulled up outside Camp Ashraf shortly after the fall of Baghdad in April 2003, the MEK offered no resistance and later agreed to disarm. Mr. Alishahi says he and colleagues at the TV station were ordered by MEK commanders to destroy film and other evidence of close ties to Saddam Hussein.

U.S. officials launched a review of camp residents to decide if they should be prosecuted for terrorism. At the same time, the Central Intelligence Agency warned French authorities to watch out for the MEK. The French dispatched hundreds of police to storm the MEK's Auvers-sur-Oise compound. They arrested Maryam Rajavi and carted away $9 million in cash and documents detailing bank accounts in France, the U.S. and elsewhere holding tens of millions of dollars.

Also confiscated, says a senior French security official, were videos of Mr. Rajavi meeting Saddam Hussein and 99 satellite-positioning devices programmed with coordinates for Iran. The French also found what they say were signs that the Iraqi dictator had bankrolled the organization, something the MEK has always denied. These included stacks of dollar bills wrapped in Iraqi newspapers and documents relating to a gift of Iraqi oil, say French officials who were involved.

Drawing Criticism

DOJ_NMG_0099632

The raid drew criticism from lawmakers and others in France and also the U.S. About 10 MEK members set themselves on fire in Europe and Canada in protest. Two died from their burns. French police released Ms. Rajavi but launched a formal terrorism-conspiracy investigation of her and 16 others.

Mr. Mohaddessin, the group's foreign-affairs spokesman, who was also detained and later released, ridicules the raid as a publicity stunt to win favor with Iran. There were enough police, he says, "for a coup in an African country."

The U.S. review of Camp Ashraf, which began around the same time as the French raid and finished in summer 2004, partially vindicated the MEK. Only one person has faced any U.S. charges, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Iran who was arrested in September in New York for allegedly providing support to a terrorist group. The roughly 3,300 now still in Ashraf were given the status of "protected persons" under the Geneva Convention, which promises humane treatment for nonnationals in a country at war. The U.S. military, as the occupying power, took on the role of protector. A White House official says this "protected" status applies only to individuals, not to the MEK as an organization.

Former Ashraf residents say MEK commanders, most of whom are women, have worked hard to woo the American soldiers who are now nominally in charge, inviting them to use a big swimming pool and serving them pizza. American forces have, under an agreement with the MEK, confiscated the group's roughly 300 tanks, 250 armored personnel carriers, 250 artillery pieces and 10,000 small arms. They also blew up most of the MEK's ammunition. But Camp Ashraf still functions as a bastion of opposition to Iran, shielded from the turmoil elsewhere in Iraq by American soldiers.

In June, the MEK camp hosted a mass rally of Iranian dissidents and thousands of Iraqis. Ms. Rajavi sent a message from France urging them to "cut off the tentacles of the Iranian regime." The MEK's satellite TV station, meanwhile, pumps out adulatory propaganda for Ms. Rajavi and her missing husband, Massoud.

Both the Pentagon and the U.S. Central Command declined to comment on the military's dealings with the MEK in Iraq. But individual officers have expressed support for the MEK. In May 2003, Maj. Gen. Raymond Odierno, then-commander of America's 4th Infantry Division, commended MEK members at Camp Ashraf for their cooperation and told reporters that "this should lead to a review of whether they are still a terrorist organization."

In 2005, following a report by Human Rights Watch detailing torture and other abuses at MEK camps in Iraq before the U.S. invasion, the commander of a U.S. military police unit that had been stationed at Camp Ashraf wrote to the U.S.-based human-rights group to defend the MEK. He said U.S. forces had not found "any credible evidence" of any such abuses and said he would "like my own daughter to someday visit these units for the cultural exchange."

In Washington, debate raged during this time over how to deal with the MEK, say current and former U.S. officials. Amid the screening of Ashraf residents, some in the Pentagon pushed to use the MEK as a tool against Iran and Iranian-backed militants operating inside Iraq, say current and former State Department officials involved in Iraq policy.

Colin Powell, who was then secretary of state, pushed back against the idea of cooperating with the MEK, say current and former officials. Mr. Powell and his underlings argued that any flirtation with the MEK would undermine Washington's stand against terrorism. The State Department then designated the group's previously tolerated U.S. affiliate, NCRI-U.S., as a terrorist front for the MEK. In August 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation shut down its offices at the National Press Club in Washington.

"There was this kind of language [being offered by Pentagon officials] that one man's terrorist was another man's freedom fighter," says Lawrence Wilkerson, who served as Mr. Powell's chief of staff at the time. He says the State Department pushed through 2003 and 2004 for the MEK's disarmament.

Douglas Feith, who served as the Pentagon's No. 3 civilian official until last year, denies any desire by the Pentagon to cozy up to the MEK. "The idea that we would use them against Iran is fantasy," he says.

MEK leaders sheltering in the West are now ramping up a campaign, along with their American and European fans, to present Maryam Rajavi and her missing husband as the only way to stop Iran from developing a nuclear bomb. This summer, thousands of their supporters gathered in a Paris convention hall. Ms. Rajavi arrived in a chauffeured Bentley, stepping onto a red carpet to the sound of trumpets. Rose petals were strewn at her feet. A former French prime minister and other VIPs applauded.

Among the MEK's Washington supporters are a significant mix of lawmakers on both sides of the aisle. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican who chairs the International Relations Subcommittee on the Middle East and Central Asia, drafted legislation this year that would require the White House to provide funding to Iran's largest opposition groups, although the bill doesn't explicitly name the MEK.

Mr. Abbasloo, the former Camp Ashraf resident, who is now in Europe, says he doesn't like Iran's current regime but mocks the MEK as an alternative. "This would only replace a snake with a crocodile," he says. "I hope America is not going to be that stupid."

U.S., N.Korean Envoys To Hold More Talks (AP)

By Audra Ang

AP, November 29, 2006

The top American, North Korean and Chinese nuclear negotiators met for a second day Wednesday, a U.S. Embassy spokeswoman said, amid a diplomatic push to resume six-nation talks on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill met with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawai at the Diaoyutai state guesthouse for a second round of talks, said Susan Stevenson, spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Beijing.

She did not have details of the discussions or whether Hill met with Wu and Kim together or separately. The three met on Tuesday.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the main goal of the current meetings was to "make sure that everybody, at least, has a good, solid understanding of what might happen" when six-nation talks aimed at persuading the North to abandon its nuclear weapons reconvene.

"What Chris did today (Tuesday) was to start to provide information on how we might be able to define what is an effective round of the six-party talks that produces concrete results," he said.

According to South Korea's Yonhap news agency, Hill on Tuesday "stressed that the North needs to report all of its nuclear programs before seeking economic incentives."

On his part, Kim insisted that Washington lift its financial sanctions on Pyongyang and "take steps to help normalize relations between the two enemies," Yonhap said.

North Korea agreed in September 2005 to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. But Washington imposed the financial sanctions against a Macau-based bank on suspicions it was laundering counterfeit money for the North Koreans. Angered by the move, Pyongyang withdrew from the talks two months later.

Kim said before Tuesday's meetings got started that the timing of the next round of six-party talks on his country's nuclear program "depends on the United States."

"There are too many outstanding issues" and both parties should narrow their differences, Kim told reporters.

Officials have yet to determine an exact date for the next round of negotiations. The China-hosted talks involve the United States, North Korea, Japan, South Korea and Russia, which has not sent an envoy to Beijing.

"We hope all sides can grasp this opportunity and take a flexible, pragmatic and constructive approach in order to realize the early resumption of six-party talks," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said at a regular briefing.

Kim's trip to Beijing — a rare overseas visit — and the presence of other negotiators added to prospects of compromises to give new life to the talks.

An unannounced meeting between Hill and Kim last month in Beijing led to Pyongyang agreeing to return to the arms negotiations amid heightened tensions after its first nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Hill told reporters when he arrived Monday that the U.S. anticipated that the talks would "get going at some point very soon."

Hill has also met with South Korea's nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, and Japan's representative Kenichiro Sasae.

Mystery Illness Hits Former Russian PM (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, November 29, 2006

Yegor Gaidar, Russia's former prime minister and the architect of the country's market reforms, last week suffered a sudden, unexplained and violent illness on a visit to Ireland, a day after Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB spy, died in London from an apparent radiation poisoning.

Mr Gaidar is now in a stable condition at an undisclosed Moscow hospital, undergoing tests. In a telephone interview with the FT, Mr Gaidar said the doctors had so far been unable to identify the cause of the violent vomiting and bleeding that he suffered during a conference in Ireland.

Anatoly Chubais, his former associate and the head of Russia's electricity monopoly, said he suspected Mr Gaidar may have been poisoned. However, he strongly ruled out that either Russia's security services or the Kremlin could have had any involvement. There is no indication of radiation being the cause of his illness.

Mr Gaidar is one of Russian President Vladimir Putin's softer critics and his daughter is a leader of an opposition movement. Mr Gaidar, who heads an economic think-tank in Moscow, has close connections with the government and occasionally advises them on economic matters.

"I have suffered sudden problems with my health on November 24 which posed a threat to my life. This threat has not been realised. After a few hours the situation stabilised," Mr Gaidar said.

Mr Chubais and Mr Gaidar said the doctors could not explain the symptoms he had suffered.

Mr Gaidar said he felt ill after eating a simple breakfast where he was staying near Dublin. He said he could barely move any of his limbs and had to lie down for most of the afternoon.

Ekaterina Genieva, who helped to organise the conference at National University of Ireland, Maynooth, said Mr Gaidar looked pale and unwell when a few hours later he came down to answer questions about his book The Death of the Empire: Lessons for Contemporary Russia. After about 10 minutes, Mr Gaidar said he had to leave the room.

"I rushed after him and found him lying on the floor, unconscious. He was vomiting blood and also bleeding from the nose for about 35 minutes," Ms Genieva said. Mr Gaidar was taken to James Connolly Memorial Hospital in Blanchardstown, where he was treated overnight. The following morning, Mr Gaidar had asked to be discharged and, after a visit to the Russian embassy, was put on a flight back to Moscow.

Mr Gaidar declined to comment about whether he believed he had suffered a poisoning attack. The news of his illness comes after a series of mysterious incidents involving Russian public figures over the past month. It emerged as the Kremlin and state-run television continued to suggest the murky world of Russia's recent émigrés was behind the death of Mr Litvinenko.

Sources in Dublin said they did not suspect anything untoward in Mr Gaidar's illness.

Billionaire Ally Of Dead Spy Issues Statement (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 28 — Boris A. Berezovsky, an exiled Russian billionaire and fierce opponent of the Kremlin, confirmed Tuesday that the police found radioactive traces in his office after the death last week of his close associate, Alexander V. Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radiation.

While the association between the men has become widely known, the discovery of radioactive traces at Mr. Berezovsky's Mayfair office highlighted their close ties and offered one more clue about Mr. Litvinenko's movements on Nov. 1, the day he first reported feeling unwell.

Late Tuesday, the police said they had broadened their efforts to trace Mr. Litvinenko's whereabouts before he died, searching two more places in central London — an address in Mayfair and the Sheraton Park Lane Hotel.

Mr. Berezovsky, one of the most prominent and wealthy Russian exiles in London, visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital before he died. Apart from the traces at his office, where Mr. Litvinenko was a frequent visitor, he has not been implicated in the police inquiry.

Mr. Litvinenko, a former secret service agent, accused the Russian authorities of poisoning him with what the police said was a radioactive isotope, polonium 210. Mr. Berezovsky pointedly refrained Tuesday from making a similarly direct accusation.

In what aides said was his first formal statement since Mr. Litvinenko's death, Mr. Berezovsky said he was "deeply saddened" by the death of his associate, who had worked for both the K.G.B. and its successor organization, known by its Russian initials, F.S.B.

Referring to Mr. Litvinenko's claim that he had refused an order to assassinate Mr. Berezovsky in the late 1990s, Mr. Berezovsky said: "I credit him with saving my life, and he remained a close friend and ally ever since. I will remember him for his bravery, his determination and his honor.

"Many of Mr. Litvinenko's friends and I have already publicly expressed our views about what we think might have happened. Therefore I believe the most helpful course we can take is to let the police get on with their work," the statement said. "I have complete faith in the British authorities and the police. They are conducting a thorough and professional investigation, and we should now wait for the results."

Mr. Berezovsky said the traces of radiation in his office had been "discovered as part of an ongoing police investigation of all the locations visited by Alexander Litvinenko" on Nov. 1.

Previously, the police tracked Mr. Litvinenko on that day to a sushi bar, the five-star Millennium Mayfair hotel in central London and his own home in north London. Officers have also discovered traces of radiation at a security company in Mayfair called Erinys, the company acknowledged in a statement.

Mr. Litvinenko visited its office "on a matter totally unrelated to issues now being investigated by the police," the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0099635

Friends of Mr. Litvinenko have said he was a frequent visitor to Mr. Berezovsky's office. Mr. Berezovsky fled Russia in late 2000, after amassing a fortune in the freewheeling 1990s through a car dealership, a media empire, the Aeroflot airline and holdings in oil and aluminum.

An autopsy is to be carried out on Mr. Litvinenko on Friday, following the formal opening of a coroner's inquest on Thursday.

The British authorities said Tuesday that eight people had been sent to a clinic to be tested for radiation traces. One of them was a reporter for The Daily Mirror tabloid, Graham Brough, who said he was tested after shaking hands with Mario Scaramella, an Italian academic who said he met Mr. Litvinenko in the Itsu sushi bar in Piccadilly on Nov. 1.

Mr. Brough wrote in The Daily Mirror on Tuesday that he had been singled out for testing because "Scaramella's palms had been slightly sweaty when I shook hands" with him during an interview last week in Naples.

British health authorities and the police have said polonium 210 cannot be transmitted through the skin and is not harmful unless it is swallowed, breathed in or passed through an open wound.

Mr. Scaramella has also been tested for radiation by the British police, according to Paolo Guzzanti, an Italian senator who led a parliamentary commission investigating the possibility of K.G.B. activity in Italy. The panel employed Mario Scaramella as a consultant, according to Mr. Guzzanti, who said he spoke to Mr. Scaramella on Tuesday.

"He said he was in a castle outside of London, and I don't know if it is official, but he is under police protection," Mr. Guzzanti said in a telephone interview on Tuesday. "He has three armored cars around him with bodyguards and the police or secret service," he added. The British police have declined to confirm those assertions.

Mr. Scaramella has told Italian reporters that when he met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, he showed the Russian man e-mail messages from a mutual intelligence acquaintance listing individuals whose lives were said to be in danger from criminals based in St. Petersburg.

The messages reportedly claimed that the same criminals killed Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist, in Moscow last month. Mr. Litvinenko's associates say he was investigating her fatal shooting when he was poisoned.

In his first public remarks on the matter, Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that no "diplomatic or political barrier" would be allowed to thwart the police inquiry into Mr. Litvinenko's death. "It is obviously a very, very serious matter indeed," Mr. Blair told a news conference. "We are determined to find out what happened and who is responsible."

Blair Pledges To Pursue Probe Of Ex-Spy's Death (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 28 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday that "there is no diplomatic or political barrier in the way" of investigating the mysterious fatal poisoning of a former Russian spy in London and that he planned to speak with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the matter "at any time that is appropriate."

"It obviously is a very serious matter and we are determined to find out what happened and who is responsible," Blair said about the death of Alexander Litvinenko, 43, the former agent and a vocal critic of Putin. Doctors said Litvinenko was poisoned by a radioactive substance known as polonium-210.

Litvinenko, whose hair fell out and organs failed three weeks after he first felt ill, blamed Putin for his death, according to a statement that friends said he dictated as he lay dying last week. The Kremlin has called that allegation "nonsense."

Blair's remarks came as Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky, another ardent critic of Putin living in London, confirmed that traces of the radioactive substance were found in his office in central London.

In a statement Tuesday, Berezovsky said the substance was discovered as a result of "police investigation of all the locations visited by Andrew Litvinenko" on Nov. 1, the day he became ill. Police closed and sealed Berezovsky's office.

Berezovsky did not say in his statement whether he had met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1 -- the day police believe he was poisoned. Police are trying to retrace Litvinenko's steps, piecing together his whereabouts with security camera footage, his cellphone records and interviews with him before he died Thursday.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of both Litvinenko and Berezovsky, said in an interview that Berezovsky and his staff had been tested for exposure to radiation. Litvinenko used Berezovsky's facilities as a "back office," Goldfarb said. "If he needed to make a Xerox copy, he would come in and use the Xerox machine and then go out."

Scotland Yard has said it also found traces of polonium-210 in Litvinenko's home and at a central London sushi restaurant and a hotel he visited Nov. 1.

Late Tuesday, police began to search two more locations -- a building at 58 Grosvenor and the Sheraton Park Lane Hotel in Piccadilly. A spokesman said that as of almost midnight, no radiation had been found.

More than 1,100 people have called a help line for those worried over possible exposure to the radiation, health officials said, and eight people showing some symptoms were being referred for further tests.

Mario Scaramella, an Italian who has said he met with Litvinenko at the restaurant Nov. 1 and showed him sensitive e-mail messages, said Tuesday that he was under British protection and being tested for contamination, the Associated Press reported.

Russia's top nuclear official, Sergei Kiriyenko, weighed in on the case Tuesday, saying that controls on the export of polonium are very tight. "Allegations that someone stole it during production are absolutely unfounded," Kiriyenko told reporters.

Kiriyenko said Russia exports eight grams of polonium-210 monthly, all of it to the United States. He said that Russia used to provide it to British companies but that exports to Britain ended about five years ago.

Kremlin supporters have been fingering Berezovsky as a likely assassin of Litvinenko; they say he gained from Litvinenko's death because he is using it to try to smear Putin's reputation internationally.

Oleg Morozov, a top official of the pro-Kremlin United Russia party, told journalists that "Russia and the Russian authorities had the most to lose from the death. . . . There is a well-known formula: If you cannot figure out what happened, try to understand who could have benefited from it. . . . That is why, from this standpoint, the appearance of traces of polonium-210, which reportedly caused Litvinenko's death, in an office of businessman Boris Berezovsky will help make clear certain things."

Morozov said Litvinenko "was exposed to polonium somewhere. Maybe it happened at this office. I do not know."

Berezovsky visited Litvinenko in the hospital and has said he believed Putin was behind the poisoning. When Litvinenko was a member of the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, he accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky.

Pope Urges Leaders To Renounce Violence (AP)

By Victor L. Simpson

AP, November 29, 2006

Pope Benedict XVI urged leaders of all religions Tuesday to "utterly refuse" to support any form of violence in the name of faith, while Turkey's top Muslim cleric complained to the pontiff of growing "Islamophobia" in the world.

As he began his first visit to a Muslim country — a trip that drew extraordinary security but few onlookers — Benedict sought a careful balance as he extended friendship and brotherhood to Muslims, hoping to end the outcry from many Muslims over his remarks linking Islam to violence.

He expressed support for Turkey's efforts to join the European Union, moving away from opposition he voiced when he was a cardinal.

But the German pope also hammered away at key points of his 18-month papacy, telling diplomats that leaders of all religions must "utterly refuse to sanction recourse to violence as a legitimate expression of faith."

He avoided mention of any specific religion, even as he decried terrorism and the "disturbing conflicts across the Middle East."

Benedict also said guarantees of religious freedom are essential for a just society, and the Vatican said he raised specific issues such as property rights of Turkey's tiny 32,000-member Catholic community during talks with Turkish officials.

His comments could be reinforced later during the four-day visit when the pope meets in Istanbul with Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians.

The pope is expected to call for greater rights and protections for Christian minorities in the Muslim world, including the small Greek Orthodox community in Turkey.

The 79-year-old made reconciliation a priority of his first day, taking on a taxing series of meetings that saw him needing a drink of water after coughing repeatedly while addressing diplomats in the last public appearance in the evening.

Benedict's journey is extraordinarily sensitive, a closely watched pilgrimage full of symbolism that could offer hope of religious reconciliation or deepen what many say is a growing divide between the Christian and Islamic worlds.

Seeking to ease anger over his perceived criticism of Islam, Benedict met with Ali Bardakoglu, who heads religious affairs in Turkey, warmly grasping hands. Benedict sat nearby as the Muslim cleric defended his religion.

"The so-called conviction that the sword is used to expand Islam in the world and growing Islamophobia hurts all Muslims," Bardakoglu said.

The comment appeared to be a reference to Benedict's remarks in a speech in September when he quoted a 14th-century Christian emperor who characterized the Prophet Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by thy sword the faith he preached."

The Vatican described the cleric's speech as "positive, respectful and non-polemical," applauding what the church sees as efforts for a true dialogue between faiths.

On Sunday, more than 25,000 Turks showed up to an anti-Vatican protest in Istanbul, asking the pope to stay at home, but on the streets of Ankara most people went about their usual business and only a tiny protest was held outside the religious affairs office hours before the pope arrived.

"Today we had the sensation he was a welcome guest," said Vatican spokesman the Rev. Federico Lombardi.

"All feel the same responsibility in this difficult moment in history, let's work together," Benedict said during his flight from Rome to Ankara, where more than 3,000 police and sharpshooters joined a security effort that surpassed even the visit of President Bush two years ago.

"We know that the scope of this trip is dialogue and brotherhood and the commitment for understanding between cultures ... and for reconciliation," he said.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan — in a last-minute change of plans — welcomed the pope at the foot of the plane and described the visit as "very meaningful." Erdogan's political party has Islamic roots, though the government is secular.

In his first official act, Benedict visited the mausoleum of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey, and wrote a message in a guest book calling Turkey "a meeting point of different religions and cultures and a bridge between Asia and Europe."

Police monitored the highway leading to Ankara from the airport, where Turkish and Vatican flags waved in a light breeze. Snipers climbed atop buildings and hilltops. In wooded areas along the route, soldiers in camouflage fatigues set up observation points and sniffer dogs passed along bridges.

It was his first visit to a Muslim country as pontiff. The original goal of the pope's trip to Turkey was to meet Bartholomew I, leader of the world's 300 million Orthodox Christians. The two major branches of Christianity represented by Bartholomew and Benedict split in 1054 over differences in opinion on the power of the papacy, and the two spiritual heads will meet in an attempt to breach the divide and reunite the churches.

Benedict leaves Ankara on Wednesday for Ephesus, where the Virgin Mary is thought to have spent her last years, and will then travel to Istanbul.

A closely watched moment of the trip will come Thursday during Benedict's visit to Haghia Sophia, a 1,500-year-old site that was originally a Byzantine church and then turned into a mosque after the Muslim conquest of Istanbul — then known as Constantinople — in 1453. It is now a museum, and Turks would take offense at any religious gestures by the pontiff, who also plans to visit the nearby Blue Mosque.

In 1967, Pope Paul VI fell to his knees in prayer, touching off protests by Turks claiming he violated the secular nature of the domed complex. In 1979, Pope John Paul II made no overt religious signs during his visit.

Pope Calls For Dialogue Between Christians, Muslims In Turkey (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, November 29, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey - Pope Benedict XVI called for an "authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims" and praised his Turkish hosts Tuesday as he began what's surely his most controversial journey since he was elevated to lead the world's 1 billion Roman Catholics in April 2005.

The pope didn't directly address the anger he set off in September when he quoted a Byzantine Emperor as saying that in Islam, "you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his (the prophet Muhammad's) command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

But it was clear that those words weren't forgotten. Turkey's president of religious affairs, Ali Bardakoglu, bluntly told the pope at a joint appearance that Western leaders were distorting Islam's message as a religion of peace.

"Prejudices are nourished mostly by historical fears and concerns," said Bardakoglu, who in September accused the pope of "having hatred in his heart" for Muslims. "The establishment of universal peace is based on the fact that we, men of religion and religious institutes, should not be the slaves of such prejudices, nourished by such fears and concerns, and we should act with common sense."

Sitting on the stage next to Bardakoglu, Benedict XVI didn't react to the statement.

But he did retract comments he'd made as a cardinal in 2004, when he openly and frequently opposed Turkish membership in the European Union, saying that he now favored it. In a goodwill gesture, he signed the Golden Book at the memorial to modern Turkey's founder, Kemal Ataturk, noting that he was proud to quote Ataturk by writing, "Peace at home, peace abroad."

Later, he tried to calm Muslim anger in remarks to diplomats at the Vatican Embassy: "I wish to reiterate my great esteem for Muslims, encouraging them to continue to work together, in mutual respect, to promote the dignity of every human being and the growth of a society where personal freedom and care for others provide peace and serenity for all."

The pope said the purpose of this trip was "dialogue, brotherhood and reconciliation" after a tumultuous period in Christian-Muslim relations. In addition to his September comments, Muslim sentiments have been bruised by European efforts to ban Islamic religious dress and the rejection of Turkish membership in the European Union.

But the pope's visit drew little attention in a country in which fewer than 100,000 people are Christians and fewer still are Catholic. Unlike Pope John Paul II's trip here in 1979, no well-wishers lined the route, jostling to catch a glimpse of the leader of the world's largest organized religion.

Protesters were few, too.

While Benedict visited the Ataturk Memorial, a small group gathered several blocks away. On the streets of the city, there was some hostility: taxi driver Yilmaz Kulum, 49, said he wished the pope hadn't come.

"I don't want him in Turkey because he criticised the prophet Muhammad," he said. "His words disturbed my conscience."

Kezban Turkoglu, 32, a secretary in a hijab, the head scarf that's the sign of a very religious woman in largely secular Turkey, wished that the pope simply would apologize for his comments in September.

"He mentions common values, but this is not enough," she said.

But just as many people seemed to share the view of businessman Ertan Kuscu, 38: "I don't like him, but he is more than welcome if this serves as an advertisement for Turkey."

While preparing to meet the pope at the airport, before flying to the NATO summit that he'd said would make it impossible to meet, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said it was essential to show hospitality during the pope's four-day visit.

"If we behave improperly, if someone tries to convert this to political rant, we will lose," he said. "We will think and calm down."

Tuesday was the most political day of the visit. On Wednesday, the pope leaves Ankara for Ephesus, which is believed to have once been home to Mary, Jesus' mother. From there, he'll go to Istanbul to meet Patriarch Bartholomew I, the so-called first among equals of leaders in the Eastern Orthodox churches, which split with the Catholic Church 1,000 years ago over theological issues and the power of the pope.

Pope Backs Turkey's Bid To Join European Union (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 28 — Pope Benedict XVI arrived in Turkey on Tuesday armed with a surprise gesture of good will aimed at blunting Muslim anger toward him: he backed Turkey's long-stalled desire to join the European Union, reversing a statement he made two years ago.

Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, told reporters after a brief meeting with Benedict at the airport here that he had asked the pope to support Turkey in its attempt to become a member of the European Union.

"He said, 'You know we don't have a political role, but we wish for Turkey's entry into the E.U.,' " Mr. Erdogan said the pope told him. "His wish is a positive recommendation for us."

Although the Vatican does not play a formal role in the European Union, or delve publicly into domestic matters of other states, the pope's gesture was nonetheless a piece of political stagecraft at a delicate time both in relations between Muslims and the West and in Benedict's own damaged reputation among Muslims.

Long before he angered the Muslim world two months ago with a speech criticized as equating Islam with violence, Benedict was disliked here because of comments he made, as a cardinal in 2004, opposing Turkish membership in Europe. As the successor to the Ottoman Empire, Turkey had always stood, he said at the time, "in permanent contrast to Europe."

But the 79-year-old pope's concession on Tuesday, at the start of a four-day trip here, seemed to make good on his pledge to heal the wounds between East and West. It may also have the practical effect of tamping down anger here. Security for the pope's visit was extensive, with helicopters hovering at the airport, commandos guarding the pope's plane and sharpshooters on the roofs of buildings.

It is unclear what effect the pope's reversal will have on the fraught debate in Europe over Turkey's membership, especially among conservatives who share the views he expressed as a cardinal two years ago. Much of that opposition is rooted in the increased tension between the West and Islam, including fears of more terrorist attacks in Europe and the already difficult integration of millions of Muslims there.

Some of the tension, though, is tied to the difficulty Turkey has had in meeting Europe's specific demands — and the pope's visit comes at a particularly delicate time in Turkey's talks with European negotiators.

Admission talks, which officially began this year, have hit a snag over the European Union's insistence that Turkey open its ports and harbors to vessels from Greek Cyprus, an internationally recognized state opposed by Turkey. But Turkish officials say they cannot act until an international embargo that has been in place on the Turkish part of the island for more than 20 years is lifted.

Because Benedict did not announce his new position himself on Tuesday, the shift appeared to some degree to be a concession won by Mr. Erdogan — a deft act of diplomacy by the pope that critics said his speech two months ago lacked.

Although Mr. Erdogan's government is rooted in moderate political Islam, he had said until Monday that he would not be able to meet the pope under pressure from his conservative constituency. As the leader of the only Muslim country in NATO, he left immediately afterward to attend a meeting of the Western military alliance in Latvia.

Hours later, the pope's spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, released a brief statement repeating that the Vatican has "neither the power nor the specific political task" of getting Turkey admitted to the European Union.

But Father Lombardi said the Vatican "views positively and encourages the road of dialogue and of moving toward integration of Turkey in Europe on the basis of common values and principles."

It remains to be seen whether the pope's gesture will have a warming effect in Turkey, or in the broader Muslim world.

In Ankara, residents expressed doubts about the pope's sincerity. "It's not support, it's a lie," said Hakan Ozgunaydin, a 29-year-old co-owner of a shoe shop in downtown Ankara. "I would expect him to say, 'those bloody Turks,' when he leaves this country."

Merve Celikkol, a 21-year-old physics student, was just as blunt, calling the pope a hypocrite: "How is it possible that he changed so much?"

"This can be his way of confessing his sins for the wrong he has done to the Muslim world," said Ismail Aytac, a 51-year-old sitting in a luxury watch shop. "After all, he's human, and humans make mistakes."

A number of those interviewed did say they thought that the new support was a decisive achievement for Mr. Erdogan, who has led the push for entry into Europe, at no small political cost to himself.

Benedict's trip here is his fifth outside Italy since he was elected pope last year, and his first outside the European Union and to a predominantly Muslim country. His main aim is to visit leaders of the Orthodox patriarchy here, as part of his goal to mend the 1,000-year rift between the Roman Catholic Church and the 220 million members of the Orthodox Church.

But Christians make up less than half a percent of Turkey's 72 million people, and it was clear that this trip would be far different from those to Christian countries, even before Benedict quoted a Byzantine emperor as referring to Islam as "evil and inhuman" in a speech in Germany in September. The trip to Turkey, though a modern and secular democracy, was loaded with symbolism: here, Christian and Muslim warriors battled for centuries, as the Byzantine Empire, founded by Rome's first Christian emperor, gave way to Muslim Ottoman Turks who established their own empire and pushed deep into Europe.

After his plane touched down, the pope, wearing white robes, was met at the airport with a red carpet and a small honor guard, but with none of the fanfare of his other trips. Rather, small demonstrations protesting Benedict's visit were held here and in Istanbul, which the pope will visit on Wednesday.

In brief comments on his plane, Benedict made clear that one of his chief aims was to stimulate a "dialogue" to bring Christians and Muslims, and West and East, closer.

"The scope of this visit is dialogue, brotherhood, a commitment to understanding between cultures, between religions, for reconciliation," he told reporters before his plane took off from Rome.

Mr. Erdogan, who unexpectedly greeted the pope at his plane, spoke too of the need for greater understanding.

"We are going through a tough period when the culture of violence has been expanding and our world faces disaster scenarios like the clashes of civilizations and polarizations in various directions," Mr. Erdogan told reporters after his 20-minute meeting with the pope. "Therefore, we need mutual understanding among different beliefs and civilizations more than any time in history."

Over the weekend, the Vatican began signaling that it was warming to the idea of Turkey's membership in the European Union. The Vatican has never issued a formal position on Turkish membership. In 2004, when the pope was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he said it would be a "grave error," both he and other church officials described the remarks as his personal opinion.

The stalemate over Turkey's bid to join the European Union has frustrated Turkish officials, who are smoothing their negotiating positions ahead of meetings with union members in December.

"Everything is just stuck," said Namik Tan, spokesman for Turkey's Foreign Ministry, said in an interview on Monday. "How can an elected government with all these restrictions over the Turkish Cypriots open its ports without any restrictions? This government has a public here."

On Tuesday night, officials from the European Union met to set conditions for the future of the talks.

"Look, they said there would be a train crash," Mr. Erdogan said at the news conference. "Now they say there is no train crash, but the train slowed down."

DOJ_NMG_0099640

After his meeting with Mr. Erdogan, Benedict visited the grave of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of the secular Turkish state after World War I.

He met later with the nation's chief Muslim religious figure, Ali Bardakoglu, who was among the fiercest critics of the pope's speech two months ago, and Turkey's president, Ahmed Necdet Sezer. Later in the evening, he met with members of the world's diplomatic corps. At every stop, he stressed the need for greater joint efforts to end terrorism, war and misunderstanding.

"I appreciate the efforts of numerous countries currently engaged in rebuilding peace in Lebanon, Turkey among them," he told the diplomats. "In your presence, ambassadors, I appeal once more to the vigilance of the international community, that it not abandon its responsibilities, but make every effort to promote peace and dialogue."

In Turkey, Pope Reaches Out To Islam (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 28 -- Pope Benedict XVI, beginning the most politically precarious journey of his papacy, called Tuesday for an "authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims" to help stanch terrorism and conflicts around the globe.

The pontiff, trying to assuage the hostility he provoked in September when he quoted a medieval Christian emperor who associated Islam with violence, said he wanted to use his visit to Turkey -- his first trip to a Muslim country since becoming pope -- "to reiterate my great esteem for Muslims."

Few papal tours in recent years have been more ambitious in their efforts to patch religious rivalries or more fraught with the danger of inciting deeper divides than Benedict's four-day, three-city Turkish itinerary. The visit comes not only at a diplomatically sensitive moment in Benedict's 19-month-old papacy, but at a critical juncture in Turkey's relations with the West and at a time of internal struggle over the soul of this constitutionally secular republic.

Instead of the crowds of emotional faithful that greet traveling popes on most of their foreign excursions, Benedict was met Tuesday with empty highways lined by soldiers and sharpshooters, and headlines such as the Islamic newspaper Vakit's "Unwanted Guest." On Sunday, an estimated 25,000 people turned out for a protest rally in Istanbul to demand that he cancel the trip.

The Turkish government has deployed thousands of security officers and riot police for the papal tour, a police presence that Turkish officials said is larger than the one used when President Bush attended a NATO summit here two years ago.

Vatican and Turkish officials scrambled to make last-minute schedule changes in an effort to avoid embarrassments or appearances of slights. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who initially said he had no time to see the pope, squeezed in a 20-minute visit at the airport Tuesday afternoon before departing for a NATO summit in Latvia. The pope, who has alarmed some Muslims with his plans to visit Istanbul's Haghia Sophia museum -- built as a church in the 6th century and later converted into a mosque -- added the renowned Blue Mosque to his agenda as an overture to Muslims.

Even so, every visit and meeting on the pope's agenda is heavily laden with symbolism, stark contradictions or the prospect of controversy. In his first public event, the world's most visible religious leader laid a wreath of red and white carnations at the tomb of Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern, secular Turkey and the man who removed Islam as the state religion.

Within hours of his arrival in the Turkish capital, Benedict stood on an auditorium stage with Turkey's chief Islamic cleric, Ali Bardakoglu, who last September accused the pontiff of harboring "hatred in his heart" for Muslims.

Both men wore shimmering, floor-grazing robes -- the pope a simple, caped vestment, Bardakoglu an elaborate, embroidered coat.

Bardakoglu, who heads Turkey's Directorate of Religious Affairs, confronted the pontiff's September remarks head-on.

"We Muslims condemn all types of violence and terror, regardless of whoever commits it against whosever," he said. "However, we all regret to observe that during the recent times Islamophobia has been in escalation promoting such notions that the religion of Islam with its sources and history encourages violence."

Bardakoglu said every Muslim is "deeply touched and offended by such accusations," which he said "only serve to encourage those who perform wrongdoings on behalf of religion." Despite his disagreements with the pope, Bardakoglu described the papal trip as "a positive step toward cultivating a culture of reconciliation."

In his address, Benedict said, "The best way forward is via authentic dialogue between Christians and Muslims, based on truth and inspired by a sincere wish to know one another better, respecting differences and recognizing what we have in common."

He also offered up another historical anecdote, one that conveyed a more positive view of Islam. The pontiff cited Pope Gregory VII, who in 1076 praised a Muslim prince who treated Christians with "great benevolence . . . because we believe in one God, albeit in a different manner."

DOJ_NMG_0099641

According to Erdogan, the prime minister, the pope also made another conciliatory gesture Tuesday, reversing the position he took in 2004 when, as Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he said Turkey was "in permanent contrast to Europe" and should not be admitted into the European Union.

"I asked the pope for his support on our road to the European Union," Erdogan said after their meeting. "He told me, 'We want Turkey to be part of the E.U.' " The Vatican did not comment on Erdogan's statement.

Over the next two days, the pope will meet in Istanbul with Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians. The Vatican has been attempting to improve relations with the Orthodox church after more than 1,000 years of division, while Turkey has attempted to suppress many activities of the Orthodox church.

The pope acknowledged to reporters traveling on his plane that his agenda in Turkey is ambitious. "Naturally, we should not exaggerate," he said, speaking in Italian. "It is not possible to expect major results in three days. The value, I might say, is symbolic."

The government has banned protests during the pope's visit, and only a small demonstration was held in Ankara on Tuesday. But the government has been unable to change public opinion.

"His words against the Islamic world led to this criticism," said Yetkin Bayer, 40, a physician working in a busy government clinic in one of Istanbul's poorer neighborhoods. "Otherwise, the Turkish people would be neutral about his visit. Now, no matter what he might say, he won't get much sympathy."

Special correspondent Yonca Poyraz-Dogan in Istanbul contributed to this report.

Benedict Goes To Turkey (NYT)

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

The visit of Pope Benedict XVI to Turkey was bound to be fraught, even before the pontiff's tone-deaf comments about Islam in September. As a high-ranking Vatican official in 2004 — the year before he became pope — Benedict went on record opposing Turkey's entry into the European Union, saying, in effect, that a predominantly Muslim country would never fit into a Christian Europe.

On his trip this week, the pope is being more diplomatic. Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, announced that Benedict had told him it was now the Vatican's wish that Turkey join the European Union. A papal spokesman was less direct, saying the Vatican was encouraging Turkey's "integration" into Europe. We hope that the pope's evolving stance — coupled with his calls for Christian-Muslim dialogue — will soothe popular anger in Turkey and across the Muslim world.

During his papacy, Benedict has repeatedly emphasized what he calls reciprocity, the notion that Christian minorities in Muslim countries should be as free to practice their faith as Muslims are in the West. Turkey's rigid secularism has been a central tenet of the republic since its founding — and all too often has led to repressing minority rights and religious freedom. The rigidity is now giving way — due in large part to the reforms required to meet the membership criteria of the European Union. As the pope champions the rights of Christians in Turkey and other Muslim lands, he should bear in mind that his words will be most effective if he makes clear that the West still has a long way to go in defending the rights of minorities.

The pope and his Turkish hosts are to be commended for going ahead with the trip in the face of so much dissension. Turkey needs to engage in a full debate over minority and religious rights — and how it relates to the West. Benedict's role in furthering that debate and promoting better interfaith relations may prove to be helpful.

More Catholic Than The ... (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 29, 2006

TODAY, POPE BENEDICT XVI will meet in Turkey with a representative of a religious tradition whose sometimes violent differences with the Roman Catholic Church can be traced back to the Crusades. That personage is not, as one might think, a Muslim, but a Christian: Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I of the Eastern Orthodox Church.

Although the Crusades were called to wrest back the Holy Land from Muslims, the Catholic foot soldiers in that "holy war" vandalized the sacred places of Orthodox Christians, looting Hagia Sophia, the Cathedral of Holy Wisdom, in Constantinople. (On Thursday, Benedict will visit Hagia Sophia, which was transformed into a mosque in the 15th century and is now a museum.)

News coverage of the pope's trip has focused on Catholic-Muslim relations, given the outrage in the Muslim world over a lecture in September in which Benedict quoted a medieval emperor who said Muhammad's teachings contained "things only evil and inhuman." The visit also has been shadowed by the pope's opposition as a cardinal to the admission of Turkey into the European Union, a position he repudiated Tuesday.

Yet the religious purpose of the journey is to strengthen relations between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern churches that do not recognize the authority of the bishop of Rome. Benedict's attitude toward these ancient churches could offer as many insights into his view of his role as any of his dealings with Muslims.

Benedict will travel to Istanbul — the former Constantinople — to meet Patriarch Bartholomew, the "first among equals" among Orthodox prelates. After a service in the Orthodox cathedral, the two will sign a joint declaration. It's likely to be more substantive than a conversation in Rome last week between Benedict and Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams. That encounter, while cordial, ended with a communique noting that a reunion between the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches faced "serious obstacles," including the ordination of women as Anglican priests and the acceptance by some Anglican churches of openly gay clergy.

By contrast, the Eastern Orthodox Church, like the Roman Catholic Church, limits its priesthood to men, condemns homosexual relations and values traditional forms of worship. The affinities between the pope and the patriarch are theological, but they could have political consequences. Many of the churches that complain of oppression by Islamic governments (including the Orthodox Church in Turkey) have roots in Constantinople, not Rome. If the pope plans to be their champion, he will need to build bridges to Muslims as well as fellow Christians.

NEW DELHI, Nov. 24 — Even those who caution against "illusions of grandeur and power," as the head of India's governing coalition, Sonia Gandhi, did last week, cannot hide their sense of pride at the idea of India as a nation that extends the concessions of secular democracy to its many castes, creeds and faiths.

Yet that notion has come under some strain in recent days, with an official panel having concluded that Muslims, India's largest religious minority, are "lagging behind" on most things that matter.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office, which is reviewing the report, summarized the panel's biting conclusion this way: "The community is relatively poor, more illiterate, has lower access to education, lower representation in public- and private-sector jobs and lower availability of bank credit for self-employment. In urban areas, the community mostly lives in slums characterized by poor municipal infrastructure."

Muslims make up roughly 13 percent of India's population of 1.1 billion, and their numbers are nearly equal to the entire population of Pakistan, which was carved out of British India nearly 60 years ago as the homeland of the subcontinent's Muslims. Soul-searching about Muslim rights and well-being in this country, which has witnessed periodic outbreaks of religious violence, has been a recurrent leitmotif ever since.

The latest findings have prompted fresh debate. In an editorial in The Indian Express, an English-language daily, Pratap Bhanu Mehta, the president of the Delhi-based Center for Policy Research, suggested that the government's panel had revealed "the hollowness of our concept of republican citizenship."

"What is at stake," Mr. Mehta said, "is not just uplifting this or that group, but the very idea of India itself: whether it has the capacity for transcending the cant, indifference and identity traps that have brought us to this pass."

The report is expected to be made public soon, but leaks in the last several weeks have already turned its contents into political fodder. Trial balloons have been floated about extending affirmative action benefits originally devised to uplift low-caste Hindus and others considered "backward," by offering additional set-asides in education and employment for Muslims.

The mark of "backwardness" is a boon in this country, where a government job can lift a family's fortunes forever, just as it is a vital part of political arithmetic: Secure jobs for a group, the reasoning goes, and you secure its loyalty at the polls.

A number of Muslim religious and political leaders have already begun to advocate quotas for Muslims. But the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party has pointed out that Indian law prohibits faith-based quotas.

The secretary of the panel that issued the report, Abusaleh Shariff, said in an interview this week that in some states, education and poverty indicators showed that Muslims had fallen behind even low-caste Hindus. Mr. Shariff said the panel recommended, among other things, free and compulsory education up to age 14, as well as financial support to promote industries in which Muslims are concentrated, like textiles.

The findings of the panel, headed by a retired high court judge, Rajinder Sachar, are expected to add to sparring over the Muslim vote, particularly in the elections to be held next year in India's largest state, Uttar Pradesh, where Muslims are a vital chunk of the electorate. The report will become public when Mr. Singh submits it to Parliament, possibly during its current session.

Among the panel's most damning statistics, as reported by The Indian Express, are that in many states Muslims are significantly overrepresented in prison. In the western state of Maharashtra, for instance, Muslims make up 10.6 percent of the population but 32.4 percent of those convicted or facing trial. In the famed national bureaucracy, the Indian Administrative Service, Muslims made up only 2 percent of officers in 2006. Among district judges in 15 states surveyed, 2.7 percent were Muslim.

Educational disparities were among the most striking. Among Muslims, Mr. Shariff said, the literacy rate is about 59 percent, compared with more than 65 percent among Indians as a whole. On average, a Muslim child attends school for three years and four months, compared with a national average of four years.

Less than 4 percent of Muslims graduate from school, compared with 6 percent of the total population. Less than 2 percent of the students at the elite Indian Institutes of Technology are Muslim. Equally revealing, only 4 percent of Muslim children attend madrasas, Mr. Shariff said.

The gaps in employment are likely to be among the most politically explosive. Muslims appear to be overrepresented in the informal sector of day laborers and street vendors and underrepresented in the public sector. Muslims secured about 15 percent of all government jobs, considerably less than the share filled by "backward" castes and Dalits, those who were considered "untouchables" in the Hindu caste system.

Whatever action the government decides to take, it will have to contend with a peculiar dimension of Muslim identity here. Since they are mostly converts from Hinduism or descendants of converts, Muslims in India are riven by caste. In other words, there are Muslim Dalits, as well as Muslims who are considered "backward."

To ignore those divides and entitle all Muslims to the same affirmative action benefits, Imtiaz Ahmad, a retired professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University argued, would be to reward only those at the upper reaches of the Muslim social ladder.

Many well-to-do Muslims, he said, particularly those with access to education, have benefited from the Indian economic advance in recent years. The Muslim community, he and other scholars point out, is made up of a small elite, vast numbers of poor people and very few people in between.

Whether India can deliver the fruits of economic progress to the many Muslims at the bottom of the ladder remains a crucial question.

At least, Mr. Ahmad argued, India has managed to address Muslim concerns without what he called the "coercive apparatus" that some European countries have adopted. He compared India's approach with that of the Netherlands, which recently banned the wearing of the Muslim burqa, or face-covering veil, in public places.

"There are many things we can say about Indian democracy," Mr. Ahmad said. "But it has given assurances, to minorities included, that things are negotiable."

Building A Democracy (WP)

The Washington Post, November 29, 2006

Two years ago an authoritarian regime's attempt to hijack the presidential election in Ukraine failed. As official results were announced, disbelief provoked millions of citizens to pour into the streets in protest. They took a stand against those discredited officials who hid behind law enforcement bodies in an attempt to prolong their corrupt hold on power. Those days and weeks are known as Ukraine's Orange Revolution.

In the time since, my main goal as president has been to institutionalize democracy and guarantee that it is irreversible. Many of the wrongs in my country have been corrected. We are maintaining our unwavering commitment to the principles of freedom. We agreed to shift constitutional powers from an authoritarian presidency to a coalition government formed by parliament to end the country's political impasse. And we abolished state censorship of the media, while also forbidding interference in news reporting.

This year free and fair elections were held at national, regional and local levels. Overseeing the peaceful and democratic transition of power was my unique test, as it brought back to office my former political opponents.

But along with our national successes and economic achievements under two "orange" prime ministers, there have been disappointments and miscalculations. Infighting among my political allies has been the biggest disappointment. Some "orange" politicians have ignored their fundamental duty to deliver results for the public good. Instead, gaining political power and seeking the limelight have become their goal. As our country's democracy continues to mature, I am convinced that a young cadre of leaders will rise through the ranks of Ukraine's democratic parties to create a political renewal.

On my watch, the corruption that has historically emanated from the president's office ceased. Thousands of election officials, tax collectors, foot patrols, road police and customs agents were brought to justice for petty corruption. Yet the biggest abusers of public office remain at large because of unreformed prosecutors and corruption in the courts. I have recently initiated a number of anti-corruption bills to reform the criminal justice system and the courts, and I will continue to press parliament for speedy action.

Because we were preoccupied with domestic political reforms this year, we failed to communicate effectively with our international partners. I want to explain where Ukraine stands and where we are heading. Democracy and stability -- two interdependent principles -- form the basis of my agenda. To this end, I will continue constitutional reforms that facilitate the effective work of government and prevent a return to authoritarianism or the usurpation of power.

Today there is a balance of political power between two directly elected democratic bodies: the president and parliament. The prime minister, although not directly elected, represents a majority of the parliamentarians. Bills specifying the role of the governing coalition and the opposition have yet to be passed. But let there be no mistake: Together we share responsibility for shaping, executing and controlling laws and state policies.

Second, constitutional reforms are incomplete, and as a result there is a political asymmetry. We will continue refining a reliable system of checks and balances between the presidency, parliament and coalition government to expedite policy decision making. To meet these objectives, I have commissioned a group of constitutional experts to recommend amendments to strengthen our nascent democratic institutions.

Third, our law on national security promotes participation and membership in pan-European and regional systems of collective security. Membership in the European Union and NATO, as well as good relations and strategic partnerships with Russia and other countries in the Commonwealth of Independent States, are not romantic ideas of the Orange Revolution -- they are founded in Ukrainian law. The president, coalition government and parliament determine the speed with which these goals are reached.

Most important, the democratic debates in Kiev's halls of power are now centered on ideas about competing economic theories, values and worldviews. Our current system of checks and balances requires policy coordination, party coexistence and political compromise for us to move forward. Not everyone likes the new rules of the game, and some are having trouble playing in this new reality -- but Ukraine's democracy is here to stay.

As president, my historic mission is to guarantee that Ukraine's national goals are reached not through political dictates but through an institutionalized democratic process that brings together governing bodies and citizen groups. I am convinced an inclusive democracy is one of the most significant and lasting achievements of the Orange Revolution.

The writer is president of Ukraine.

TWO MONTHS after a high-profile visit to China, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. is planning a December return -- this time accompanied by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke as well as a handful of fellow Cabinet members. The visit is the first in a series of biannual meetings and reflects Mr. Paulson's conviction that high-level intergovernment contacts can help promote policy breakthroughs. It's a worthy effort, but there's no certain payoff. U.S. officials have spent the past few years urging China to rein in its trade surplus, which causes an imbalance in the world economy as well as impatience in Congress. But China's surplus has nonetheless ballooned defiantly.

China's trade surplus reflects an extremely high savings rate: The Chinese are saving so hard that they don't buy what they make and instead export it. Taming the trade surplus must involve shifting China's economy from saving to consumption. But despite repeated promises from its top leaders to move in this direction, China has done nothing of the sort. As of 2005, the Chinese consumed only 38 percent of their gross domestic product (GDP) -- less than in the 1990s and less than every other country, according to Nicholas R. Lardy of the Peterson Institute for International Economics. By contrast, India consumes 61 percent of GDP and the United States consumes an excessive 70 percent.

China's policymakers could stoke consumption if they wanted. They have experimented with modest tax cuts and aim to reduce corporate saving by requiring state-owned firms to pay dividends, starting next year. But they have not taken the step that would make the biggest difference: Raising the government's spending on social services, which would directly boost the government's own consumption and have some effect on households, since one reason for high private savings is the absence of a public safety net. Nor has China allowed its currency to rise, a move that would help to ease the trade surplus. Although the yuan has gained modestly against the dollar over the past year, it has fallen against the currencies of other trading partners.

China has an interest in boosting consumption, so in theory Mr. Paulson should be pushing on an open door. The high-savings model depends on foreigners' readiness to buy ever more Chinese exports, but this will eventually trigger a protectionist backlash. It promotes capital-intensive growth, which is not the most effective way to create jobs for Chinese workers. And the path of capital-intensive growth tends to be energy-intensive, which is one reason China's coal consumption has shot up by two-thirds since 2000 and why China is home to 16 of the 20 cities in the world that score worst for air pollution. Yet all these arguments for a more consumption-based growth model have long been understood by Chinese technocrats. Change has been blocked by a combination of vested interests and political caution.

The United States has an interest in seeing the technocrats prevail. The environmental fallout from capital-intensive growth affects global warming, and China's manipulation of its currency and suppression of consumption undermine public faith in the fairness of globalization. Mr. Paulson is right to press these points to the Chinese. The question is whether China takes its global responsibilities seriously enough to listen.

German who alleges CIA torture expresses confidence in U.S. justice system

By DESMOND BUTLER

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_On his first visit to the United States, Khaled el-Masri, who claims the CIA tortured him at a prison in Afghanistan, is expressing confidence in the U.S. justice system.

El-Masri spoke to reporters after a federal appeals court in Richmond, Virginia, heard arguments by his attorneys Tuesday that a lawsuit he filed against the former head of the CIA should be reinstated. He arrived Sunday from Germany and planned to hold a Washington news conference Wednesday morning.

His accusations against the CIA have put a spotlight on the intelligence agency's secret rendition program to capture terror suspects for interrogation in foreign countries, which has been heavily criticized by human rights groups.

"I have confidence in the American judicial systems and its courts. What I really want is that they admit to me that an injustice was done to me," el-Masri said through a translator after the appeals court hearing. "I would like an explanation and I would like an apology."'

El-Masri previously was denied entry into the United States when he arrived to publicize the filing of his lawsuit last year, according to the American Civil Liberties Union, which has supported his case. In recent weeks, he was issued a visa.

The lawsuit filed against former CIA director George Tenet and others was dismissed in May when a judge ruled that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

ACLU lawyer Ben Wizner told the court Tuesday that el-Masri was "the public face of a publicly acknowledged program." Since the basics of the rendition program already are common knowledge, he argued, the lawsuit could be considered without exposing state secrets.

Greg Katsis, a lawyer for the U.S. Department of Justice, argued that the government properly invoked its state secrets privilege to protect information outlined in a classified affidavit that Judge T.S. Ellis III read before dismissing the lawsuit\l "l".

El-Masri alleges he was mistakenly identified as an associate of the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l", 2001, hijackers and was kidnapped while attempting to enter Macedonia for a vacation on Dec. 31, 2003. He claims he was flown to a CIA-run prison known as the "salt pit" in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was beaten and sodomized with an object during five months in captivity.

The CIA has refused throughout to comment on el-Masri's allegations.

El-Masri's allegations also are the subject of a German parliamentary investigation that is trying to clarify when German government officials became aware of el-Masri's case and whether German security services participated in interrogations in Afghanistan.

The appeals court usually takes several weeks to issue its ruling.

Man Mistakenly Abducted by C.I.A. Seeks Reinstatement of Suit

NEIL A. LEWIS

RICHMOND, Va., Nov. 28 A lawyer for a German man who was abducted while on vacation in Macedonia and said he was tortured while in C.I.A. custody in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court on Tuesday to reinstate his lawsuit against the agency, which had been dismissed for national security reasons.

In May, a federal trial judge threw out the suit brought by Khaled el-Masri, who said he was an innocent victim of the Central Intelligence Agency's program of transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation. Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria said that although it appeared a great injustice might have been done to Mr. Masri, he was persuaded by the government that there was no way to even begin a trial without impermissibly disclosing state secrets.

Benjamin Wizner, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, told a three-judge appeals panel on Tuesday that the government's position was absurd because what happened to Mr. Masri had hardly remained secret. He noted that the German government was openly investigating whether its officials had played a role in Mr. Masri's ordeal, and numerous news accounts have quoted unidentified American officials as confirming what happened.

Mr. Wizner said the government had not plausibly explained how national security interests might be harmed by a trial. He said President Bush acknowledged the C.I.A.'s program, known as extraordinary rendition, this summer, and it is widely known that other governments have been involved. A trial would not disclose state secrets but would merely involve "confirmation of a fact the entire world already knows," he said.

Gregory G. Katsas, a senior Justice Department lawyer, told the judges that courts must defer to the executive branch when it invokes the state secrets doctrine, which was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953.

Mr. Katsas said Porter J. Goss, who was the C.I.A. director when the suit was brought, filed a secret statement with the court outlining the agency's case against a trial. Mr. Katsas said the statement provided a detailed account of how seemingly innocuous disclosures "will have a cascading effect that will have devastating consequences" for national security.

Mr. Masri sat stolidly in the first row of the courtroom during the 50-minute argument. A large man with graying hair cinched in a ponytail, he said in an interview later that he was infuriated with Judge Ellis's view that there might be no remedy for the injustice apparently done to him.

Mr. Masri, who was born in Kuwait, was arrested in Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003, and flown to a prison in Afghanistan, where he was held for five months. During his incarceration, he has said, he was shackled, beaten and injected with drugs.

On Tuesday, he said through an interpreter that he was kept in deplorable conditions "not fit for a human being at all." Upon arrival in Afghanistan, he said, he was told that he was in a place where he had no right to recourse for what happened to him.

"I would like an explanation for what happened," he told reporters. "I would like an apology."

Mr. Wizner, his lawyer, said that although he believed Mr. Masri was entitled to financial compensation, he was not necessarily seeking anything beyond some official expression of remorse.

United States officials have been quoted anonymously in news reports as saying that Mr. Masri's case was one of mistaken identity; intelligence authorities may have confused him with an operative for Al Qaeda with a similar name.

The officials said Mr. Masri was released in May 2004 on the orders of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, after she learned he had been mistakenly identified as a terrorism suspect. He was freed in Albania, where he was left to make his way home to Germany, which he likened to being treated "like a piece of luggage."

Mr. Masri, who had earlier been denied permission to come to the United States to attend the hearing, said he has not been able to find a job since his return to Germany. "Both my Arab and German friends keep their distance," he said.

On Wednesday, he is scheduled to meet with some Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who are exploring the rendition program and the Bush administration's increasingly frequent invocation of the state secrets doctrine to block lawsuits.

The Wronged Man; Unjustly Imprisoned and Mistreated, Khaled al-Masri Wants Answers the U.S. Government Doesn't Want to Give

By Dana Priest
Washington Post Staff Writer

RICHMOND, Nov. 28

Khaled al-Masri was supposed to have been disappeared by black-hooded CIA paramilitaries in the dead of night. One minute he was riding a bus in Macedonia, the next -- poof -- gone. Grabbed by Macedonian agents, handed off to junior CIA operatives in Skopje and then secretly flown to a prison in Afghanistan that didn't officially exist, to be interrogated with rough measures that weren't officially on the books. And then never to be heard from again -- one fewer terrorist in the post-9/11 world.

Instead, on Tuesday, Masri finds himself sitting in an American courtroom so elegant that even his experienced lawyers are commenting on its beautiful dark wood and graceful chandeliers. Dressed in white shirt sleeves and a modest maroon vest, Masri is waiting to see if the judges will allow the CIA to disappear him again.

This time, it's not the physical, flesh-and-blood, burly, ponytailed German citizen with six kids whom the U.S. government wants to make vanish from the face of the Earth. It's his legal case, his very right to have his argument heard in open court, that the CIA is seeking to have disappeared. They argue, citing the state-secrets privilege, that to proceed with the case would damage national security and that this damage outweighs any legal rights Masri may have.

The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District agreed with the government in May.

If they have their way this time, the pale Justice Department lawyers swaying back in their chairs before the three judges of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit would prohibit any judge and any jury anywhere from ever hearing the arguments in Masri's six legal pleadings and 40 exhibits, more than 1,000 pages in all. Much of the evidence was unearthed by German prosecutors and European Parliament investigators.

There are also the eight U.S. officials who confirmed to at least one American reporter that Masri spent months in a dank Afghan cell because a couple of CIA officials in Washington had a hunch he was someone he was not and that they just didn't move fast enough when they found out he wasn't. Countless other reporters in the United States and Europe have been told the same by unnamed government officials.

So basically, "the entire world can discuss this case . . . but not the U.S. courts?" Masri's lawyer Ben Wizner will momentarily ask the panel.

But for now, the first Invisible Man to appear on U.S. soil is listening intently to the other cases the judges have to consider before his, including one about an Internet user's First Amendment free-speech rights. Masri's translator, Ulrike Wiesner, whispers in his ear: "They can even burn the American flag here." Burning a German flag is illegal in Germany. Those crazy Americans.

Masri whispers back: "Well, let's see if that applies to us Indians." They laugh quietly.

Much of Masri's ordeal has been confirmed by the German government. He fled the civil war in Lebanon in 1985 when he was 21 and married a German woman. He was divorced 10 years later and then married a Lebanese woman. He worked as a carpenter, then truck driver, then car salesman. Since 2004 he has been unemployed and living with his children and wife in a one-room apartment.

His deteriorating living conditions were a stress on his marriage. On Dec. 30, 2003, he decided to get away, to take a bus trip to Macedonia to clear his head. To make a very long story shorter, Macedonian police took him off the bus and interrogated him at the Skopski Merak Hotel for 23 days.

This being the Internet age, Masri says in one legal declaration: From the hotel Web site "I can identify the actual room where I was held. . . . I even recognize one of the waiters who served me food during my detention there."

At some point a couple of people who sounded American showed up. On Jan. 23, 2004, things took a bad turn. Current and former CIA officials say Masri was believed to have a fake passport and the same name as someone else they were looking for.

He was eventually brought to another room where, according to his affidavit, "I felt two people violently grab my arms. . . . I then felt someone else grab my head with both hands so I was unable to move. . . . Finally they stripped me completely naked and threw me to the ground. . . . I felt a boot in the small of my back. I then felt a stick or some other hard object being forced in my anus. I realized I was being sodomized. Of all the acts these men perpetrated against me, this was the most degrading and shameful."

For his flight to Afghanistan, Masri was blindfolded, "my ears were plugged with cotton, and headphones were placed over my ears. A bag was placed over my head and a belt around my waist. They put something hard over my nose. Because of the bag, breathing was getting harder and harder for me. . . . I began to panic."

He spent five months in a filthy secret prison set up by the CIA and guarded by Afghans. He was made to drink water so putrid it made him vomit. He slept on a single blanket, shivered through the cold months and was fed chicken bones and skin. He was beaten and interrogated many times, sometimes by people he believes to be Americans. He went on a hunger strike, lost 60 pounds.

Eventually the CIA caught up with its mistake. They argued with the State Department over whether to tell the Germans and eventually agreed they could not lie to such a close ally. So they chose to tell then-Interior Minister Otto Schily because he was thought to be Washington-friendly.

Masri was released in Albania, then flown to Germany, where he made his way home to Ulm. There, he contacted a lawyer and then the German authorities. "What I really want is for them to admit that injustice was done. I'd like an explanation and I'd like an apology," he said.

* * *

Is a state secret still a secret if everyone knows it? That's what the court case boils down to at this point.

Masri's lawyers say no.

They point to President Bush's Sept. 6, 2006, disclosure that the CIA ran secret prisons abroad and conducted covert rendition flights as part of its counterterrorism campaign.

They point to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's statement that if there were injustices in these programs, they can be remedied in U.S. courts.

They point to the testimony of Schily before the German Parliament just last week in which he said that then-U.S. Ambassador Daniel R. Coats had told him that the CIA had mistakenly imprisoned Masri and offered an apology -- not to Masri, but to the German government. They point to reams and reams of official German evidence.

The CIA and Justice Department lawyers strongly disagree. They argue that allowing a case to go forward could lead to a "cascading" of disclosures, many unforeseen, and that foreign governments would refuse to work in secret with the CIA for fear they could end up in court.

"Just because some facts are in the public domain doesn't eliminate the need to keep others secret," Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas argued Tuesday. The president's announcement, he added, has "zero overlap" with Masri's allegations. "Even disclosures to judges carry risks," he reminded them.

Before all this happened, "I was a very simple person with not many problems," Masri says, straining and pausing to find words, or gather his thoughts. "I had lots of friends. My head was not burdened with so many things. I felt more safe."

Today's Masri "has less freedom. . . . This Khaled stays mostly at home. There's too much stress. And my interests have changed. I am reading a lot now, about politics and prisoners."

He has testified before government panels in Spain, Germany and to the European Parliament investigating the CIA's covert activities. He is in the news constantly, often with allegations of alleged ties to terrorist groups. Still unemployed and reconciled with his wife, he hates the limelight. He hates the stares on the streets and the Germans who call out to him, as one did recently in the supermarket: "You are a bad man!"

He has flashbacks, too. And his mood turns bad whenever he sees war news, especially from the recent war in Lebanon, where he still has family. "I get in a bad mood and just want to be left alone in my room," he says, "to withdraw."

Today, 10 cameras are waiting for him to finish his omelet and coffee and walk into the courthouse. "I am very nervous inside," he says.

The last time Masri tried to come to the United States to listen to his court case, he and his attorney had walked off the plane in Atlanta and found 20 security guards waiting for them, both men said. He didn't have a visa because German citizens don't need visas to enter the United States. Instead of letting him in, one of officers drew his gun and threatened to shoot the lawyer if he did not put away his cellphone.

Flying back to the United States this week, Masri expected another hostile airport scene: "I had a funny feeling. I always thought they would take me and send me back to somewhere other than home."

This time immigration authorities were polite, looked through his luggage, asked him some questions, even spoke a little German. Eventually, one of them said "Welcome to America" and let him pass to the other side.

"I think it's really good I've gotten this far," he says with a slight smile.

Asked how he feels toward the United States after all this, he shrugs.

"I never thought badly of the United States. I do think badly of the foreign policy aspects and the sitting government."

Nudge a little further and he'll say he'd like "an America without Bush."

And a little further:

"I'd like to drive with the top down in a fancy car through New York City and to look up at all the tall buildings," he laughs, looking up to the ceiling and throwing open his arms. "You've got a real view of the whole thing from a car without a top."

McLellan says she was in dark about Arar

Andrew Mayeda, CanWest News Service

OTTAWA - Anne McLellan has added her name to the list of former Liberal cabinet ministers who say they were not fully briefed by the RCMP on Maher Arar.

McLellan was appointed public safety minister in December 2003 and, shortly thereafter, called a judicial inquiry into the case.

This fall, Justice Dennis O'Connor concluded the RCMP passed inaccurate information to the United States on Arar that likely led to his detention and torture in Syria.

On Tuesday, McLellan confirmed she was briefed on the "Arar situation" by RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli and former CSIS director Ward Elcock.

But she said she only learned that the RCMP had passed along false information on Arar to the U.S. when the O'Connor report was released in late September.

The RCMP described Arar to U.S. authorities as an Islamic extremist suspected of ties to al-Qaida, even though he was never more than a "person of interest" in an RCMP national-security investigation.

"In my presence, (neither) Commissioner Zaccardelli, nor anyone else, either from the RCMP or CSIS, (ever) referred to Mr. Arar as an Islamic extremist," McLellan told a Commons public safety committee that has been probing the Arar affair.

"That was an expression that was never used in relation to Mr. Arar in my presence. Ever."

McLellan's statements appear to contradict assertions by Zaccardelli that he briefed the government about the mistakes by the RCMP.

In an appearance before the same committee in late September, Zaccardelli said he informed former solicitor general Wayne Easter about the errors. The solicitor general was the minister in charge of the RCMP before the position was abolished last year.

But last month, Easter testified that he was never so informed.

"There is no situation where the RCMP came to me and basically said, 'We screwed up. We provided improper information,'" he said at the time.

Earlier this month, Elcock of CSIS also testified he did not learn of the RCMP's mislabeling of Arar until after the O'Connor report was released.

On Tuesday, McLellan described an environment in which concern about the Arar affair reached to the top of the political ladder.

She said that soon after former prime minister Paul Martin took office in December 2003, he asked her to "get to the bottom of what had happened to Mr. Arar."

McLellan insisted that she has "no evidence whatsoever that the RCMP ever withheld any information from me." But she never recalls Arar being referred to as anything other than a person of interest in RCMP and CSIS briefings.

Given the priority given to the case by the former Liberal government, some committee members wondered why McLellan wasn't asking tougher questions of RCMP and other government officials.

"I'm having a little bit of trouble believing that the minister responsible for what was, at that time, a huge public security case, that it wouldn't dawn on you to ask these questions," said Conservative MP Gord Brown.

Zaccardelli has agreed to appear again before the committee to clarify his statements. He is scheduled to appear on Dec. 5.

Judge strikes down Bush on terror groups

By LINDA DEUTSCH
AP SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

LOS ANGELES -- A federal judge struck down President Bush's authority to designate groups as terrorists, saying his post-Sept. 11 executive order was unconstitutional and vague.

Some parts of the Sept. 24, 2001 order tagging 27 groups and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" were too vague and could impinge on First Amendment rights of free association, U.S. District Judge Audrey Collins said.

The order gave the president "unfettered discretion" to label groups without giving them a way to challenge the designations, she said in a Nov. 21 ruling that was made public Tuesday.

The judge, who two years ago invalidated portions of the U.S. Patriot Act, rejected several sections of Bush's Executive Order 13224 and enjoined the government from blocking the assets of two foreign groups.

However, she let stand sections that would penalize those who provide "services" to designated terrorist groups.

She said such services would include the humanitarian aid and rights training proposed by the plaintiffs.

The ruling was praised by David Cole, a lawyer for the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Constitutional Rights, who represented the plaintiff Humanitarian Law Project.

It "says that even in fighting terrorism the president cannot be given a blank check to blacklist anyone he considers a bad guy or a bad group and you can't imply guilt by association," Cole said.

He said the Humanitarian Law Project will appeal those portions of the executive order which were allowed to stand.

A U.S. Department of Justice spokesman had a mixed reaction to the judge's ruling.

"We are pleased the court rejected many of the constitutional arguments raised by the plaintiffs, including their challenge to the government's ban on providing services to terrorist organizations," Justice spokesman Charles Miller said Tuesday. "However, we believe the court erred in finding that certain other aspects of the executive order were unconstitutional."

The judge's ruling was a reversal of her own tentative findings last July in which she indicated she would uphold wide powers asserted by Bush under an anti-terror financing law. She delayed her ruling then to allow more legal briefs to be filed.

The long-running litigation has centered on two groups, the Liberation Tigers, which seeks a separate homeland for the Tamil people in Sri Lanka, and Partiya Karkeran Kurdistan, a political organization representing the interests of Kurds in Turkey.

Both groups have been designated by the United States as foreign terrorist organizations.

The judge's 45-page ruling granted in part and denied in part a legal challenge brought by the Humanitarian Law Project, which seeks to provide training to the groups in human rights advocacy and provide them with humanitarian aid.

U.S. Currency Discriminates Against Blind, Judge Rules

By EDMUND L. ANDREWS

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 — A federal judge here ruled on Tuesday that the government illegally discriminated against blind people by printing its paper currency on bills of the same size that could not be distinguished by touch.

The judge, James Robertson of Federal District Court, ordered the Treasury Department to start discussing within 30 days potential remedies, including different note sizes for different denominations and raised numerals and perforated dots on the bills.

“Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency,” Judge Robertson wrote, “only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations.”

The judge pointed out that euro notes came in bigger sizes for higher denominations and had raised numerals as well as foil patches in different shapes. Japanese notes have rough patches to help identify them by touch. Swiss francs feature intaglio printing and perforated numerals, and other countries use sequences of perforated dots.

“The fact that each of these features is currently used in other currencies suggests that, on the face of things, such accommodations are reasonable,” Judge Robertson wrote.

The Treasury Department refused to comment on the decision or on whether it would appeal the order, which came after a four-year court fight between the government and the American Council of the Blind.

The Treasury Department had argued that making bills identifiable by touch would create an undue financial burden for the government. It had estimated that the most expensive approach — printing different sizes for different denominations — would cost $178 million for new printing presses and as much as $50 million for new plates.

Judge Robertson said that cost would be small compared with the $4.2 billion that the government spent on currency production in the past 10 years.

He also rejected as “utterly unpersuasive” government pleas that new tactile features might undermine the anticounterfeiting features. He also dismissed the government’s argument that such features might undermine the greenback’s international acceptance, saying, “This contention is not only not supported but, on its face, absurd.”

Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and government affairs for the American Council of the Blind, said the decision addressed a constant problem for people with little or no eyesight.

Paper currency “is one of the biggest parts of everyday life, and we just don’t have access to it,” Ms. Al-Mohamed said. About 937,000 people in the United States are legally blind, and an additional 2.3 million people have “low vision” even when wearing corrective lenses.

The American Council of the Blind had argued that American paper currency was “inaccessible” to blind people and violated the Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination in government programs against people with disabilities.

Judge Robertson said people with severely impaired vision were inherently vulnerable to being cheated if they had to depend on other people to distinguish among a $1 bill, a $20 bill or a $100 bill.

In 1995, he added, the National Academy of Sciences concluded that three features could be incorporated into American banknotes: distinctive sizes for each denomination; increasing the size and contrast of numerals; and varying the notes’ colors to help people with limited vision.

In 1996, the government redesigned banknotes and added two features: one larger number at a slightly different height from the rest of the bill, and an infrared symbol to encourage the development of handheld currency readers for the blind.

Judge Robertson said those changes fell “well short” of what the National Academy of Sciences had recommended and were mainly intended to prevent counterfeiting.

To aid blind, alter money, judge orders

BY MATT APUZZO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON -- The government discriminates against blind people by printing money that all looks and feels the same, a federal judge said Tuesday in a ruling that could change the appearance of U.S. currency.

District Judge James Robertson ordered the Treasury Department to come up with ways for blind people to tell bills apart.

"Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations," Robertson wrote.

"More than 100 of the other issuers vary their bills in size according to denomination, and every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired."

U.S. bills haven't always been the same size. In 1929, the government standardized the size.

The government has 10 days to decide whether to appeal.

Schools asks court to revive challenge to education mandate

CINCINNATI_School districts in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court today to revive a lawsuit challenging the way a government education program is funded.

The National Education Association, its affiliates in Connecticut and eight other states, and school districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law.

They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government. They also say the government is imposing unfunded mandates even though the act itself prohibits unfunded mandates.

A chief U.S. District judge in Detroit dismissed the lawsuit in November 2005, saying the plaintiffs failed to support their claim.

Justices skeptical of patent process

Bloomberg News.

WASHINGTON The U.S . Supreme Court on Tuesday indicated that it might make it easier to challenge patents granted to some inventions as the justices criticized a lower court test used for more than two decades.

The court heard arguments in a bid by KSR International Co. to stop a lawsuit that accuses it of using Teleflex Inc.'s patented invention for adjustable gas pedals. KSR is asking the court to rule that innovations that merely combine existing products often don't qualify for a patent.

Most patents are issued for improvements to existing products rather than entirely new inventions. Under the current standard, a challenger seeking to invalidate a patent on grounds it simply combined previous inventions must prove there was a "teaching, suggestion or motivation" to put those earlier inventions together.

"It is misleading to say that the whole world is embraced within these three nouns," Justice Antonin Scalia said. "This is gobbledygook. It really is. It's irrational."

The test has been in effect since shortly after the 1982 creation of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Washington, which handles almost all appeals in patent cases.

A ruling for KSR could make it harder to get patents and easier to challenge them in court. Backing KSR are Intel Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc., which say getting a patent is too easy. Supporting Teleflex are Johnson & Johnson, 3M Co. and General Electric Co. They say weakening patent protection would hinder innovation.

Teleflex sued KSR in 2002. KSR makes the pedals for General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet and GMC trucks and sport-utility vehicles. Teleflex developed the technology for use in Ford Motor Co.'s F350 pickup.

A ruling is expected by July.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US To Pay $2 Million Settlement For Terror Probe Fingerprint Error. The AP (11/30, Skidmore) reports, "The federal government has agreed to pay an Oregon lawyer $2 million to settle part of a lawsuit he filed after the FBI misidentified a fingerprint and wrongly arrested him in the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings. 'The pain and torture and humiliation that this (case) has caused my family is hard to put into words,' Brandon Mayfield said after the settlement was announced Wednesday." The AP adds, "The local FBI office said it was proud of its work in the case, and disagreed Mayfield's religion was a factor because it was discovered after the fingerprint identification, said agent Robert Jordan. … The government did not admit liability or fault but issued a formal apology to Mayfield as part of the settlement, said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos."

McClatchy (11/30, Taylor) reports that "Mayfield's arrest is one of the FBI's most embarrassing episodes in its five-year campaign to detect terrorist cells inside the United States. The case also cast doubt on the accuracy of the FBI's troubled fingerprint-identification program and raised questions about sweeping anti-terror measures passed by Congress in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. … Justice Department officials deny that religion played any part in his arrest. But Mayfield called any other conclusion 'ridiculous.'" McClatchy notes, "Since the arrest, FBI officials said they've made 'significant' changes to the fingerprint identification program to prevent a future mistake."

USA Today (11/30, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) adds, "Despite the agreement, Mayfield said he would continue to press a separate legal action challenging the USA Patriot Act. … 'The power of the government to secretly search your home or business without probable cause, under the guise of a terrorist investigation, must be stopped,' Mayfield said in a written statement." However, Scolinos "said the department's inspector general concluded earlier this year that Mayfield was not targeted because of his religion and found that the FBI had not misused provisions of the Patriot Act."

The Washington Post (11/30, 3A, Eggen, 690K) notes that "the FBI bungled a fingerprint match" and adds that the "payment is a clear embarrassment for the FBI. … Mayfield said in a statement yesterday that he was threatened with the death penalty while in custody, that he and his family were targeted 'because of our Muslim religion,' and that he looks forward 'to the day when the Patriot Act is declared unconstitutional.'" However, "Scolinos issued a statement emphasizing that the FBI was not aware of Mayfield's Muslim faith when he was first identified as a suspect and that investigators 'did not misuse any provisions of the USA Patriot Act.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/30, Verhovek, 850K) reports, "The case highlighted the error potential for fingerprint matching, which some experts say is unacceptably high," and the New York Times (11/30, Lichtblau, 1.16M) adds, "Several legal experts said they considered the settlement significant because of the public apology and the substantial payment. … Former CIA lawyer Suzanne Spaulding "said that the terms of the settlement allowing Mr. Mayfield to continue his lawsuit over the Patriot Act were also significant." She noted, "That and the two million dollars are further evidence that they were vulnerable and that he clearly had some significant leverage in these negotiations."

CNN.com (11/30, Schuster, Frieden) reports, "Wednesday's settlement includes not only a $2 million payment and an apology, but also an agreement by the government to destroy communications intercepts conducted by the FBI against Mayfield's home and office during the investigation. … A Justice Department statement released Wednesday said Mayfield was not targeted because of his Muslim faith and that the FBI had taken steps to improve its fingerprint identification process 'to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield does not happen again.'"

The AP (11/30, Peterson) reports that the Portland, OR, FBI office "said Wednesday that it was proud of its work in the case – other than the fingerprint error. … 'If a similar investigation was being conducted, and we were provided a fingerprint identification, we would do exactly what we did in the case of Mr. Mayfield,' said agent Robert Jordan. 'We are very proud of what we did here, but we recognize that our laboratory made a mistake.'" The AP adds, "Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the FBI has since adopted suggestions for improving its fingerprint identification process 'to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield does not happen again.'" The AP notes, "The U.S. formally apologized to Mayfield as part of the settlement, Scolinos said. … Two internal Justice investigations cleared the FBI and prosecutors of wrongdoing, she said. A December 2005 review by the department's Office of Professional Responsibility found that federal prosecutors who handled the investigation acted appropriately. … A month later, Justice Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded that Mayfield's faith was not the reason the FBI began its investigation, and that the agency did not misuse provisions of the USA Patriot Act."

The Oregonian (11/30, Denson, 318K) reports, "Mayfield and his wife, Mona, said the $2 million settlement will help pay their lawyers and put their children through college. But they said the money could never make them whole for what they described as illegal violations of their privacy. 'To this date,' Mayfield said, 'the government has refused to tell us where they placed their electronic listening devices and cameras, leaving myself and family to forever wonder if they were listening to our most private conversations, watching our most intimate interactions.'" The Oregonian adds that Jordan "disputed the contention that Mayfield was targeted because of his faith. He pointed out that the event triggering the investigation was a fingerprint found in a bag of detonators in Madrid; only later did the FBI learn that the lawyer was Muslim. … 'Not only did we do nothing wrong here, but everything we did was premised on a fingerprint identification. Our investigation was extremely thorough and extremely professional.' 'But the investigation,' Jordan acknowledged, 'was built on sand, because the investigation was predicated on this fingerprint that the (FBI) lab later determined they were wrong about.'"

CNN Live Today (11/29, Whitfield, 1:39 p.m.) reported, "Remember the 2004 Madrid train bombings? … Perhaps you also remember that an Oregon lawyer was arrested for suspicion of involvement in this train bombing. Now his attorneys…say he has settled a lawsuit with the US government, and now he will get $2 million as a result of his wrongful arrest and the FBI had claimed at the time that his fingerprints were found on a detonator." CNN.com (11/29, Schuster, Frieden) added, "'We lived in 1984,' Mayfield told reporters Wednesday. … 'I, myself, have dark memories of stifling paranoia, of being monitored, followed, watched, tracked,' he said, choking back emotion. 'I've been surveilled, followed, targeted primarily because I've been an outspoken critic of this administration and doing my job to defend others who can't defend themselves, to give them their day in court, and mostly for being a Muslim.'"

Oregonian Says System Remains Too Opaque. Under the headline "Mayfield Settlement Still Leaves A Lot To Be Settled," The Oregonian (11/30, 318K) editorializes, "Any government will always make mistakes, and this outcome shows that the U.S. government can still be held accountable. Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI, insisted Wednesday that aside from the fingerprint misidentification, 'We are very proud of what we did here.' But a cloak of secrecy makes it hard to check government power or defend citizens' rights, to know just how much Mayfield's Muslim identity overwhelmed doubts about the evidence that the Spanish raised very early in the process. It makes it impossible for Mayfield to know, even now, what the FBI learned about him and who else might know it now." The Oregonian adds, "You could sit in the news conference Wednesday and conclude that the system worked. But you'd also conclude that it needs to work better."

Gonzales Defends Warrantless Surveillance Program. KQXT-FM, San Antonio (11/30, Forsyth) reports, "The strongest defense to date of the controversial warrantless surveillance program from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. As the Justice Department's inspector general opens an investigation into the effort, Gonzales told WOAI radio in his hometown of San Antonio that it is an 'effective and important program' and he's confident it will eventually be upheld in the courts. … The entire interview will air Thursday morning at 6:20 and 7:10 on San Antonio's First News." KQXT-FM continues, "Gonzales also pledged to correct any 'shortcomings' in the program that may be identified by the IG's probe. … Gonzales said the program to wiretap conversations between people in the United States and people overseas that the government suspects of being involved in terrorism is 'most definitely' continuing despite a ruling of a federal judge in Detroit that the program is unconstitutional, and loud complaints about it from Democrats in Congress. Justice Department IG Glenn Fine notified Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif) Tuesday that he has opened an investigation into the department's handling of the program, but not into whether the program itself is legal. … 'Even those who have been critical of the President's authority to do this, except for maybe one person in Congress, nobody has suggested that the program stop,' Gonzales said. 'I think people understand that it is an effective program. The Director of the CIA has testified that it has been a very effective program in protecting America. It's for that reason, while questions have been raised about the legal authorities of the President, we do believe that the President has the authority to authorize surveillance of the enemy at time of war, and that authority comes from the authorization by Congress to use military force which came shortly after the September 11th attacks.' … Gonzales, however, rejected demands from Lofgren and other Congressional Democrats, to order Fine to probe not just the implementation of the warrantless surveillance program, but its legality as well. … 'He doesn't have the expertise or authority to do that, quite frankly. It is the job for the lawyers within the Department of Justice to determine if something is legal. We have reviewed this program, and in our judgment it is lawful.'"

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Probe NSA Surveillance Program. The New York Times (11/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "It was one of the more outrageous moments in the story of the Bush administration's illegal domestic wiretapping. Almost a year ago, Congressional Democrats called for a review of the Justice Department's role in the program. But the department investigators assigned to do the job were unable to proceed because the White House, at President Bush's personal direction, refused to give them the necessary security clearance. Now the president, for reasons we can't help thinking might have something to do with this month's elections, has changed his mind. The White House will give Justice Department inspectors the required clearance, and a review will go forward." The Times adds, "That's all to the good, as long as the investigation is not intended to pre-empt any efforts by the new Democratic majority to conduct its own Congressional review of the wiretap program. The Justice Department inquiry will hardly do the full job." The Justice Department inquiry "will do nothing to fix the biggest problem with Mr. Bush's eavesdropping program, which is that -- once again -- he ignored existing law and instead tried to create a system outside the law, resting on his dangerously expansive claims of executive power."

Judge Accepts Plea Agreements In Former Colorado Terrorism Case. The Denver Post (11/30, Finley, 256K) reports US District Judge Lewis Babcock "on Wednesday declared the end of the government's four-year case against a Denver Pakistani-American family once targeted by the FBI as terrorists. Family members whose lives were turned upside down simply wept. 'We've lost everything,' longtime Colorado restaurateur Abdul Qayyum said." Babcock "accepted plea deals with federal prosecutors who dropped and reduced immigration charges they pursued after their terrorism case fizzled against Qayyum, his daughter Saima Saima, wife Chris Warren and nephew Irfan Kamran." The Post notes, "FBI agents targeted this family of naturalized U.S. citizens…based on secret evidence after the 9/11 attacks. U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft trumpeted the case as aggressive action against terrorists. 'When the attorney general of the United States declares your family terrorists,' the result is damage 'far beyond anything this court can do,' defense attorney Ray Moore told Babcock during one of two emotional hearings Wednesday."

El-Masri Tells Senate Aides Of Alleged Torture By CIA. The AP (11/30, Butler) reports, "Khaled el-Masri, who claims the CIA kidnapped and tortured him, recounted his story on Capitol Hill on Wednesday and said he hoped he could help prevent others from suffering a similar fate." The AP continues, "The Kuwaiti-born German citizen said he had brought his story to Washington to encourage greater oversight of CIA activities and force the U.S. government to acknowledge what happened to him. … 'I really want to raise awareness in the Congress so that they can bring some pressure to bear and make changes,' el-Masri said in German after he briefed Senate aides." The AP adds, "A federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., heard arguments Tuesday by el-Masri's lawyers urging the judges to reinstate his lawsuit against a former CIA director, George Tenet, and others. … Discussing the case, el-Masri told reporters, 'What really matters to me is that I would like to know why this was done to me, and I want an explanation and an apology.' … He added, 'I think that we can all benefit from what happens in my case, including others who are still in prison in other parts of the world without the rule of law.'" The AP notes, "El-Masri alleges he was kidnapped while trying to enter Macedonia for a vacation on Dec. 31, 2003. He claims he was flown to a CIA-run prison known as the 'salt pit' in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was beaten and sodomized with an object during five months in captivity. … The CIA has refused to comment on el-Masri's allegations, which have put a spotlight on the intelligence agency's secret program to deliver suspected terrorists for interrogation in foreign countries. The practice has been heavily criticized by human rights groups."

Legal Showdown Over Padilla Complicated By Security Issues. In an online exclusive in Newsweek (11/30), Michael Isikoff and Mark Hosenball write, "A looming court fight over claims that one-time enemy combatant Jose Padilla was 'tortured' by the U.S. military is threatening to create new difficulties for one of the Bush administration's most high-profile terrorism cases." Isikoff and Hosenball continue, "In a motion last week, the Justice Department asked a federal judge to block any public testimony about the circumstances of Padilla's interrogations during the more than three years he was detained and interrogated in a military brig in South Carolina. For most of that time, Padilla, a 35-year-old Brooklyn-born U.S. citizen who was raised in Chicago, was held incommunicado, unable to meet with his lawyer or any other visitors. … Even permitting Padilla's lawyers to raise the issue of his alleged mistreatment, prosecutors argued, may 'inflame the jury' and invite 'jury nullification'—the term used to describe what happens when rebellious jurors declare a defendant not guilty, no matter what the evidence, because they are so offended by the government's conduct. (The prosecutors also say there is 'not a shred of record evidence' to back up Padilla's claims that he was tortured and asserted that the 'conditions of his confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security.') … But defense lawyers are convinced that given the seriousness and the specificity of Padilla's claims of mistreatment—many of which involve the use of aggressive interrogation techniques virtually identical to those the Pentagon has confirmed using at Guantánamo—the judge in his case, Marcia Cooke, may have little choice but to order a pretrial hearing on his allegations." Isikoff and Hosenball add, "Padilla's lawyers say they will soon file "additional material" to back up their torture claims. And if Cook grants them a hearing, it could open the door for the first time to questioning in a U.S. courtroom about controversial interrogation methods that were used against one of the most sensitive detainees in U.S. government custody. Padilla's fate is all the more important because his incarceration by the U.S. military was directly ordered from the White House by President Bush. … The matter could prove even more awkward because, according to a source close to Padilla's defense team—who asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters—any hearing could end up requiring the Pentagon to turn over highly classified video and audiotapes allegedly made of Padilla's interrogation sessions at the U.S. military brig in Charleston, S.C. The content of the tapes has been the subject of recent discussion among lawyers in the case, the source said."

Judge Rules Parts Of Terror Listing Order Unconstitutional. The Washington Times (11/30, Seper) reports, "President Bush lacks the constitutional authority to designate groups and persons as terrorists under a post-September 11 executive order, according to a federal judge in Los Angeles." The Times continues, "U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a challenge brought by the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Constitutional Rights on behalf of the Humanitarian Law Project, said a Sept. 24, 2001, executive order naming 27 groups and persons as 'specially designated global terrorists' (SDGTs) allowed no way for those designated to challenge the ruling." The Times adds, "In a 45-page ruling, Judge Collins said the executive order 'contains no definable criteria' to constrain the president's use of it, and, as a result, 'is unconstitutionally vague on its face.' She said the order is subject only to Mr. Bush's 'unfettered discretion.' … The judge also said the order 'contains no definable criteria for designating individuals and groups as SDGTs,' and improperly gives the secretary of the Treasury the power to impose penalties for 'mere association' with the groups." The Times notes, "The ruling, made public on Tuesday, came in a lawsuit in which the Humanitarian Law Project, through the Center for Constitutional Rights, sought to support the nonviolent work of two groups designated as terrorist: The Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey, and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka. … The Justice Department said the agency thought Judge Collins had erred in her decision."

State Department Says Al Qaeda Operating With "Great Comfort" In Somalia. The AP (11/30, Gedda) reports, "Al-Qaida militants are operating with 'great comfort in Somalia, providing training and assistance to a radical military element loyal to the Islamic group that controls most of southern Somalia, a senior State Department official said Wednesday." Jendayi Frazer, who heads the department's Africa bureau, "said a priority US goal is the capture of three militants wanted for the bombings of US Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 and a hotel in Kenya in 2002. The three are from Sudan, Kenya and the Camoros Islands, located off Africa's east coast. 'We're continuing to work with all sides in Somalia to try get those terrorists turned over and to prevent Somalia from becoming a safe haven,' Frazer told a small group of reporters."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Despite "Solemn Pledge," Democrats Reject "Key" Tenet Of 9/11 Commission Report. Under the headline "Democrats Reject Key 9/11 Panel Suggestion," the Washington Post (11/30, A7, Weisman, 690K) reports, "It was a solemn pledge, repeated by Democratic leaders and candidates over and over: If elected to the majority in Congress, Democrats would implement all of the recommendations of the bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." But "with control of Congress now secured, Democratic leaders have decided for now against implementing the one measure that would affect them most directly: a wholesale reorganization of Congress to improve oversight and funding of the nation's intelligence agencies. Instead, Democratic leaders may create a panel to look at the issue and produce recommendations, according to congressional aides and lawmakers." The Post adds, "Because plans for implementing the commission's recommendations are still fluid, Democratic officials would not speak for the record. But aides on the House and Senate appropriations, armed services and intelligence committees confirmed this week that a reorganization of Congress would not be part of the package of homeland-security changes up for passage in the 'first 100 hours' of the Democratic Congress." Democrats, adds the Post, "are balking, just as Republicans did before them. The decision will almost certainly anger commission members, as well as families of victims of the Sept. 11 attacks."

New Law Expands US Powers To Prosecute Animal Rights Extremists. United Press International (11/30, Waterman) reports, "A new law that comes into force this week gives federal authorities expanded powers to prosecute animal rights militants -- as the State Department is warning that their activities eclipse terrorism as a day-to-day security problem for U.S. companies in Western Europe." UPI continues, "Bush signed S 3880, the Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act, without fanfare at the White House Monday morning, before flying to the Baltic for a NATO summit. … The bill is designed to make it easier for the FBI and Justice Department to wire-tap and prosecute animal rights extremists who mount campaigns of low-level criminal harassment against animal researchers both in the commercial and educational sectors." UPI adds, "Animal rights campaigners and their supporters say it will chill legal protest, and accuse lawmakers of ramming the bill through during the waning days of the lame-duck congress. But supporters retort that there were hearings in both the House and Senate last year and that the ACLU dropped objections to the new law after amendments it backed were incorporated by the bill's authors."

FEMA Ordered To Restore Housing Aid For Evacuees. The Washington Post (11/30, A1, Hsu, 690K) reports on its front page, "The Bush administration unconstitutionally denied aid to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast residents displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita and must resume payments immediately, a federal judge ordered yesterday. US District Judge Richard J. Leon said the Federal Emergency Management Agency created a 'Kafkaesque' process that began cutting off rental aid in February to victims of the 2005 storms, did not provide clear reasons for the denials, and hindered applicants' due-process rights to fix errors or appeal government mistakes." The Post adds that the judge's "decision again casts a spotlight on the fate of the poorest members of the diaspora created by the 2005 disasters in New Orleans and along the Louisiana and Mississippi coasts."

Reporting on its front page, USA Today (11/30, 1A, Hall, 2.27M) also notes the judge's assessment of FEMA's policies as "Kafkaesque," adding that he said their "letters to evacuees explaining the process were vague and the application process confusing. He ordered FEMA to resume payments until it either allows evacuees to appeal or better explains its actions. … FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker defended the agency. By law, he said, the emergency housing assistance program is designed as a short-term solution to shelter evacuees. Those who apply and qualify can receive additional longer-term assistance through a separate program, he said."

The New York Times (11/30, Dewan, 1.16M) reports Walker said the agency "had not decided whether to seek a stay of the decision." In a statement following the decision, Walker wrote that the agency had "established a team dedicated to handling appeals on an expedited basis and initiated calls to applicants in an effort to help them understand what documentation was needed to process their case.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/30, Gauette, Simmons, 850K) reports, "FEMA's critics in Congress used the opportunity presented by the ruling to call for changes. 'While this is a victory for the thousands who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina, it is also a reminder that the system is still in desperate need of reform,' said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, which oversees FEMA. 'It is unacceptable to force overburdened victims to navigate through bureaucratic red tape to find out whether they will ever have a place to go home to.'"

The AP (11/29, Apuzzo) reported that Wednesday's decision was "the second court victory for Katrina victims this week. A federal judge in Louisiana said Monday that many homeowners might be entitled to more insurance money for flood damage."

WAR NEWS:

Memo Cited As Reason For Maliki's "Abrupt" Cancellation Of Initial Bush Meeting. USA Today (11/30, 2A, Jackson, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki began high-stakes talks early today, in the wake of last-minute scheduling changes and a parliamentary walkout in Baghdad." The two leaders "had breakfast a day after the abrupt cancellation of a scheduled opening meeting that was also to have included Jordan's King Abdullah II, the host of this summit." The AP (11/30, Raum) reports that after meeting with Maliki this morning, Bush said that "he and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki agreed in high-stakes talks that Iraq should not be partitioned into separate, semiautonomous zones. 'The prime minister made clear that splitting his country into parts, as some have suggested, is not what the Iraqi people want, and that any partition of Iraq would only lead to an increase in sectarian violence,' Bush said after nearly two and a half hours of talks aimed at stabilizing Iraq. 'I agree.'" Maliki "left the door open for countries like Iran and Syria to play a part in Iraq's struggle for peace. 'We are ready to cooperate with everybody who believes that the need to cooperate with the national unity government, especially our neighbors,' al-Maliki said."

The Financial Times (11/30, Devi, Dinmore, Khalaf) notes "Maliki left a political storm behind him at home. Shia lawmakers and cabinet ministers led by Mr al-Sadr suspended their participation in government institutions in protest at the summit. The boycott by the five Sadrist ministers and 30 lawmakers may not cause lasting damage but it piles the pressure on Mr Maliki." The Washington Post (11/30, A19, Raghavan, 690K) also remarks on Sadr's "swift maneuver," which "cast a shadow over the diplomacy in Amman and issued a reminder of his growing influence in Iraq."

But the cancelled Wednesday meeting dominated today's headlines and TV coverage. The AP (11/30, Raum) calls yesterday's cancellation "a stunning turn of events" that took place "after disclosure of US doubts about the Iraqi leader's capabilities and a political boycott in Baghdad protesting his attendance." The "abrupt cancellation" was "an almost unheard-of development in the high-level diplomatic circles of a US president, a king and a prime minister."

Maliki's move led to a series of apparently contradictory Administration explanations -- and denials that the leaked memo had played a part in Maliki's decision. McClatchy (11/30, Allam, Douglas) reports "Administration officials were at a loss to offer a single version of why the Maliki-Bush dinner was canceled. One senior administration official insisted that the dinner had never been planned, but a schedule given to reporters traveling with the president on Tuesday listed a 7:45 p.m. meeting among Bush, Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II, followed by an 8:35 p.m. dinner." Spokesmen for King Abdullah "said that the schedule had been changed to give the king more time to meet with Bush on Jordanian issues. They said that Abdullah had met with Maliki earlier in the day." Overall, the incident produced another day of markedly negative press coverage of Bush's trip. The New York Times (11/30, A1, Stolberg, Wong, 1.16M) reports "the careful orchestration leading up to the Bush-Maliki summit meeting -- including a news conference in Estonia on Tuesday where Mr. Bush promised to press the Iraqi prime minister on his strategy for stability -- was upended when The New York Times published the classified assessment of Mr. Maliki in Wednesday's issue."

The Los Angeles Times (11/30, Wallsten, Moore, 850K) says "White House officials spent the day on the defensive -- insisting they had faith in Maliki despite the harsh content of the leaked memo, and struggling to explain why a meeting that had been on the president's calendar for days was suddenly scrubbed." The Times adds, "Senior Bush aides offered at least four explanations for the cancellation -- finally dispatching a more junior official to tell reporters late Wednesday that Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II had decided mutually that a three-way conversation was not necessary." The Washington Times (11/30, Dinan, 88K), under the headline "Iraq Cancels Meeting After 'Ignorant' Memo," notes the memo "says the Iraqi leader is either 'ignorant,' devious or incapable of governing right now."

ABC World News (11/29, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) said "the White House is trying to downplay the significance of this. But it's a huge embarrassment." The White House "insisted this was not a snub. This is how White House counselor Dan Bartlett explained it. 'There was going to be a trilateral meeting and then the dinner with the King. Now, since they already had a bilateral themselves, the King of Jordan and the Prime Minister, everybody felt, well, there's no reason for them to do a trilateral meeting beforehand, because matters had been discussed.' We spoke, tonight, with the US Ambassador to Iraq. Whose idea was that to first cancel it?" The White House also "denied that Malaki's sudden decision had anything to do with a leaked memo that appeared in this morning's 'New York Times,' calling into doubt Malaki's ability and will to stop sectarian violence." Despite the White House's assertion, ABC World News (11/29, story 2, 2:30, McCarthy, 8.78M) later mused that "Maliki perhaps pulled out of tonight's meeting, angered at the memo, or keen to show his political base he's not an American puppet."

The CBS Evening News (11/29, lead story, 2:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) also noted "the White House insists this has nothing to do" with the memo, NBC Nightly News (11/29, lead story, 4:10, Williams, 9.87M) said "Maliki's "decision…looked a lot like an angry reaction to the emergence today of a White House memo critical of his leadership." NBC interviewed Zalmay Khalilzad, US Ambassador to Iraq. Asked whether he expects "people to believe that this was not a snub of the President," Khalilzad said, "Oh, absolutely it was not a snub of the President." On the subject of the leak, "the White House maintained it didn't know where the memo came from. But the timing is striking because it comes at a time when the White House is eager to put the pressure very publicly on the Iraqi leader." The CBS Evening News (11/29, story 4, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) also interviewed Khalilzad. Asked about Maliki, he said, "He has my confidence. I believe that he wants Iraq to succeed and he's a Prime Minister. Iraq's failure will be his failure. His success will be Iraq's success."

NBC Nightly News (11/29, story 2, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) also reported that "to Iraqis like Maliki, pride is very potent in life and how might that play in here?" NBC (Engel) added, "It is one of the characteristics that has probably been most understood in the last four years of this war in Iraq: Iraqi pride. It is misunderstood by American diplomats and soldiers, so to invite Prime Minister Maliki for this summit and then to have this very insulting memo put out talking about spying on him, questioning his intentions, it is not the kind of thing that will win trust, particularly anywhere in Iraq or almost anywhere else in the Middle East."

The Washington Post (11/30, A1, Abramowitz, Tyson, 690K) quotes Bartlett saying, "No one should read too much into this," and White House press secretary Tony Snow assuring reporters that "there's no snub" by Maliki. The Post adds, "Two senior administration officials" held "a contentious background briefing with White House reporters who repeatedly challenged their explanation."

On MSNBC's Hardball (11/29, Shuster), State Department senior adviser David Satterfield was asked if it "was a snub" when Iraqi officials would not meet with President Bush. Satterfield said, "Well, the trilateral meeting that was planned for this evening was a social call between the King, the President and the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had had a very good session with King Abdullah earlier in the day. The decision was made that there was no need for this essentially courtesy meeting. The real meeting will be tomorrow morning with the President." Shuster: "But courtesy meeting or not, it can still be a snub, even if it's just drinks and dinner." Satterfield: "We don't see it that way, and that's certainly not the way the President views it."

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/29, Blitzer), Satterfield said, "He's not boycotting the meeting. It was agreed that the meeting would not take place, the meeting wasn't necessary. And with respect to Muqtada al-Sadr, its threats or the action taken by his parliamentarians, they haven't had any impact on the Prime Minister's willingness to come to Jordan in the first instance, or to meet with the President in the second. It's going ahead regardless."

The content of the leaked memo is also coming under criticism. McClatchy (11/30, Landay, Youssef) reports, "It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to implement most of the key ideas for quelling the Iraqi civil war that are outlined in a classified Nov. 8 memo to President Bush from National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, experts said Wednesday. Trying to push anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr out of the ruling coalition led by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, as the memo suggests, would be throwing gasoline on a fire, they said." Sadr's party "is the largest in parliament, with 32 seats, and Maliki became prime minister only with his support." The Christian Science Monitor (11/30, Murphy, 59K) quotes Chris Toensing, executive director of the Middle East Research and Information Project in Washington, saying Malaki "is not likely to abandon his Shiite political powerbase, including Sadr. … 'It's a calculus about his own protection, and for a future when the US eventually leaves,' he says."

Extreme pessimism about the future of the US mission in Iraq once again pervaded the network TV coverage. On NBC Nightly News (11/29, story 4, 1:50, 9.87M), Tim Russert said, "You talk to Republicans and Democrats and you hear the same thing, almost a complete sense of resignation, that there is no good probable outcome for Iraq." ABC World News (11/29, story 4, 6:00, Gibson, 8.78M) interviewed Ret. Gen. Jack Keane, former Army Vice Chief of Staff, US Army, who said, "The strategy we have, which, was in its essence, a defensive military strategy. It was never designed to defeat the insurgency. It was simply designed to transition to the Iraqi security forces, as its core principal." Fareed Zakaria, editor 'Newsweek International: "More forces would have worked if the only problem you were dealing was insurgency. What you are dealing with now is a civil war." Richard Haass, Pres. Council on Foreign Relations: "We've already sent more troops. We're up to about 150,000 American soldiers. We could send a few more. It won't do a lot militarily. But what it may do is help the Administration politically. We're probably reaching a point where the President's trip and more broadly US policy, now, is probably the last hurrah. I do not believe the challenges we face are the sort of challenges that can be successfully met with more firepower." Haass also said, "The word 'success' the word 'victory' should be expunged from our vocabulary now. We should be cutting cost options. That's all that's left for the United States in Iraq." Haass said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/29, Shuster) that Maliki is "under tremendous pressure at home for being too close to the Americans. At the same time, he's obviously reading in the New York Times and elsewhere the fact that the United States is extraordinarily unhappy with him. So he's in an extraordinarily difficult position."

ISG Will Recommend Withdrawal Of US Combat Troops From Iraq. The New York Times (11/30, A1, Sanger, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "The bipartisan Iraq Study Group reached a consensus on Wednesday on a final report that will call for a gradual pullback of the 15 American combat brigades now in Iraq but stop short of setting a firm timetable for their withdrawal, according to people familiar with the panel's deliberations." The report, "unanimously approved by the 10-member panel, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, is to be delivered to President Bush next week. It is a compromise between distinct paths that the group has debated since March, avoiding a specific timetable, which has been opposed by Mr. Bush, but making it clear that the American troop commitment should not be open-ended. The recommendations of the group, formed at the request of members of Congress, are nonbinding." The Times adds, "A person who participated in the commission's debate said that unless the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki believed that Mr. Bush was under pressure to pull back troops in the near future, 'there will be zero sense of urgency to reach the political settlement that needs to be reached.'" The report "recommends that Mr. Bush make it clear that he intends to start the withdrawal relatively soon, and people familiar with the debate over the final language said the implicit message was that the process should begin sometime next year. The report leaves unstated whether the 15 combat brigades that are the bulk of American fighting forces in Iraq would be brought home, or simply pulled back to bases in Iraq or in neighboring countries." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (11/30, Scarborough, 88K) says "all six members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, amid an ongoing Pentagon review of strategy for Iraq, oppose pulling out US troops now, and are also against a specific withdrawal timetable, a defense source said yesterday. 'The chiefs are solid. They want victory,' the source said. 'There is no dissent.'"

The CBS Evening News (11/29, story 2, 2:20, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Members of the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State Baker have reached agreement on their recommendations for a new war strategy, which will be delivered to the President and released publicly a week from today. Sources close to the group expected to recommend a restructuring of US military forces, putting in more trainers and fewer combat troops, setting a timetable for the Iraqi government to take responsibility for its own security, and holding talks with Iran and Syria." The White House "says the group's report will be a factor but not a blueprint for the President in deciding on changes in his war strategy."

ABC World News (11/29, story 3, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said "the Iraq Study Group is expected to call for direct talks with Iran and Syria to end the violence. Both countries had messages for America today. Neither one sounded at all cooperative. Syria's President, Assad, said his country will continue to challenge US efforts to exert control over the Middle East. 'As colonialism continues,' he said, 'revolution and resistance continue.' And Iran's President, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, called the US involvement in Iraq, a military misadventure. He said Americans should demand the withdrawal of US troops."

USA Today (11/30, 1A, Page, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "The war has become a Rubik's Cube: Move to fix one side of the puzzle and another side is upended. … The Baker commission could provide bipartisan cover to take difficult steps, says Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. 'I think the president will have to listen,' he says."

Reacting to the news about the ISG on CNN's The Situation Room (11/29, Blitzer), Rep. Charles Rangel said, "Democrats may be in the majority in the Congress but we are not a part of the executive branch. The President has heard the American people loud and clear. They're against the war. I hope this Iraqi Study Group reflects that type of feeling. I'm certain it will." And Rep.-elect Chris Carney said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/29, Shuster), "I have not called for a timetable myself. I did hear Gen. Casey a couple of weeks ago, when he was talking about the insurgency, saying that it would take 12-24 months to train up the Iraqis to take care of the situation themselves. That's what I advocate, is that the Iraqis start to take control of their own destiny here."

In his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (11/30, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank writes, "Does anybody have a good plan for Iraq? Not President Bush. … Neither does the Pentagon appear to have a solution. Gen. Pete Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, called a news conference yesterday to advise the American public not to expect big conclusions from a major Iraq study he ordered. 'There's not an end product,' he announced. Nor, apparently, do the Democrats have the answer." Milbank adds, "Political Washington is in a state of suspended animation these days: waiting for Bob Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, waiting for the Baker-Hamilton commission, waiting to see whether Bush will raise or lower troop levels."

Bush Said To Back Talks With Syria And Iran "In Principle." The Wall Street Journal (11/30, A1, Dreazen, Simpson, Fam, 2.04M) reports that as President Bush "arrived in Jordan last night, the White House has made clear that it is open -- at least in principle -- to considering talks with longstanding rivals Syria and Iran, though it wants them to first change their behavior." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "announced yesterday that she is meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert today amid efforts to revive the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace process that allies say the Bush administration has never really embraced. And the administration has toned down its pressure on allied authoritarian countries such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, which it previously suggested should embrace democratic measures. Taken together, the administration's diplomatic initiatives represent an effort to cobble together as much of the decades-old Middle East power structure as possible as a way of restoring stability to Iraq and deterring Iran."

Gates Signals Support For Talks With Syria, Iran. CNN's The Situation Room (11/29, Koppel) reported, "Even as…Bush's plane was touching down in Amman, Jordan, today for his summit with Iraq's prime minister, back here in Washington, Robert Gates, the former head of the CIA, was signaling that he and Mr. Bush do not necessarily see eye-to-eye on Iraq." Gates says he "believes the U.S. needs to talk to Iraq's other neighbors, like Iran and Syria. That would be at odds with current U.S. policy. Gates laid out his position in written testimony obtained by CNN to the Senate Armed Services Committee, which begins his confirmation hearing next week. On Iran, Gates likens the situation to the cold war era, when even during the worst days, he said, the U.S. maintained a dialogue with the Soviet Union and China. In the case of Iran, Gates says: 'I believe no option that could potentially benefit U.S. policy should be off the table.' He goes on to suggest that 'dialogue could be as part of an international conference,' an approach Gates believes should also be considered with Syria."

Democrats Want "Special Envoy." The New York Times (11/30, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Leading Senate Democrats called Wednesday for…Bush to appoint a special envoy to work with Iraqi leaders to bring increasing violence in Iraq under control. 'Violence in Iraq has reached critical levels, and the violence is not predominantly instigated by insurgents, but is taking place between Sunnis and Shia,' said Senator Harry Reid, who will become the majority leader, and four other top Senate Democrats in a letter sent to Mr. Bush. 'It is our belief that coalition military action alone cannot end this violence.'" The lawmakers "said in the letter that the special American envoy could follow up on issues raised between Mr. Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq during their planned meeting on Thursday in Jordan."

In a "Web Exclusive," Michael Hirsh writes in Newsweek (11/30, 3.12M), "The forthcoming report by James Baker's Iraq Study Group has enjoyed the biggest public buildup since the Segway. And it is likely to be just as big of a bust. Here's why the Baker-Hamilton report is destined to land with a thud, after weeks of messianic hype. … This major shift is going to occur no matter what Baker-Hamilton says. The future course of U.S. involvement is set for a long time to come: as the Iraqi Army matures beyond the five or so divisions that are now functioning, very brave American officers will join them, guiding their movements with the latest technology that effectively will give them a proxy air force. This will be a slow, painstaking process, neither cut and run nor stay the course. Just find a medium-term way to extricate yourself with your scalp intact." Iraq "is not winnable or losable. All it is, in the best case, is manageable. What's needed instead of careful consensus building in Washington is a Richard Holbrooke or a Henry Kissinger out in the field, a tough, no-nonsense negotiator who can grapple with the reality of the American failure in the region and simply seek the most honorable way out."

More Commentary. Author Scott Turow writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/30, 2.04M), "Our government must urge Iraqi leaders to hold an immediate plebiscite on a single question: Should American forces remain in Iraq until a stable democratic order emerges, however long that takes, or should we instead withdraw in stages over a fixed period, say, the next 12 months? I have a guess about which way the vote will go. Since opinion-sampling began a year after the invasion, one poll after another has found that an increasing majority of Iraqis would like us to pack our gear and leave." But "who knows how accurate polling is in a society like Iraq, where so many citizens have reasons to be guarded about their views? And even if the results reflected opinions at the time, it's possible that an informed national discussion might change minds."

In a New York Times op-ed column (11/30), author Thomas Powers says, "The chaotic war in Iraq is the great piece of unfinished business that will soon face Robert M. Gates, President Bush's choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense." Defeating the "insurgents is only half of the challenge; harder will be finding some way to restrain or disband the Shiite militias without bringing them into the war against us. Down that road would lie a spiraling conflict as protracted and unwinnable as the war in Vietnam. The Republicans may have lost the midterm elections, but to my ear, on the subject of Iraq, the president has never sounded ready to accept anything that might be called defeat. Iraq is not Vietnam, but we are the same. We find ourselves, at a parallel moment, militarily committed to a policy on the verge of conspicuous failure. The American people, now as then, are unsettled by the phrase 'cut and run' and reluctant to put their judgment ahead of the president's."

US Commanders Order Reinforcements Into Baghdad. The AP (11/30, Jelinek) reports, "The Pentagon is developing plans to send four more battalions to Iraq early next year, partly to boost security in Baghdad, defense officials said Wednesday. … The extra combat engineer battalions of reserves, likely to be sent to Baghdad, would total about 3,500 troops, officials said. They said the units, coming from around the United States, have already done tours in Iraq but there has been no final decision on which will go." The moves "come as violence continues to rise in Baghdad, and President Bush is under growing pressure to craft an exit strategy that would withdraw a substantial number of US troops from Iraq while shifting more responsibility to the Iraqi government."

The CBS Evening News (11/29, story 2, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported "the Pentagon is getting ready to send more troops in." CBS (Martin) added, "With conditions in Baghdad too dire to wait for the outcome of either the summit or the Administration's strategy review, commanders in Iraq have ordered reinforcements into the capital. About 3,500 US combat troops are being moved from over parts of the country into the city where a combined force of 40,000 Americans and Iraqis have so far been unable to stop the spiral of violence. The American reinforcements will take the place of Iraqi troops, which the government had promised but never delivered. But as Democratic Senator Jack Reed said, numbers alone are not likely to determine the outcome."

NBC Nightly News (11/29, story 3, 2:25, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "NBC News has learned the US military is looking at a temporary increase of up to 20,000 troops. That could be done by extending the tours of three brigades of soldiers who have already spent a year in Iraq and by accelerating deployment for two other brigades, sending them into Iraq earlier than scheduled. The Army will also activate four battalions of reserve combat engineers, some 2,800 troops. Their mission -- help build security barriers in Baghdad around heavily congested areas, like open air markets, prime targets for suicide car bombers. The US military is also pushing Iraqi officials to send more Iraqi security forces into Baghdad, but sectarian differences within the Iraqi military itself could lead to more violence if Shi'ia soldiers moved into a Sunni neighborhood or vice versa."

The CBS Evening News (11/29, story 3, 1:00, Palmer, 7.66M) reported from Baghdad, "I have to say it's going to be skepticism on the part of most Iraqis because they've been promised two big troop initiatives, US troop initiatives in the past six months that were designed to quell the violence here, neither has worked out that way. Although they recognize they need help with security, they're not at all convinced that more US soldiers is the answer. Now, as for Moqtada al-Sadr's followers, they're going to regard this as a deliberate provocation. They have said from the beginning they want US troops out and quickly. So the idea that the troop strength is going to be beefed up has made them very angry. In fact, when we talked to them a couple of hours ago, they said this might not only make them boycott the government indefinitely, but they May even decide to quit all together."

Powell Says Iraq Conflict A "Civil War." ABC World News (11/29, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The former Secretary of State, Colin Powell, said today that the situation there could be considered a civil war. That's in sharp contrast to President Bush, who has rejected any such characterization. Powell made the comment at a business conference in Dubai." The AP (11/30, Krane) notes "no cameras were allowed in to record" Powell's talk.' During his speech, reportedly, "Powell said the Iraq war had three phases. The first, the invasion phase, went as planned. But the second phase, the military occupation, was 'badly handled,' Powell said, according to the conference organizer. Mistakes during the second phase led to the third, 'which could be considered a civil war,' Powell told the conference."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/30, Feldmann, 59K) reports, "Bit by bit, the mainstream media are referring to the war in Iraq as a 'civil war' in news coverage. … Most scholars who study war view the Iraq situation as a civil war; the only debate is when it became one -- in 2004 when the US transferred sovereignty to Iraqis, or early this year when the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra sparked a wave of sectarian violence that continues? Academics cite the standard definition of civil war: groups from the same country fighting for political control, and a death toll of at least 1,000. A majority of Americans view the conflict as a civil war, polls show." The debate over terminology "seems to have sprung from the latest surge in sectarian violence, and perhaps from a greater sense of freedom among US media, after the November elections, to call the situation as they see it without being accused of political bias, analysts say."

68% Of US Adults See "Civil War" In Iraq. On its website, the Wall Street Journal (11/30, 2.04M) reports "a majority of Americans think Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, a new Harris Interactive poll finds, and few are confident that Robert Gates's nomination as Secretary of Defense will improve the situation there. Sixty-eight percent of US adults said they believe there is a civil war in Iraq, the online poll from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20 found, compared with 14% who disagree and 18% who aren't sure."

Iraq Police Academy In Jordan Beset By Sectarian Divisions. The CBS Evening News (11/29, story 5, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "On the eve of the summit here in Amman, there is no greater priority for President Bush and Prime Minister Maliki than training Iraqi security forces so they can take the place of US troops. Surprisingly, the effort to rebuild Iraq's police force started right here in Jordan. But…it's been a very bumpy ride." CBS (Phillips) added, "Once it was hoped the march to the new Iraq would begin here on a parade ground just outside of Amman, Jordan. Now the future of this police academy and of its graduates is as uncertain as that of the country itself. The academy, set up here shortly after the fall of Saddam, has brought Iraqi recruits in to be trained by international instructors in the hope that they'd be the seed crop of a new Iraqi police culture, one that would protect citizens, not prop up a repressive regime. More than 40,000 have been trained here, a third of Iraq's total force. … That's the good news. The bad is that the same divisions that are tearing Iraq apart at home are at work here. The cadets are Iraqi Shias and Sunnis and Kurds, communities that are virtually at war. Here's a little fact that illustrates the problem. When the firing range was designed, the instructors were worried about giving weapons with live ammunition to Iraqis from the various warring communities, so they built these sandbag defenses to hide behind just in case. Not only that, but all the instructors are armed. While fighting never broke out here, loyalties to the warring militias are a problem, which is why the Iraqi instructors fear their identities becoming known."

WSJournal Highlights Findings Of Australia's Oil-For-Food Probe. The Wall Street Journal (11/30, 2.04M) reports, "Australia's involvement in Saddam Hussein's Oil for Food scam has been known for years. But the bright light shone this week by the Cole Commission report is nonetheless illuminating -- and a lesson for other countries. In 2,065 pages, Sir Terence Cole and his team unmask the vast corruption in AWB Ltd., Australia's former wheat board and supplier for a time of 16% of the world's wheat. That alone is a huge public service. AWB was the single largest payer of kickbacks to Saddam." Regarding the UN, Cole "notes that 'the United Nations knew that Iraq was breaching sanctions by requiring payment of inland transport fees and surcharges or after-sales-service fees. It knew this between 1999 and 2003. … It took no steps to publicize or warn member states of the Iraqi practices, and it took no steps to stop the practices.'"

NATO To Add Troops In Afghanistan, Will Remove Some Combat Restrictions. The Washington Post (11/30, A14, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "European NATO countries pledged Wednesday to remove some of the restrictions on combat by their troops in Afghanistan, officials here said, as the alliance sought to close ranks and bring new force to bear against a resurgent Taliban militia." The NATO governments "declared that attaining peace and security in Afghanistan is now the 'key priority' for a grouping originally formed to confront Soviet military power in the Cold War." The Washington Times (11/30, Dinan, 88K) notes the NATO leaders also "agreed…to add troops to the 32,000 already in Afghanistan, but European countries such as France and Spain retained some of the restrictions that prevent their troops from taking a more active role in the fighting."

The Financial Times (11/30, Dombey, Fidler, Bokhari) reports that at the close of a two-day summit in Riga, "Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato's secretary-general, said the alliance had met 90 per cent of the requirements for its mission in Afghanistan – chiefly by reducing or eliminating national 'caveats' or restrictions on the use of troops. Previously Nato had said it had fulfilled 85 per cent of the requirements. 'We still have to work on the other 10 per cent,' Mr de Hoop Scheffer said."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/30, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "The question looming over NATO's summit in this Baltic country this week was essentially this: What are friends for? With the focus on the NATO-commanded counterinsurgency operation in Afghanistan, leaders from President George Bush to Canada's Prime Minister Stephen Harper wanted to know if just a few NATO countries would continue to carry the weight and face the worst of the danger. Or, would more of NATO's 26 members help out their partners with more troops - and fewer restrictions on how their troops can be used?" The answer "was only partially positive. At the close of the summit Wednesday, a few countries had pledged more forces for the 33,000-troop operation, while others -- in particular Germany, France, Spain, and Italy -- loosened restrictions on 'emergency' engagement of their forces, so that they now can be used for the evacuation of injured NATO soldiers."

White House Planning For NATO Summit Detailed. The New York Times (11/30, A16, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports in a "Reporter's Notebook" feature about the behind-the scenes events during President Bush's visit this to the NATO summit. The Times notes that presidential trips "require the right lighting, the right mix of people, the right backdrops," therefore the White House "began sending out advance teams as early as August to create the perfect imagery for the president's NATO summit swing through Estonia and Latvia." In Riga, for example, the conference was held at the city's "most ornate" building, the Black Heads House. However, "its name and scantily clad black figurines proved too much for a White House intent on repairing strained relations with African-Americans," the Times notes.

Putin Presence At NATO Summit Said To Be "A Little Creepy." Columnist Jackson Diehl from the Washington Post (11/30, A23, Diehl, 690K) writes that at the NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, the "Chirac-Putin stink bomb produced a wave of revulsion, confusion and, eventually, tactical maneuvering among the allied delegations," but there was a "lingering lesson." The Western allies have no idea what to do about Putin." Putin is now "generally understood to be an autocratic imperialist whose political enemies suffer from a high rate of sinister poisonings," and "Bush and other NATO leaders aren't ready to act on that understanding, or even to state it out loud." However, "the idea of having the man to their summit meeting has become a little creepy -- something only a bitter French lame duck would do."

DOJ:

Bush Taps Buchanan To Head DOJ's Office On Violence Against Women. The AP (11/30) reports, "U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan was appointed acting director of the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women." The AP continues, "Buchanan will remain the lead prosecutor in the 25-county Western District of Pennsylvania, while also heading the Washington, D.C.-based office. President Bush announced the appointment Wednesday. … The office administers financial and technical assistance to communities around the country that are creating programs and policies aimed at ending domestic violence." The AP adds, "Buchanan became an assistant prosecutor in 1988 and specialized in white collar and child exploitation crimes before being sworn in as U.S. attorney in September 2001. She also served as the director of the Executive Office of United States Attorneys from June 2004 to June 2005."'

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/30, Ward) reports, "The Washington, D.C., office administers assistance -- both financial and technical -- to communities around the country that are creating programs and policies aimed at ending all forms of domestic violence. Its main mission is to encourage the use of the Violence Against Women Act, which went into effect in 1995. .. .Next year, Ms. Buchanan will oversee the spending of some $400 million in various program areas in the office." The Post-Gazette adds, "Some of that will be used to provide legal assistance to victims, to pay for supervised visitation and safe exchanges for children involved in custody disputes, and to provide support for elderly victims, Ms. Buchanan said. … 'Issues involving violence against women and families have been one of my most significant interests,' she said. 'I welcome the opportunity to be effective on a national level in addressing this problem.' … She plans to focus on increasing outreach to Native American tribes and on college campuses. In addition, she hopes to target young people to educate them about the damage caused by domestic violence."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Rethinking Policy On Corporate Prosecutions. The AP (11/30, Jordan) reports, "The Justice Department is considering scaling back tough policies used to prosecute scandal-plagued corporations, legal tools criticized as unfairly pressuring companies and employees to cooperate in investigations." The AP continues, "The policies, used in criminal investigations of accounting firms Arthur Anderson and KPMG, could be changed as early as next week, according to people familiar with discussions among Bush administration officials and congressional leaders." The AP adds, "No final decisions have been made, department officials said. But the review comes as outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., threatens to ease parts of the 2003 crackdown on white collar crimes in legislation he plans to file next week. … Additionally, an odd coalition of critics — from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the American Bar Association to former Attorney General Ed Meese and the American Civil Liberties Union — are calling for greater protections for those targeted in cases." The AP notes, "At issue is what has become known as the Thompson Memo, written by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. In the wake of scandals involving Enron Corp. and WorldCom Corp., it sought to coordinate prosecution tactics among the country's 94 U.S. attorneys. … The policy allows prosecutors to show leniency to companies that cooperate with investigators by refusing to pay employees legal fees and disclosing confidential discussions between company lawyers and executives targeted by the government. The memo suggests that companies not cooperating could be indicted."

The Washington Post (11/30, D1, Johnson) reports, "The changes, which could require local U.S. attorneys to obtain input from high-level Justice Department officials before seeking corporate indictments, could be unveiled by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty next month, according to sources briefed on the issue who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deliberations are not yet complete. The administrative revisions also may forbid government lawyers from forcing companies to stop paying attorney fees to employees ensnared in investigations, a move that was declared unconstitutional in June by a federal judge in New York." The Post adds, "Separately, Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is drafting legislation that would bar prosecutors from forcing companies to waive their attorney-client privilege over internal documents in order to avoid criminal charges, a key part of the current guidelines. Specter, who has received support from Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), could release the bill as early as Monday." The Post notes, "Debate about the appropriate use of prosecutorial power over business has simmered for years, reigniting in 2002 when the Justice Department charged Arthur Andersen LLP with obstruction of justice, a move that prompted partners and clients to flee and hastened the death of the audit firm."

Report Recommends Reducing Corporate Regulations. The Wall Street Journal (11/30, Ip, Scannell, Solomon, 2.04M) reports a "blue-ribbon committee on financial regulation has called for better protection of auditors, company employees and outside directors from authorities and lawsuits, as well as less-detailed rule-making and lower-key investigations." The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation's report "is one of the most high-profile efforts to date to address concerns that excessive regulation -- much of it a response to recent corporate scandals -- is adding to corporate costs, stifling the public securities markets and causing the U.S. markets to lose business to foreign competitors." The committee is "directed by Harvard law professor Hal Scott and co-chaired by former White House adviser Glenn Hubbard, now dean of Columbia University's business school, and John Thornton, former president at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and now chairman of the Brookings Institution." The report "makes 32 recommendations, of which six relate to easing the application of Section 404 of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act governing internal company-financial controls. The SEC already plans to present new guidance on section 404 on Dec. 13. Companies have complained that the section is expensive and onerous to implement."

USA Today (11/30, 1B, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "A group of prominent business executives and academics is planning to issue a call today for government regulators to ease up on the enforcement of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act." The group "asserts that some elements of the stringent law, which was passed in the wake of accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom, have threatened the USA's leadership position in the global capital markets." According to "Hal Scott, the Harvard Law School professor who spearheaded the study, recent trends in litigation and regulation threaten to undermine the USA's position as the world's dominant capital market."

The New York Times (11/30, Norris, Labaton, 1.16M) reports the committee will recommend "making it harder for companies to be indicted by the government or sued by private lawyers, and urges policies to keep the Securities and Exchange Commission from adopting rules that impose high costs on business." The panel, "formed with the endorsement of Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., said the S.E.C. should be required to perform cost-benefit analyses on all rules before they were adopted. It said the S.E.C. should also take steps to rein in private securities litigation and adopt policies to shield corporate directors and auditors from some lawsuits."

Bloomberg (11/30, Westbrook, Anand) reports, "The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, led by former White House Economic Adviser Glenn Hubbard and former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. President John Thornton, in a report to be published tomorrow, called for a broad overhaul of securities regulation, saying the Justice Department should pursue corporate criminal indictments only as a last resort. The group's recommendations may shape the debate about how to revise the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. … 'Firms must choose to come to the United States: they do not have to come,' the group said in an advance copy of the 135- page report. 'It is the committee's view that in the shift of regulatory intensity, balance has been lost to the competitive disadvantage of U.S. financial markets.'" Bloomberg adds, "Paulson has questioned whether laws like Sarbanes-Oxley, passed in the wake of corporate scandals, went too far. The Treasury secretary has been waiting for the report as he prepares meetings next year to examine the U.S. accounting and legal systems. … Members of Congress have said they are concerned the U.S. may lose its status as the world's top financial center because of costs stemming from Sarbanes-Oxley."

The Los Angeles Times (11/30, Peterson) reports, "Business lobbyists and their intellectual allies have begun a broad effort to lighten the regulatory burden of corporate America, warning that U.S. companies and the capital markets they rely on are losing the competitive battle to rivals overseas. … In the latest development, the private Committee on Capital Markets Regulation today plans to release an interim report contending that regulation, enforcement and litigation have become a weighty burden on the economy, and cite evidence that America's long-envied capital markets have lost some of their allure. … 'The first conclusion is that we have a real competitiveness problem,' said Hal S. Scott, a Harvard University law professor who directed the work of the panel." The Times adds, "To make its case, the panel cites the rising prominence of private equity firms, which are increasingly buying publicly traded companies and taking them into private ownership. … The report also warns that the U.S. is losing its dominant role in initial public offerings. 'As measured by value of IPOs, the U.S. share declined from 50% in 2000 to 5% in 2005,' it says. .. 'Foreign companies are not coming here, and private companies are not going public as much as they did in the past,' Scott said in an interview Wednesday. 'Over time, if we don't deal with the problems, it's not just going to be foreign companies that don't want to come here but our own companies won't want to be traded here.' … Such complaints aren't new, but some see a change in the nation's attitude toward big business that could give the panel's report greater currency. .. .Memories of fraud at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and elsewhere are starting to fade, and the corporate investments held by millions of Americans through stocks, 401(k) plans and mutual funds are swelling thanks to a booming stock market."

Hubbard, Thornton Tout Recommendations. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/30, A16), Hubbard and Thornton say, "Our 135-page report offers numerous recommendations and suggestions for areas of further study -- principally for regulation, though, in some cases, for legislation. The theme is simple: To maintain and enhance the value of U.S. public markets, we must do a better job of assessing and evaluating the benefits and costs of our regulatory and legal system and strengthen the rights of shareholders. Our 22-member committee's initial recommendations should be implemented: They represent the consensus of a diverse group of legal and finance scholars, CEOs, auditors, practicing corporate attorneys, institutional investors and investor advocates drawn from both political parties. Taken together, the proposed changes would enhance shareholder value by reducing the cost of capital, increasing expected firm cash flows, and reducing excessive risk aversion of corporate managers, auditors and directors."

New York Appeals Court Skeptical Of Grasso's Bid To Disqualify Judge. The New York Law Journal (11/30, Bar) reports, "Appellate judges reacted with skepticism Wednesday to arguments that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos should be disqualified from hearing a state lawsuit to force former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso to return much of his $187.5 million compensation package." The Journal continues, "Attorneys for Grasso appeared Wednesday before a four-judge panel of New York's Appellate Division, 1st Department, to appeal Ramos' refusing to recuse himself from the case and saying he would decide the reasonableness of the compensation in a bench trial. … Among other things, Grasso's attorneys argued that Ramos should have recused himself because he promised to do so before engaging in settlement discussions during which he expressed strong opinions about the case."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Study Finds One In 32 American Adults In Jail, On Probation Or Parole. The AP (11/30, Hunt) reports, "A record 7 million people - or one in every 32 American adults - were behind bars, on probation or on parole by the end of last year, according to the Justice Department. Of those, 2.2 million were in prison or jail, an increase of 2.7 percent over the previous year, according to a report released Wednesday." The AP continues, "More than 4.1 million people were on probation and 784,208 were on parole at the end of 2005. Prison releases are increasing, but admissions are increasing more. … Men still far outnumber women in prisons and jails, but the female population is growing faster. Over the past year, the female population in state or federal prison increased 2.6 percent while the number of male inmates rose 1.9 percent. By year's end, 7 percent of all inmates were women. The gender figures do not include inmates in local jails. … 'Today's figures fail to capture incarceration's impact on the thousands of children left behind by mothers in prison,' Marc Mauer, the executive director of the Sentencing Project, a Washington-based group supporting criminal justice reform, said in a statement. 'Misguided policies that create harsher sentences for nonviolent drug offenses are disproportionately responsible for the increasing rates of women in prisons and jails.'" The AP notes, "From 1995 to 2003, inmates in federal prison for drug offenses have accounted for 49 percent of total prison population growth. .. The numbers are from the annual report from the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics. The report breaks down inmate populations for state and federal prisons and local jails."

US Mulls Death Penalty In Virginia Kidnapping, Murder. The Virginian-Pilot (11/30, McGlone) reports, "The Justice Department is considering pursuing the death penalty against Tanya Y. Torrence, the 35-year-old woman charged with the kidnapping and murder of her estranged boyfriend's mother this summer." The V-P continues, "Torrence was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on a four-count indictment that could carry a death sentence if convicted. Led to the magistrate court's podium in shackles, Torrence pleaded not guilty to the charges." The V-P adds, "The indictment charges Torrence with murder, kidnapping, interstate kidnapping resulting in death and use of a firearm. Magistrate James E. Bradberry set a trial date of March 13. .. Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura P. Tayman told the judge that she expects a decision from Washington by Jan. 23 on whether to seek the death penalty." The V-P notes, "Torrence is accused of kidnapping 72-year-old Mary Knight from her Virginia Beach home July 1 and driving north in Knight's minivan. Along the way, Torrence shot Knight twice, killing her, according to the indictment and other court filings. … She continued driving, ending up in Philadelphia where she exchanged the handgun for crack cocaine, according to the court records. She turned herself in to police there and Knight's body was found in the minivan. … The indictment says Torrence committed the crimes 'to punish her estranged boyfriend.' In a confession to authorities after her arrest in Philadelphia, Torrence said the shooting was an accident. … Torrence remains jailed without bond."

Court Allows Former Illinois Governor Freedom Pending Appeal. The AP (11/30, Robinson) reports, "Former (Illinois) Governor George Ryan can remain free while he appeals his conviction in the corruption scandal that ruined his political career, a federal appeals court has ruled." The AP continues, "The decision by the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was issued without explanation Tuesday, but the court said if it upholds Ryan's conviction, he must go to prison immediately." The AP adds, 'Ryan, 72, was sentenced in September to 6 1/2 years in federal prison for racketeering and fraud involving corruption when he was secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor. … U.S. District Judge Rebecca L. Pallmeyer had refused to grant bail to Ryan. But the appeals court overruled her and said Ryan may remain free while appealing his conviction. He had been due to report to prison Jan. 4." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors opposed bail for Ryan, saying it was unlikely his conviction would be overturned. But Ryan's attorneys argued that jury deliberations in the case were flawed and that Ryan should be granted a new trial. … Ryan was convicted in April of steering lucrative state contracts and leases to lobbyists and friends; using state employees and tax dollars to operate his political campaigns; and sabotaging an investigation of driver's license bribery."

Louisiana Lawmakers Steered Millions To Jefferson-Linked State Agencies. The AP (11/30, DeSlatte) reports, "At least $2.5 million in state money was steered by New Orleans lawmakers over a 10-year period to two nonprofit agencies with family ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, according to documents released by the governor's office. … The documents were subpoenaed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and provided to The Associated Press this week by the governor's office in response to a public records request. The FBI has declined to say what information it is seeking in the documents. But Jefferson…is the subject of a federal bribery probe." The AP notes, "The earmarks for Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing were added by lawmakers connected to Jefferson: his daughter, Rep. Jalila Jefferson-Bullock, and former Rep. Renee Gill Pratt, a former legislative aide to the congressman and former New Orleans City councilwoman who was hired by Care Unlimited when she lost her re-election bid. Also listed as sponsor of the add-ons in some instances was Sen. Diana Bajoie, D-New Orleans."

DOJ's Decision Not To Probe Porter Fundraising Calls Raises Enforcement Concerns. Scripps Howard (11/30, Mascaro) reports, "The Justice Department's decision not to investigate allegations that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made illegal campaign fund-raising calls from his office raises a question central to ethics reform in the new Congress: What if there's a law on the books and no one enforces it?" Scripps Howard continues, Experts say they know of no congressman ever being prosecuted under the law banning them from soliciting cash from their offices, a violation punishable by fines and imprisonment. … Justice Department officials have 'bigger fish to fry,' as one veteran Washington election-law attorney put it - pointing to the bribery of now-imprisoned former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif., and the $90,000 allegedly found in the freezer of re-elected Rep. William Jefferson, D-La. … But ethics-reform groups say the failure to investigate less sensational allegations feeds into a culture of corruption in Washington, which Democrats have vowed to clean up in January as the party in control of Congress. … 'There are a lot of rules, that have been in place for reasons, that have been ignored,' said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause, a political watchdog group." Scripps Howard notes, "In the weeks before the Nov. 7 election, a former Porter staff member claimed that the congressman made fund-raising calls from his offices in Washington and Henderson, Nev. E-mails obtained by the Las Vegas Sun showed conversations, apparently dealing with the phone calls, between the aide and other members of Porter's staff and campaign. .. .Porter has steadfastly denied having made the calls. … The former Porter aide, Jim Shepard, said last week that he would try to have the matter heard by the House ethics committee, which has jurisdiction over representatives' behavior. … The panel does not comment on its work. But experts said they doubt that it will take up the matter, arguing that it has become 'toothless' in recent years."

Massachusetts City Roiled By FBI Probe Of Police Grant Spending. The Boston Globe (11/30, McConville, 413K) reports, "The federal investigation into the Methuen Police Department's use of grant money is causing a lot of anguish in the city, officials say. 'It's like a cloud hanging over the city,' said City Councilor Kathleen Corey Rahme. 'It's really wearing on the minds and hearts of our citizens.' In shops and in city offices, everyone, it seems, has questions about who is involved and what is being investigated." The Globe notes, "The investigation caught the public's attention this past summer, when agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrived at City Hall with subpoenas. They left with records showing how the city had spent federal grant money in recent years. … The story heated up a couple of weeks ago when Methuen Police Chief Joseph E. Solomon launched an internal investigation to try to identify officers who are talking to the FBI or gossiping about possible indictments, according to a lawyer for the police union."

Report For Federal Lawsuit Says Chicago Police Officials Ignore Corruption. The Chicago Tribune (11/29, Heinzmann, 617K) reported, "Chicago police officials have deliberately ignored corruption within the ranks, giving bad cops a sense of security to commit crimes on the job without being caught, according to a national expert on internal affairs hired by plaintiffs suing the city. The damning report by Lou Reiter, a former deputy chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, contends that police officials, including Supt. Philip Cline, have continued a 'practice of indifference' toward corruption that 'makes officers who engage in misconduct feel protected.'" However, "Chicago police officials say the criticism is based on limited knowledge of the department, and it does not take into consideration policy reforms currently under way to thwart corruption and abuse before it becomes a problem." The Tribune added, "Reiter's report is part of a federal lawsuit filed a decade ago by a husband and wife pair of Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents. They charge that after they blew the whistle on corrupt cop Joseph Miedzianowski, he influenced the Internal Affairs Division to turn the tables and attack their credibility."

The AP (11/30) notes, "Pressure on the department to deal with corruption allegations has intensified in recent months. In July, two special prosecutors released a report claiming that officers under former Chicago Police Lt. Jon Burge tortured suspects in the 1980s. And in September, four members of the Special Operations Section were charged with robbery, kidnapping and false arrests." In the lawsuit, the ATF agents say that "instead of investigating Miedzianowski, internal affairs officials targeted them, the agents claim. It took years before the FBI was able to indict Miedzianowski on drug charges; he is serving a life prison term."

Former California City Treasurer Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison For Embezzlement. The Los Angeles Times (11/29, Becerra, 850K) reported, "Former South Gate Treasurer Albert Robles was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in federal prison for plundering more than $20 million from the small, working-class city. A federal judge handed down the sentence after Robles said in an impassioned speech that he had acted 'immorally' during his years as leader of South Gate, but never broke the law." Judge Stephen V. Wilson "said he found the man who once boasted of being 'the King of South Gate' to be a 'puppet master' who controlled a corrupt enterprise that preyed on the city's coffers and residents. Wilson seemed incredulous at Robles' defense. When Robles' attorney argued that what the ex-treasurer did was business as usual in California politics, the judge responded that 'what you have just said is among the most absurd things I have ever heard.'"

DOJ_NMG_0099679

The AP (11/29) noted, "Prosecutors depicted the city as a corrupt fiefdom in which Robles solicited bribes from contractors and was able to hire and fire city employees at will. The illicit money paid for everything from a seaside condo for his mother to an exclusive membership in the group operated by motivational guru Tony Robbins, authorities said. … 'He turned it into a pay-to-play town,' Assistant U.S. Attorney David Vaughn said outside court, alluding to a scheme in which contractors were forced to pay bribes for city business."

Former New York Fugitive Pleads Guilty To Killing Trooper. The New York Times (11/30, Staba, 1.16M) reports, "Ralph Phillips, the police say, spent most of the spring and summer roaming along the New York-Pennsylvania line after escaping from a jail outside Buffalo in April, venturing as far as Ohio to the west and the Canadian border to the north to evade a sweeping manhunt." Yesterday, Phillips "admitted in guilty pleas to killing one New York state trooper and wounding two others during his flight. As part of a plea agreement that prosecutors said will keep Mr. Phillips in prison for life, he admitted shooting Troopers Joseph A. Longobardo and Donald Baker Jr. with a high-powered rifle in a wooded area outside his former companion's home in rural Chautauqua County on Aug. 31. … Earlier in the day, in Chemung County, Mr. Phillips also admitted to shooting Trooper Sean M. Brown with a .38 revolver during a traffic stop outside Elmira on June 10." The Times notes that "he became something of a folk hero to some," but "most sympathy evaporated after the shootings of Troopers Longobardo and Baker. He went on the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, and rewards totaling $425,000 were offered for information leading to his capture."

The Albany Times-Union (11/30, Perry, Yusko) also notes that Phillips was on the FBI most-wanted list, and reports, "As the charges were read…Phillips alternately rolled his eyes, grinned, stared vacantly and looked out the window. He admitted to stealing a car and shooting the trooper with a gun he had loaded himself. At times, Phillips sarcastically answered Chemung County Court Judge Peter C. Buckley's questions about his actions, often replying 'Indeed, I did.' When asked if the gun he used to shoot Brown was loaded, he answered, 'Very.'" The AP (11/30, Thompson, Dobbin) also reports on Phillips pleas.

FBI Arrests Missouri Man For Impersonating Decorated Marine. The Marine Corps Times (11/29, Hoellwarth) reported, "A member of the Marine Corps League in St. Louis was arrested by FBI agents Tuesday evening after being photographed allegedly wearing a Navy Cross medal he doesn't rate at the league's Marine Corps ball earlier this month, according to a Fox News report. Michael Weilbacher wore a Navy Cross, two Silver Stars and four Bronze Stars to the ball, where he told Marines he had earned the nation's second-highest valor award during drug interdictions in Colombia, according to Maj. George Dragan, the Corps' Marine for Life representative in St. Louis, who attended the ball. This raised a red flag with Doug Sterner," who "said that no Navy Cross has ever been awarded for actions in Colombia. Personnel records at Marine Corps headquarters' Manpower branch show no record of Weilbacher ever serving in the Corps." The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (11/29, Patrick, 297K) reported the story on its Web site, noting Weilbacher "has been charged with wearing military medals without authorization, a crime punishable by 6 months in prison or a fine of $50,000, or both. He was released on $1,000 bond."

Florida Gambino Capo, Three Associates Convicted Of RICO Charges. WTSP-TV Tampa (11/29) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "A federal jury in Tampa has found four men guilty of various crimes related to the Gambino Mafia family. Ronald J. Trucchio (Ronnie One-Arm), Steven Catalano, Kevin M. McMahon, and Terry L. Scaglione were found guilty of conspiracy to violate the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization…statute. The jury also found Scaglione guilty of one count of extortion." WTSP noted, "The Pinellas Resident Agency of the Tampa Field Office of the FBI, the Miami and Brooklyn-Queens Metropolitan FBI offices, the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office, the Tampa Police Department, the New York City Police Department, the Queens County District Attorney's Office, the FBI Legal Attache to Brazil, the Brazilian federal police, and Interpol coordinated this investigation."

The Tampa Tribune (11/30, Silvestrini) reports, "Carl Whitehead, special agent in charge of the Tampa FBI, called Wednesday's verdicts 'a big blow to organized crime in the Tampa area and to the Gambino family operated out of New York.' … Whitehead said Trucchio was thought to be among the top five members of the family 'and clearly the most significant [organized crime] figure that operated crews within the Tampa area.' When asked whether the mob continues to operate here, Whitehead said he couldn't discuss open investigations. In general, though, he said, 'There are other businesses we have gotten information that they might try to infiltrate, different nightclubs, things like that.'" The St. Petersburg Times (11/30, Weimar) also reports on the convictions.

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Running Gambling Ring. The Rockford (IL) Register Star (11/30, Wise) reports, "One of nine men indicted for running a gambling ring that took bets on football and basketball games pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court afternoon. … And Joesph Saladino's plea may be the first of several guilty pleas from men whom prosecutors allege were connected to a conspiracy that runs as far back as the 1980s. … 'There's a total of five' guilty pleas in the works, including Saladino, said Assistant U.S. Attorney John Scully as he left Judge Philip Reinhard's courtroom. … The other possible guilty pleas are John P. 'Tiger' Frisella, Joseph F. 'Pep' Fiorenza, and Joesph's two sons, Nicholas and Rick." The Star adds, "Wednesday, Reinhard set Friday afternoon hearing dates for the four. Their trial was initially scheduled to start Dec. 11. … It's still not clear what will happen with the other men who were indicted in the case. They are Charles A. Purin, Frank C. Giardono, Nick Provenzano and John F. Salamone. A tentative trial date for them has been set for Feb. 12. … All of the men, except Saladino, were indicted and arrested in early February, just days before the Super Bowl, on gambling charges." The Star notes, "Federal prosecutors have been characteristically tight-lipped about details of the alleged conspiracy, but court papers filed this week list some of the evidence the Justice Department plans to present if the case goes to trial. … The documents say that Frisella and Saladino had, at least by 2001, set up a 'wireroom' in a Rockford apartment building at 1912 17th Ave. where they would take bookmaking calls from bettors over two telephones that were listed under the name of a woman known to Saladino. … The feds also obtained phone records that show hundreds of calls made from the men to 800 and 888 numbers."

6th Circuit Upholds Use Of Confession In Tennessee Drug Trial. The Knoxville News Sentinel (TN) (11/30, Satterfield) reports, "That 'anything you say can and will be used against you' warning, it turns out, is true. … Just ask five-time felon and Knoxville crack house manager Richard Jones Jr." The Sentinel continues, "Plowing through uncharted legal terrain, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Wednesday approved the use of Jones' confession against him at trial. .. .The ruling proved vindication for similar decisions made by Knoxville federal Judges James H. Jarvis and Tom Varlan. Both U.S. District Court judges had backed up Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck's move to hold against Jones his own incriminating words in a November 2004 trial. … It was quite a gamble, as there was little case law to guide Winck." The Sentinel adds, "Jones actually had been busted in August 2000 after a raid at his home. At the time, authorities counted Jones as a garden-variety dope dealer with a rather nasty criminal history that included a first-degree manslaughter conviction. … Winck wasn't assigned to the case then. Instead, former Knoxville federal prosecutor David Folmar was. Folmar struck a deal with Jones, and Jones coughed up information on his cocaine suppliers. Part of the deal included giving Jones a shot at appealing the legality of the raid on his house. … The odds on appeal usually favor the government. But Jones beat the odds, winning his appeal. Flush with victory, he chucked his plea deal altogether. … Enter Winck. … The way Winck saw it, if Jones was nullifying his plea deal, all bets were off. That was especially bad news for Jones because, by then, FBI agent Steven Fisher had unearthed evidence that Jones was not just a crack dealer - he was a dangerous mastermind of an entire operation." The Sentinel notes, "Trial testimony would later show that Jones had wined and dined young men with relatively clean criminal backgrounds to lure them into the crack trade. He set them up in Knoxville crack houses, supplied them with drugs to peddle and guns to protect the trade. … Winck secured a new indictment against Jones and then rolled the dice at trial, sending Fisher to the witness stand to detail the confession Jones had made as part of the plea deal he later rejected. … It has proven a costly gamble for Jones. Under the original plea deal, Jones was sentenced to 210 months. After his conviction on the new indictment, Varlan slapped him with a 420-month prison term."

Attorneys For Convicted Atlanta Child Killer Seek DNA Tests. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (11/30, McDonald) reports, "Attorneys for convicted killer Wayne Williams, long reputed to be the man behind Atlanta's infamous child murders, are asking a Fulton County, Ga., judge for permission to perform DNA testing on 25-year-old evidence." The Report continues, "On Tuesday, Williams' defense lawyers John R. 'Jack' Martin and Lynn H. Whatley filed a motion in Fulton County Superior Court seeking comparative DNA tests on samples of animal and human hair recovered from the bodies of 11 men and boys whose deaths were attributed to Williams." The Report adds, "Williams was convicted in 1982 of the murders of Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, and Nathaniel Cater, 28 -- two of 29 black men and children who were among what became known as 'Atlanta's missing and murdered children' cases. (The list included one still-unsolved disappearance.) After Williams' convictions in the slayings of Payne and Cater, prosecutors closed the books on 22 other cases. … For two years, from 1979 to 1981, the bodies of 29 victims -- all of them black and all but two of them men and boys -- were found dumped throughout metro Atlanta in vacant lots and buildings, on roadsides, in gullies, in wooded areas and in the South and Chattahoochee rivers. Fear gripped Atlanta during what many regard as one of the darkest periods in the city's history. … With the discovery of each new body, authorities became increasingly desperate to identify the killer. Parents in black neighborhoods formed vigilante patrols, and many came to believe the Ku Klux Klan must be behind the killings since only blacks were slain. Mayor Maynard Jackson offered a $100,000 reward for information that might lead to an arrest. Finally, before dawn on May 22, 1981, police staking out a Chattahoochee River bridge near where one body had been found heard a splash. Seconds later, officers spotted Williams' station wagon driving slowly across the bridge. Williams was stopped, questioned, but released." The Report notes, "A month would pass before police finally arrested Williams, a 23-year-old self-styled talent recruiter and freelance photographer. Prosecutors would later argue that only after Williams' arrest did the string of serial slayings stop. Still, many were never satisfied that police arrested the right man. As recently as 2005, former DeKalb County police chief Louis Graham reopened an investigation into five of the deaths and declared his belief that Williams was not Atlanta's child killer. … Williams always has maintained his innocence."

Genovese Crime Family Said To Have New Boss. In the New York Sun (11/30), Jerry Capeci writes, "Less than a year after the death of legendary Mafia boss Vincent 'Chin' Gigante, a cagy wiseguy who understands the wisdom of keeping a low profile has taken the reins of the powerful Genovese crime family, Gang Land has learned. Meet Daniel Leo, 65, a reputed member of the violent, East Harlem-based Purple Gang during the 1970s who now resides in a $2 million home in Rockleigh, N.J., a town on the Palisades that boasts the highest median household income in the state, according to the 2000 census. … During the 1970s, according to a 1976 Drug Enforcement Administration report, Leo was a member of the Purple Gang, a loosely connected group of 127 drug dealers that includes dozens of gangsters from East Harlem and the Bronx who became Luchese and Genovese family mobsters, including Leo."

Tennessee Serial Bank Robber Sentenced To 11 Years In Prison. The Knoxville News Sentinel (11/30, Satterfield) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracy Stone argued Wednesday in U.S. District Court that he already had given serial bank robber Thomas J. Hunt Jr. a 25-year sentencing cut by dropping one of three cases against him. Still, Hunt stood before Senior U.S. District Judge James H. Jarvis with Assistant Federal Defender Paula Voss asking for more leniency." The News Sentinel adds, "Jarvis sided with Stone, imposing a sentence of 135 months, or just more than 11 years, which the prosecutor recommended. Hunt, nabbed shortly after the robberies by FBI agents, told the judge he had longtime addictions to alcohol and drugs."

Microsoft Software Counterfeiter Sentenced To Prison, $9.4 Million Restitution. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/30, Bishop, 124K) reports, "A former southwest Washington man was sentenced Wednesday to pay $9.4 million in restitution to Microsoft Corp. and serve five years in prison for illegal trafficking in the company's software." Scott Laney "pleaded guilty to money laundering and counterfeiting conspiracy charges. The scheme involved acquiring Microsoft programs at cut rates -- in some cases from employees who were abusing the company's internal ordering system -- and reselling them with falsified labels, documents and licenses that boosted their value. As part of the case, Laney admitted that he and his co-conspirators sold up to $20 million of software with counterfeit labeling and licenses." The P-I notes, "The FBI, IRS and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigated the case. … Several former Microsoft employees have been charged separately with taking advantage of previous loopholes in the company's internal software ordering system." The AP (11/30) also reports on Laney's sentencing.

23 Charged With FEMA Relief Fraud In Alabama. The AP (11/30) reports, "Fraud charges were announced Wednesday against 23 north Alabama residents, most accused of making false claims to get $2,000 in expedited disaster relief, with one accused of wrongly pocketing $14,749 in Federal Emergency Management Agency funds. 'Theft of disaster relief funds will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law,' said U.S. Attorney Alice H. Martin in a statement. 'I continue to ask the public to report illegal claims to law enforcement.'" The AP notes, "The charges include making false claims against the government, theft of government money or property and mail fraud for falsely claiming to be a resident of an affected area."

Mississippi Man Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud, As Five Others Arrested. The AP (11/29) reported, "One man has pleaded guilty to filing a false Hurricane Katrina claim and five others have been arrested for fraud against the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Robert A. Martin, of Gulfport, pleaded guilty to submitting a false claim for disaster assistance funds in the wake of Katrina and will be sentenced in federal court in February, the Department of Justice said Tuesday in a news release. At the time Katrina hit the Mississippi Gulf Coast Martin was at the Harrison County Correctional Facility." The AP adds, "Five more Gulf Coast residents have been accused of defrauding FEMA. Authorities said all five provided false addresses in Gulfport or Biloxi, then made claims on those addresses. All were indicted on Nov. 7 and arrested Tuesday."

Kansas Man Who Challenged Child Solicitation Sting Sentenced To Prison. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/30) reports that the Kansas "lawyer convicted in an Internet sex sting was sentenced Wednesday to five years in prison, capping a legal battle that challenged a common tool police use to catch sexual predators online. Moments after a federal jury convicted Jan P. Helder Jr. in August 2005, the judge set aside the verdict and ordered him acquitted. U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple said Helder couldn't be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover detective in Platte County, Mo., not a 14-year-old girl as he had believed." However, "The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis reinstated the jury's verdict against Helder and sent the case back to Whipple for sentencing. The appeals court said the critical issue was that Helder thought he was seducing a minor, not whether the minor truly existed."

Man Sentenced To Time Served For Threatening President Bush. The AP (11/30, Suhr) reports, "A mental patient who threatened to castrate President George W. Bush was sentenced to federal prison, but a judge ordered him freed because of time he has already served." The AP continues, "Arafat Nijmeh, 27, who is of Palestinian descent, was sentenced Tuesday to seven months in prison after pleading guilty to two counts of threatening the president. … 'This would have been an interesting trial,' said his attorney, John O'Gara." The AP adds, "He was released after U.S. District Judge David Herndon credited him with the eight months he spent in custody. Nijmeh had been jailed without bail after being declared a flight risk and a threat to society. … Nijmeh was accused of threatening to harm Bush in comments March 18 to workers at the Alton Mental Health Center and to two Secret Service agents the next day. … The indictment alleged Nijmeh told the agents his earlier threat to castrate Bush was 'not too harsh, considering what he has done to my country.'"

Fairfax County Probing Fuel Thefts By Employees. The Washington Post (11/30, Rein) reports, "They sometimes filled up their tanks in the dead of night, keying in a generic code at any of dozens of Fairfax County fuel pumps, then sticking the nozzle into the tanks of their personal cars or into drums to bring home for snowblowers or lawn mowers." The Post continues, "The county's auditor and several county supervisors say they suspect the abuse of fuel pumps by employees assigned government cars went on for years. They are uncertain how many workers were involved -- it could have been hundreds -- or how much fuel was stolen, inflating a monthly fuel bill that has doubled in three years because of rising prices. … But in a report that the Board of Supervisors is scheduled to receive Monday, the county is getting a handle on the scope of the fraud with help from new controls. The county auditor will report that the Fairfax fleet is on track to use close to 75,000 gallons less this year than last, and officials suspect that most of that amount was stolen." The Post adds, "The most egregious case officials know of involved a worker in the Department of Facilities Management who was stealing diesel fuel and gasoline for more than two years. Fairfax police staked out Bryan Coup after investigating him for several months. They caught him filling up the tank of his county car one night last January and then putting diesel into large drums. … Police followed him to his home in Shady Side, where he planned to use the diesel to heat his home, officials said. Coup, 36, was fired, and he was found guilty of embezzlement in August. He made restitution for hundreds of gallons of stolen fuel, auditor John Adair said. Another employee was charged with stealing fuel, although Adair and police officials could not provide details."

Former CIA Employee Pleads Guilty To Virginia Thefts. The Washington Post (11/30, B1, Kunkle) reports, "George C. Dalmas III, a CIA employee for almost 20 years, yesterday admitted to breaking into 10 homes in the McLean area about a year ago and taking valuables and curiosities." The Post continues, "The loot from his daylight burglaries included Camp David cuff links, a Daughters of the American Revolution pin, a gold Phi Beta Kappa necklace, Cartier hoop earrings, a Tiffany gold scarab ring, a sapphire-diamond necklace, rhinestone bracelets, a Rolex watch and even a Fauquier High School ring. He also helped himself to several antique clocks and old radios -- all treasures he told his wife he had picked up at yard sales." The Post adds, "Dalmas did not explain why he did what he did, and the format in Fairfax County Circuit Court for accepting his guilty plea did not really allow for it. Neither his attorney nor the prosecutor mentioned the most intriguing object of Dalmas's criminal treasure-hunting expeditions: women's panties. … Search warrants list 1,074 pairs of women's undergarments that he stole, many of which were stuffed in shopping bags inside a filing cabinet at his Fulton Avenue home in Falls Church. … Police believe Dalmas kept the undies as trophies. In fact, they believe Dalmas squirreled away everything he took. Court documents say he never tried to pawn or sell any of the jewelry or other valuable goods. Rodway described Dalmas as a packrat. … Dalmas, 48, pleaded guilty to 10 burglaries that each carry a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison. Dalmas, who has no prior criminal record, was fired from his mid-level administrative post at the CIA. Mark Mansfield, a CIA spokesman, said Dalmas joined the agency in November 1986. He was suspended without pay in February and terminated in August."

CIVIL LAW:

Halliburton Unit Settles Army Billing Fraud Allegations For $8 Million. CNN.com (11/30, Frieden, Byron) reports, "Halliburton subsidiary KBR has agreed to pay $8 million to settle allegations the firm overcharged the U.S. Army for logistical support of military operations in the Balkans in 1999 and 2000." CNN continues, "The allegations involved double billing and delivery of products that did not conform to requirements for use in construction of an Army camp in Kosovo. Other claims involved inflation of prices for various goods resulting from the alleged failure to ensure competitive procurements, the Justice Department said. … 'The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military,' said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the department's Civil Division." CNN adds, "The Justice Department said the settlement resolves allegations that concerned various purchase orders awarded to 10 foreign KBR subcontractors or vendors. … Company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross issued a statement noting that 'the government closed its investigation without making allegations of fraud or filing a complaint.'"

The AP (11/30, Jordan) reports, "Kellogg, Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Houston-based Halliburton Co., was accused of double-billing the government and ordering unusable products while helping build Camp Bondsteel in Kosovo, prosecutors said. .. .The contractor also allegedly inflated prices for some unspecified goods that were not put out for competitive bid, the department said. … Prosecutors said those incidents occurred between 1999 and 2000." AFP (11/30) also reports on the settlement.

The Houston Chronicle (11/30, Ivanovich) reports, "In a recent filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, company officials noted the disputed charges were 'part of the Balkans contract under which approximately $100 million in work was done.' … Justice Department officials provided few other details, while none of the several Pentagon officials contacted Wednesday could address the matter."

Judge Orders Michigan Farmer To Pay $2 Million For False Insurance Claims. The Saginaw News (MI) (11/30, Coleman) reports, "BAY CITY -- Federal authorities have ordered a Bay County farmer to pay more than $2 million for false crop insurance claims." The News continues, "Bli Farms, Richard Bli and the estate of his brother, James E. Bli, must repay $2,128,920 to the federal government for claims filed for their 1992, 1994 and 1995 potato crops, U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy said Monday." The News adds, "U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson, after a bench trial, found that Richard Bli, acting on behalf of the partnership the Bli brothers formed in 1992, knowingly violated the False Claims Act. … Lawson said Bli submitted false claims for crop insurance indemnities and false certifications of potato production for the crop years in question. … The court found that the claims were false because Bli Farms had 'substantial unreported sold potato production' for the specified years. … 'Had Bli Farms reported all of its 1994 sole potato production, it would have received a significantly reduced indemnity for losses on its insured potato crop,' Murphy said in a statement from the Justice Department. … Bli Farms received $704,640 in crop insurance indemnities to which it was not entitled, he said."

US Considering Response To Ruling On Money Design. The Los Angeles Times (11/30, Mohammed, Mendoza) reports, "The Treasury Department on Wednesday began considering its response to a federal court ruling that ordered changes to paper currency so each denomination could be easily identified by blind and visually impaired people." The Times continues, "The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson came in a lawsuit filed against the department by the American Council of the Blind, a Washington-based advocacy group. The group argued that the government's failure to differentiate among denominations amounted to illegal discrimination, and Robertson agreed. … 'We are still reviewing the court order, and the government has made no determination as to what its next step will be in this matter,' said Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division." The Times adds, "The Treasury Department has 10 days from Tuesday's ruling to decide whether to appeal. .. .In his opinion, Robertson ordered the Treasury Department to consider such options as changing the size and color of banknotes for each denomination and adding tactile differences, such as foil, raised numbers or perforations, to the bills. … Other currencies, such as those of the European Union, Japan, Switzerland and Saudi Arabia, include such differences, he said, adding that the United States could have incorporated similar changes during recent redesigns that added anti-counterfeiting features. … The government has argued that doing so would prove a financial burden. But Robertson said that making one change — adding a raised numeral — would have increased the government's $4.2-billion cost of manufacturing currency over the last decade by only 5%."

Vending Machine Industry Worried About Mandated Currency Changes. The Washington Times (11/30, Baschuk) reports, "The vending machine industry would have to spend hundreds of millions of dollars so its machines could handle new currency that blind people could use if a new ruling on U.S. bills is enforced." The Times continues, "U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled Tuesday that the current bills discriminate against blind people. He ordered the Treasury Department to find a solution. … 'If the government is mandated to change U.S. currency, there would be a tremendous financial impact across a number of industries, including the automated vending industry,' said Jim Brinton, a director of the National Automatic Merchandising Association (NAMA), a trade association of the food and refreshment vending industry." The Times adds, "There are 7 million food and beverage machines in the United States, and 1.5 million of them accept both $1 and $5 bills, according to NAMA. .. .The vending machine industry would have to spend an estimated $200 to $300 to retrofit each machine, Mr. Brinton said. … The American Council of the Blind filed the lawsuit against the government in 2002, saying U.S. currency should be redesigned to help blind and visually impaired people distinguish among denominations. … 'We're not deliberately setting out to overturn American industries,' said Melanie Brunson, executive director of the American Council of the Blind in Washington. … 'We wanted the government to add accessibility [to the U.S. currency], and we wanted to make it an issue while our currency was being redesigned,' she said."

Court Hears Case On State Assertion Of Authority Over Mortgage Lenders. The Wall Street Journal (11/30, Bravin, Anderson, 2.04M) reports the Supreme Court yesterday heard a banking case that involves "an effort by some states to assert authority over mortgage lenders that federal officials say they can pre-empt." Michigan "asked the court to strike down a federal policy that pre-empts state consumer laws for state-chartered operating subsidiaries owned by national banks but affords those banks liability protections under state law. A win for Michigan could open the door to tougher state consumer protections, while making it costlier for banks to do business because they must meet each state's rules." US banking regulation "is governed by a system in which banks themselves select which entity will regulate them -- the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency or a state banking agency. This dual banking oversight has led to competition between federal and state regulators seeking to sign up banks, which support the agencies' budgets with regulatory fees."

The Washington Post (11/30, D1, Tse, 690K) reports, "All 50 states and the District of Columbia yesterday urged the Supreme Court to overturn lower court rulings that they said would give federal authorities the ability to block states from prosecuting financial institutions for predatory lending practices." But the justices "posed tough questions about the implications of a mortgage-lending case that could affect the way state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks are regulated. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. expressed concern about the banks' apparent effort to seek immunity from state regulations, but other justices suggested that banks are stumbling under excessive regulation by being required to report to both state and federal officials." Critics of the OCC "have long said the federal agency falls short in consumer protection and that it bases its regulatory decisions on maintaining the banks' safety and soundness."

DOJ Reportedly Probing Massachusetts Elections. The Boston Globe (11/30, Slack, Abraham) reports, "The US Department of Justice has launched an investigation into the state's failure to ensure that equipment for disabled voters was provided at polling places across Massachusetts during this year's elections, according to three people who spoke with federal investigators this week." The Globe continues, "Two investigators from the voting section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division -- trial lawyer James 'Nick' Boeving and special litigation counsel Susana Lorenzo-Giguere -- are to arrive in Boston today to begin gathering documents and conducting interviews, according to one of the two people. … Boeving is planning to inquire about the state's failure to comply with the federal Help America Vote Act, which requires that every polling place have at least one machine that allows disabled people to vote privately and independently, said Brenda Wright, managing attorney at the Boston-based National Voting Rights Institute. Wright received a call from a Department of Justice lawyer Tuesday." The Globe adds, "Problems with access for disabled voters would be just the latest accusation to plague election officials in Massachusetts, where irregularities in four cities have been investigated in recent years. Boston agreed last year to federal monitoring after the Justice Department accused the city of failing to protect the rights of voters with limited English skills. In September's primary, workers failed to count hundreds of ballots, and in the final election some 30 polling places ran out of ballots. … 'The investigating attorney appeared to be looking at the question of whether the state is in compliance with the HAVA requirements,' Wright said. 'They seemed to be aware of the press reports that have been fairly clear in indicating the state was not going to be in compliance, either in the primary or the general' elections. … Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson would neither confirm nor deny the existence of an investigation."

Texas Asks DOJ To Approve Congressional Runoff Election Date. The AP (11/30, Gamboa) reports, "Texas is asking the Justice Department to approve Dec. 12 for a congressional runoff election - a date opposed by a Latino civil rights group because it is a religious day for many Hispanics." The AP continues, "The runoff between incumbent Republican Henry Bonilla and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former congressman, is in Texas' 23rd congressional district, which includes portions of San Antonio. The district was redrawn after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled previous boundaries discriminated against Latino voters." The AP adds, "Dec. 12 is the Feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of Mexico and Latin America. The League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) wants the election held on Dec. 19, arguing that the earlier date discriminates against Hispanic voters and benefits Bonilla, whose support among Latinos has eroded. … States like Texas that have had a history of voting discrimination against minority groups are required under federal law to get Justice Department approval, known as preclearance, of election changes or decisions. … Texas officials, who filed the date request Tuesday, said the state doesn't need federal approval because a court ordered the runoff election set for the earliest time possible."

Probe Of New York City Police Shooting Continues Amid Protests. The Times continues, "As the two civil rights leaders led their group, police officers continued searching the site for evidence yesterday, and investigators were seeking additional witnesses." The Times adds, "The police were trying to locate a man who may have been in Mr. Bell's car on Saturday morning and another who witnesses say was at the heart of arguments outside Club Kalua, a cabaret, with groups that included Mr. Bell. That man was last seen dressed in black and standing in front of a sport utility vehicle with silver wheels in the moments before the shooting. It is unclear what role, if any, he played, the police said. .. .The police described the man who may have been in Mr. Bell's car as being last seen wearing a beige jacket and running away from the shooting onto 95th Avenue, the police said." The Times notes, "As investigators working on the case seek the two men, the police are asking everyone arrested in the city whether they have any information about the case. .. .The case has attracted national attention, a fact underscored by the arrival of Mr. Jackson and by a call from Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg to Bruce S. Gordon, president and chief executive of the N.A.A.C.P., which wants the Justice Department to review whether the shooting violated federal civil rights laws. Mr. Jackson echoed that sentiment yesterday."

NYC Police Commissioner Faces Another Furor Over Shooting. The New York Times (11/30, Healy) reports, "Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly has overseen the streets of New York for the last five years in the style of a global warrior against terrorism. With a self-confidence that strikes some people as imperious, and some as impressive, Mr. Kelly has created a network of police officials overseas, recruited former C.I.A. officers and built a 1,000-member terror unit. .. Yet over the last few days, Mr. Kelly has had to return to an earlier, less-novel role: the face of a police department involved in yet another public furor, this one a fatal shooting that has the makings of a combustible controversy involving race, politics and the police use of deadly force." The Times continues, "Mr. Kelly's role in the investigation and his handling of that shooting in Jamaica, Queens last Saturday, in which a young black bridegroom died, has all but been a flashback to his first tour as commissioner, in 1992 and 1993. Then, as the choice of New York's first black mayor in the aftermath of confrontations in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, Mr. Kelly took charge at a moment of considerable daily violence and raw racial emotion, in a city of metastasizing mistrust between black and Hispanic New Yorkers and police officers." The Times notes, "Those tensions have in some ways eased, and Mr. Kelly's relationship with police critics like the Rev. Al Sharpton is good enough that the two men talked just hours after the Queens shooting. … Mr. Kelly also took the more forceful step of putting the five officers who together fired 50 rounds in the 4 a.m. confrontation with the group of young black and Hispanic men on paid administrative leave and stripping them of their weapons. … But the return to this delicate public role as a truly local commissioner also brings new complications for Mr. Kelly, 65. He is routinely discussed in political circles as a possible candidate for mayor in 2009, something he has not ruled out, and his actions are apt to be seen as having potential political consequences."
